Bituminous Coal Act of 1937

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT G. ALLEN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 6, 1940

ADDRESS BY CONGRESSMAN ROBERT G. ALLEN, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech made by me before the National Fuel Credit Association at Hotel New Yorker, June 6, 1940:

Nature, in her immutable code of laws, has decreed that the life of man shall be a constant struggle. This struggle may be against natural elements or against other men, but strife there must always be. It is self-evident that through this process of strife and struggle we are either destroyed as unfit to survive, or we emerge from the battle stronger and hardier than when we entered it. The capacity of man, his ability to overcome seemingly insuperable obstacles, is developed in this process. There come times in the lives of individuals when they grow weary of the struggle, and the temptation to surrender is great. These people have reached the Rubicon; they either cross over and go forward or they falter and retreat. When free people tire of the burdensome responsibilities of self-government, dictators pick up the baton and carry on. When men prove incapable of taking care of themselves, they must be cared for by someone stronger. As it is with individuals, so it is with industries and with nations. This is the law of life.

Since the World War the bituminous-coal industry has been grievously ill. The multifarious problems confronting it have seemed well nigh insolvable. A great industry has been locked in battle against the economic forces of overexpanded production facilities and diminishing markets. The pages of industrial history are filled with accounts of similar struggles. Persistent and intelligent leadership plus the inexorable workings of economic laws would have rectified the situation eventually. Unfortunately, however, a large segment of the soft-coal industry capitulated a few years ago and the Federal Government was called in to exercise authoritative regulations. The cumulative problems of the industry were dumped into the lap of Uncle Sam. Operators and miners alike cast their worries aside and sat down to wait for the golden harvest of assured profits. This was a false and foolish step which must be retraced at once if a great, free enterprise is to be saved from bureaucratic control and ultimate Government ownership. Let us consider for a few moments the Bituminous Coal Act of 1937 in some of its most important phases.

PRICE FIXING

This law is primarily price-fixing legislation. It authorizes the Coal Division of the Department of the Interior to regulate the soft-coal industry. Regulation in the lexicon of bureaucrats is a polite word for control. In passing this legislation Congress supported by the United Mine Workers and by many coal operators completely disregarded past experience and violated all economic laws. Artificial price fixing has never worked successfully in a free capitalistic economy, and it never will. History proves conclusively that profits cannot be guaranteed by mere Government edict without serious dislocations resulting. Nevertheless, we rushed ahead all sail and no anchor and fixed this ill-starred legislation on a great fundamental American industry. The results portend chaos. At the present moment, in the Appalachian area alone, over 500,000 different price schedules have been established. These prices are based on the varying quality, size, and usage of the coal from a specific mine. A variation in any of these factors throws the whole schedule into obsolescence. Cost of production likewise influences these price schedules. You know as well as I do that costs are dynamic and in a state of constant flux. Costs at any mine depend on wages, insurance rates, taxes, State laws, and so forth. Any of these may be changed quickly, with the result that today's prices are obsolete tomorrow. The enormity of the task of administering a half million prices under such dynamic circumstances staggers the imagination. In my opinion, successful administration of this job exceeds all human capacity. Remember that these prices are fixed according to the opinion of one man—a Federal Administrator. When and if these prices become effective, utter confusion and constant litigation will smother the soft-coal industry into lifelessness.

PRICE FIXING AND PRODUCTION

As businessmen we must know that prices cannot be effectively pegged unless production is coordinated into the scheme. Here again we have violated all economic laws by vesting the Coal Division with authority over prices, but at the same time withholding control over production. Knowing the attitude of Federal bureaucrats as I do, I am certain that in the near future Mr. Ickes will be asking Congress to grant him full authority to allocate production at the mines. We should never grant this additional power. Rather, we should withdraw what power we have already yielded. When the Government controls production as well as prices, the last vestige of free enterprise will disappear from the soft-coal industry. It is only a short step from there to outright Government ownership of all bituminous mines. That is an inescapable fact. The present act must either be amended or repealed, or the Government must be given control of production as well as prices.

PRICE-FIXING THEORY

If the theory of price fixing is sound, we should carry it to its ultimate conclusion and use it as a panacea for all ailing industries. Why not fix fees for indigent lawyers so that they may flourish, be they good or bad? Why not establish prices on furniture, pots, and pans so that incompetents can survive? If price fixing is economically right, it should be applied to all ailing segments of industries which are struggling to exist.

Price fixing removes all incentive for scientific improvement in production methods. In our competitive system such improvements have always been reflected in higher wages, higher profits, and lower costs to consumers. Obviously, men will not struggle to progress when they do not have to. Price fixing is bound to lower the standard of living of the American people in a degree commensurate with its effectiveness.

Prices proposed by the Bituminous Coal Division are an attempt to subsidize the uneconomic coal producer out of the pockets of coal consumers. In other words, the proposed price level is sufficiently high so that the inefficient mines can sell at a profit. This is an obvious case of strengthening the weak by weakening the strong. The price-fixing authority vested in the Bituminous Coal Division is sufficient cause alone for immediate revision or repeal of this law. But there are other sad chapters in this tragedy which must be considered.

CONSUMERS

Let us consider for a moment the effect the Bituminous Coal Act has on the consuming public. A cursory review indicates emphatically that this legislation benefits one small economic group at the expense of others. No one can deny that the consumers of coal will be obliged to pay an uneconomic coal bill when the proposed high-price schedule is finally established. Of course, the bituminous industry itself may profit temporarily, but the country as a whole will be worse off immediately, and eventually even the soft-coal industry will suffer a reaction from this vicious statute. If more consumers' dollars must be spent for coal from now on, there will obviously be less for other commodities. This is purely selfish, one-sided legislation. It must be said to the credit of most coal operators that they thoroughly agree with me on this point.

Large coal consumers are prepared today to purchase or lease their own mines in order to escape the restrictions of this coal act. I predict that your largest consumers will own or lease their own mines in the near future if the proposed price schedules are validated. The Roosevelt administration has declared war on monopoly. In this instance they are fostering monopoly with the full force of Federal law.

Let me use a specific example of the effect of this act on the coal consumers of America. The proposed price schedule will increase the cost of coal $1 per ton in the so-called quad cities of Illinois. These cities are Moline, East Moline, Rock Island, and Davenport. The coal bill in this area will be increased by $500,000 annually. There are other examples in the records which show that coal will cost 70 cents per ton more in one community than in a neighboring community. If various area outlines are strictly adhered to, coal will actually cost a different price at different entrances of the same factory.

I realize that the consumers of America are willing to assume their full responsibility in restoring balance to our economic order. They are not willing to be penalized, however, for futile and extravagant experiments of this kind. Such a fundamental necessity as coal should never be made the guinea pig for bureaucratic research. I submit that with half the world in flames and with our own security threatened, the money being wasted on the Bituminous Coal Act should be spent on our national defenses.

COMPETING FUELS

While soft coal is being pink-pilled to death by Mr. Ickes, competing fuels are given free play. It is patently unfair to impede one segment of an industry with restrictions, red tape, and regulations and not apply the same rules to competitors. Coal is strictly regulated if not already controlled; but gas, fuel oil, and hydroelectric power have escaped with full independence and freedom.

Obviously, coal operators will compete at a hopeless disadvantage. They will not be permitted to meet the prices of competing fuels, even though their operating costs would permit them to do so. On the other hand, producers of competing fuels can meet the publicly published and established prices of bituminous coal any time they wish. Pegged coal prices have been established with arrogant disregard of prices at which competing fuels are selling or can be sold. The saddlebags of the coal industry have been loaded with lead. There is nothing fair about that kind of race.

BUREAUCRATIC EDICT

It was apparent to keen observers that untutored political appointees could not save the bituminous-coal industry when men of life-long training had experienced such baffling difficulties. A few examples of absurd bureaucratic regulation will suffice to demonstrate the dangers of governmental meddling with private enterprise.

Since April 1937 coal operators have been prohibited from signing contracts with customers for more than 30 days. This means that coal operators have been proceeding on 30-day schedules. This has increased production and selling costs tremendously. The very essence of successful low-cost production is a long, carefully planned, uninterrupted program. This is largely based on mutually beneficial long-term sales contracts. All this has been scuttled by a handful of Government functionaries.

Here is the second example of debilitating regulation. The Coal Division has decreed that bituminous coal may be sold with the understanding that rebates will be made to customers covering the difference between current prices and the higher established prices if the latter are invalidated at some future day. In other words, the prices to be authorized by the Coal Division will be higher than current selling prices. If the former are declared invalid, a seller may rebate a consumer for the difference. In Indianapolis one large consumer purchases 600,000 tons of coal per year. The present price is 90 cents per ton. Under the proposed price schedules this same grade coal will cost the consumer $1.40 per ton, a difference of 50 cents. The seller, therefore, will be forced by competition to set aside 50 cents per ton to protect his position if the higher price schedule is declared invalid by the courts. That represents the tidy sum of $300,000 a year which the seller must carry in reserve against such a possibility.

A third example may not be superfluous in emphasizing my point. The citizens of many communities have enjoyed the lower transportation costs reflected in water-borne traffic. In fact Uncle Sam has spent millions of dollars in recent years developing our waterways so that these savings might be enjoyed by fortunate consumers in favored areas. Along comes Mr. Ickes with his Bituminous Coal Act and imposes the following decree: Coal must be sold at the same prices in the various marketing areas. Transportation rates into these areas differ and that would result in varying prices, but, obviously, Mr. Ickes cannot trifle with transportation rates. That is the prerogative of the Interstate Commerce Commission. So Mr. Ickes decides to sidestep this obstacle by regulating coal prices at the mine. If you, a consumer, in an area serviced by both water and rail, are in the market for coal and if the water-borne rate is lower than the rail rate, the price at the mine will be increased so that if the coal is shipped by water you, as a consumer, will pay exactly the same as if it were shipped by rail. The coal producer pockets the excess profit. Then to complicate matters further, Mr. Ickes has decided that if a consumer owns his own docks, or if his factory is located within a few yards of the water front, he may still enjoy the benefits of water-borne coal. That, of course, places a premium on real-estate holdings and the luckless consumer who is not fortunate enough to own his own docks or whose factory is not on the water front must pay the higher prices.

Now, what has all this doctoring done to the coal industry? Let the record speak for itself.

In 1936, which was rather a poor year for industry in general, the entire bituminous industry lost $6,524,000. In 1937, which was a good year generally, coal's losses were $37,000,000. This was the first year of the Coal Act. In 1938, the second year of the act, coal's losses mounted to $60,000,000. The 1939 figures, not yet compiled, will approximate 1938. Remember, the bituminous-coal industry is being taxed 1 cent per ton to support this death-dealing law. They are paying for the noose which will hang them.

BUREAUCRACY

I cannot leave you without a few parting shots at the bureaucratic system of government which is developing so rapidly in Washington. The time has come for us in America to either fish or cut bait. We are either going to progress under a democratic system of free enterprise or we are going to retrogress into some devastating form of socialism. Our economy cannot exist half free and half regimented.

Patrick Henry once said:

"I have but one lamp by which my feet are guided and that is the lamp of experience. I know no way of judging the future but by the past."

If the bituminous-coal industry had only walked down the path of experience and read the warning signs which dot the way, it would never have surrendered its independence to bureaucratic control. There is nothing temporary about the legislation which we have just been discussing. When bureaucrats have once wrapped their tentacles around a free institution, the tendency is to tighten the grip. Bureaucrats die hard. Once established they seek to perpetuate themselves, and to spread their sphere of influence. For every ounce of security we gain from bureaucracy, we lose 10 pounds of freedom. This has always been true in the past; it holds good today and for the future. When bureaucrats fail to regulate, they do not confess their inadequacy but they demand full control. That is exactly what is happening with respect to bituminous-coal legislation.

It must be obvious to a student of this problem that the enactment of a mere statute can never save the coal industry. Experienced men operating according to natural economic laws alone can do that. Most coal operators have found that their previous problems were comparatively light compared with the onerous burdens heaped on them by this ill-advised statute. Literally, a swarm of functionaries block, check, trip, and tackle a coal operator in every move he tries to make today.

Listen to this formidable list of salary-drawers who are fattening themselves at the expense of the coal industry: Lawyers, statisticians, coordinators, experts, tabulators, stenographers, receptionists, directors, enforcement agents, helpers, field agents, doorkeepers, messengers, office boys, commissioners, private secretaries, assistant secretaries, assistant statisticians, assistant attorneys, assistant coordinators, special assistants, committee members, board members, chemists, analysts, engineers, computers, file clerks, rate clerks, price clerks, cost clerks, supply clerks, chief clerks, clerks, division chiefs, bureau heads, assistant chiefs, auditors, advisers, technical advisers, legal advisers, traffic advisers, special advisers, accountants, chief accountants, chief statisticians, telephone operators, inspectors, policemen, samplers, watchmen, etc. This reminds me of the old saying:

"The big fleas have little fleas
Upon their backs to bite them;
The little fleas have lesser fleas
And so on ad infinitum."

You will admit that even a good broken-field runner would have a tough time plunging through that formidable opposition.

It was not necessary for the bituminous-coal industry to yield its free prerogative to the Federal Government. Some years ago professional baseball was experiencing difficult times. They decided to clean up their own mess. They appointed their own administrator. From that time on that industry progressed in an orderly, honorable, and profitable manner. At about the same time, the motion-picture industry was sinking into disrepute. It needed a good house cleaning. It did not rush to Uncle Sam and plead for a life preserver. It likewise appointed its own administrator in the person of Will Hays, and since that time it has regulated its own affairs so successfully that the motion-picture industry today is one of the greatest in America and one which is contributing much to our culture as well as our amusement.

I feel very emphatic about this whole problem. In my opinion, we have taken the first step away from the tried and tested American system of free enterprise. In our struggle to amend or repeal the Bituminous Coal Act we are waging the battle of democracy versus socialism. Make no mistake about that. The men engaged in the bituminous-coal industry are capable of regulating their own affairs if given the opportunity. The cooperation of the Government is requested; its overlordship is rightfully denied. In closing, may I leave with you a few words of wisdom from the lips of Justice Brandeis:

"Experience should teach us to be more on our guard to protect our liberties when the Government's purposes are beneficent. The greatest dangers to liberty lurk in insidious encroachment by men of zeal, well-meaning, but without understanding."

The Social Program and National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CAROLINE O'DAY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 6, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM LABOR

Mrs. O'DAY. Mr. Speaker, in the present crisis, when all of us are deeply concerned over the question of national defense, we must not forget, in talking of ships and guns, of tanks and airplanes, the most important part of our program.

Given time and money, we can build ships and planes, we can turn out guns and tanks; but unless we have a united nation, strong and stout of heart, these preparations will be useless.

We talk of Trojan horses, of fingerprinting and registering aliens, but the actual danger from such influences would be nothing if there was no discontent for it to feed upon.

Our social program is as much a part of national defense as our arms. Other nations have found this so. Recently there was an editorial in Labor which I hope all of you read. It makes the point I am trying to bring home to you far better than can any words of mine. With your permission, I am including it in my remarks today.

A little woman from the plains of Saskatchewan who, with her husband and five children, had been on relief for 6 years, faced the Members of the Canadian House of Commons in Ottawa last week and delivered a speech which is a challenge to the rulers of all democratic countries. Labor was probably the only newspaper in the United States which printed the story.

"Poverty is the greatest of all subversive elements," said Mrs. Nielsen, only woman Member of the House of Commons, after she had described the desperate condition of her neighbors on the western prairies.

In Canada, as in the United States, the authorities are on the alert, and very properly so, to suppress the so-called "fifth columnists"—the traitors in our own household.

The danger is that in our search for spies and saboteurs we will make the mistake that other democracies have made and fail to recognize that no scheme for national defense is worth the paper on which it is written unless hungry men and women, able and willing to work, are given jobs at decent wages.

We must have tanks and airplanes and battleships to guard against foreign invasion. Every sensible American is for that. But to operate those engines of destruction we must have strong arms, clear brains, and loyal hearts.

And yet there are those among us who contend that we must slow up our relief program and neglect the human beings on whom our preparedness program is dependent.

It would be a tragic mistake to heed these unwise counselors. Real jobs at real wages for our millions of unemployed still constitute America's supreme problem No. 1.

Of course, a considerable number of unemployed may be absorbed in the industries which are busy with the tasks of preparedness. That will be especially true if we do not make the blunder of lengthening hours and if we keep wages sufficiently high to provide workers with desperately needed buying power.

The installation of the 30-hour week in all war industries without reduction in pay would be one of the smartest things we could do at this time.

The hundreds of thousands of skilled mechanics now idle would be assured jobs. Production would be speeded up immensely and the resultant increase in purchasing power would give new life to every other industry in the land.

Over the desk of every responsible public official and of every employer who desires to serve his country in this crisis should be emblazoned Mrs. Nielsen's words: "Poverty is the greatest of all subversive influences." Put men and women to work and the problem of cleaning out "fifth columnists" will be infinitely easier.

Work Training Program of National Youth Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROSS A. COLLINS

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 6, 1940

STATEMENT BY HON. AUBREY WILLIAMS, NATIONAL YOUTH ADMINISTRATOR

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, greatly increased production of implements of war of the 1940 variety is imperative if our country must meet any first-class nation in armed conflict. Only limited production is possible until hundreds of thousands of young men and women can be given training in the mechanical and industrial arts. It behooves us, therefore, to consider such training as the foremost need of the moment. It is with much pleasure, therefore, that I commend to the Congress and the country the very sensible statement of Hon. Aubrey Williams, National Youth Administrator, appearing in a news release by him dated June 4, 1940:

"The National Youth Administration is preparing to expand its work-training program in the fields of shop and production workers to provide 450,000 or more young men and women with basic mechanical training," N. Y. A. Administrator Aubrey Williams said today.

Pointing out that N. Y. A. has been carrying on an extensive program of shop, metal, and construction work for several years, Williams announced results of an occupational survey of N. Y. A. employment as of May 20. This survey showed 90,067 youth employed in 43 different industrial occupations, and 32,475 production workers employed in operations ranging from sewing and canning to quarry work and woodcutting. In addition, the survey showed 96,994 in clerical and other service work, including 2,000 bakers, butchers, cooks, and chefs; 24,770 agricultural and conservation workers; 17,388 professional and technical workers; and 17,970 unskilled laborers.

A group of key executives from private industry will confer tomorrow with Mr. Williams at his office here on ways and means to effect a rapid expansion of N. Y. A. work training and how to obtain quickly the necessary plants, machinery, and other facilities for the larger program contemplated in the President's noncombatant-training program for 1,000,000 civilians.

Williams said that he was moving immediately to shift as many N. Y. A. workers as possible into mechanical projects without delaying until after Congress acts on the President's request for additional money to expand this training.

State administrators and field executives have been summoned to the Washington office during the last 2 weeks to develop information as to the possible extent of this expanded program. Williams said he had been informed that some of the larger resident centers, including those at Quoddy Village, Maine, now employing 525; South Charleston, W. Va., now employing 400; and Algiers, La., now employing 450, could double their employment and training within 60 days, if additional money is made available quickly. This would involve putting on extra shifts and using the present shops and equipment during part of the nights, as well as in the daytime. Williams pointed out that employment could be doubled similarly in the 1,061 local N. Y. A. workshops, and the 1,000 shops owned by public cosponsors in which N. Y. A. youth are employed.

"The national-defense program has brought a tremendous demand from young people for elementary training of the sort we provide on our projects," Williams said. "Industrialists, businessmen, and other employers have come forward with offers to give to us surplus or semiobsolete machinery, valuable for training purposes but no longer used in their plants. Texas State Fair officials, for instance, have offered N. Y. A. temporary use of their numerous permanent buildings until better arrangements can be made," he said.

"During the past winter the National Youth Administration gave mechanical ability tests to 13,638 young men working in 590 shops in 43 States, which showed a high degree of mechanical ability among this group of needy young people. I cite this because it shows that in the group of young people who have not the resources to attend present trade-mechanical schools, there is a great untapped reservoir which should be directed into mechanical pursuits of great value to the Nation," Williams said.

"Of the total tested 6,466 made scores which showed a strong probability that they would be successful in metal and mechanical work, if given adequate training," Williams said. "The tests standardized by the Navy and the Tennessee Valley Authority were given to our workers in airplane and auto mechanics, blacksmithing, drafting, electrical, forging and foundry, machine shop, plumbing, steamfitting, welding, and woodworking shops. We are immediately inaugurating a program of issuing these tests to be given to all youth on our projects where mechanical work is being done. This should enable us in a few months to put our hands upon the individuals who are the best possibilities for mechanical work.

"Starting nearly 2 years ago, the National Youth Administration has been conducting surveys of the costs and possibilities of wider training in mechanical pursuits. Within the last 2 weeks we have dug out of our files a great deal of valuable material dealing with equipment and programs already prepared. Our field people in recent months have canvassed many of the States, exploring the possibilities and actually inaugurating the new development of radio, aviation, and other shops.

"N. Y. A. provides bona fide work on a part-time basis, tied in with elementary related training, and the development of work habits, work discipline, and such essential knowledge as blueprint reading. The work is actual production of socially useful goods, most of which are used locally by charitable and public institutions. We have found that this work experience is what employers want their new employees to have. It also enables young people to learn for themselves what they want to do, and what they can do best.

"N. Y. A. has been aided and advised in its program and in its efforts to induct youth into industry by State and local advisory committees in nearly all communities. These committees are made up of local leaders in business, industry, government, education, labor, and other walks of life. We propose to expand the activities of these committees and to concentrate their efforts upon the job of arranging for the placement of semiskilled young people from our program in the industries where they will be most useful.

"N. Y. A. for the last 2 years has been promoting the development, with local cooperation of classes and other instruction in citizenship, an activity which will be expanded under this program as an essential of national defense.

"Similarly, N. Y. A. has developed through State and local cooperation health programs especially in the fields of preventive medicine, TB control and venereal disease testing along with efforts to provide medical and dental care for its workers. This also should be expanded as a defense measure. Through the resident center or camp type of operation N. Y. A. has had a long experience of success in increasing the general health of youth from underprivileged and low income families."

Let Us Have Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLIFF CLEVENGER
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 6, 1940

Mr. CLEVENGER. Mr. Speaker, our mail is full of letters from anxious fathers and mothers of American boys expressing concern over the probable involvement of America in the European holocaust now in progress.

The radio and press carry today the Italian reaction to American intervention in the contemplated action of the Fascist dictator in the present war.

Of course, following former speeches about quarantine of nations whose ideologies were different than ours, and the denouncing of European and Asiatic dictators, it would seem that we have the very opposite of a good-neighbor policy in the conduct of our foreign affairs.

Just where are our friends? Just where is our strength, economic or military, to enable us to challenge these disciples of force? Is a record of spending almost twice our income for 8 years an element of strength in this crisis? My party has voted to stay in session during this critical time—it is ready to remain here, ready to meet every need in our national defense. It has gone on record against blank checks, against the delegation of the few remaining powers of the legislative branch of our Government, since the Executive now has gotten control of the judicial. Must we leave our posts here in Washington and go home and confess to these importuning fathers and mothers that their Representatives can tell them nothing, do nothing, assure them of nothing concerning the things that threaten the security of America?

Have the solutions of domestic problems been so successful under 7 years of the New Deal that we want to just turn over our national defense to them, sign blank checks, and go home?

Can we give them any real assurance that these precious billions now to be added to the crushing load of public debt will do the job and give them the security for which they pray? Can we be sure that the results to be obtained by these new dealers will justify the passage of the onerous tax bill that we must pass this next week? We should remain here at our posts and, outnumbered as we are, deserted by almost all of the forces for economy on the majority side, fight for the assurance of national defense, economic security, and the observance of national neutrality—a real American policy. Let us have peace.

I am including as a part of my remarks the following editorial from the Chicago Tribune of June 5.

FOREIGN POLICY

Senator PEPPER, of Florida, an administration stalwart, gave an intimation in the debate on Monday of the tactics which Mr. Roosevelt has employed in his effort to dissuade Mussolini from entering the war. For some time now it has been rumored that Mr. Roosevelt had told Mussolini that America would go in on the side of England and France if Italy went in on the side of Germany. Senator PEPPER's remarks were not free of ambiguity, but they tended to confirm the rumor.

Constitutionally, of course, the President cannot declare war, but he does direct the Nation's foreign policy and can go far to lead the country into war. The people of the United States in 1916 wanted to stay out of war, but Mr. Wilson, without their knowledge, was already committed in a secret document to participation to prevent a German victory; a few months later we were in.

It is profitable to speculate on what might have happened if Mr. Wilson had been less determined in 1916 to reshape the world to his own formula. If the allies had not been encouraged by him to continue the conflict, Europe might have had a peace of adjustment which could not have been less durable than the peace of Versailles and might have been far more stable. A million lives or more and tens of billions of dollars would have been saved, the Russian revolution would have been avoided, and the post-war economic adjustments would have been far less difficult.

We should have learned from that experience that America can fight in Europe's wars but cannot dictate the terms of peace. Accordingly, however well meant our interventions may be, they are not likely to prove of much value to us. If our foreign policy is directed, as it has been of late, toward maintaining a certain balance of power in Europe, we shall be drawn again and again into Europe at a cost wholly disproportionate to any advantages we are likely to obtain from our sacrifices.

America's foreign policy should be devised with a view primarily to the welfare of Americans. It is not true, as the colonially minded often assert, that such a policy must be narrowly selfish and therefore injurious to the rest of the world. No other nation would be hurt if, for example, the West Indian Islands were transferred, as they should be, from foreign control. The islands in themselves have little commercial value. We could not use them as a base for offensive operations. The cession of the islands would promote peace by preventing any foreign power from using them against us.

Under Mr. Roosevelt our foreign policy, instead of being directed at such practical objectives, has been provocative. We have succeeded in irritating the Japanese by such proposals as the project to fortify Guam, and if these provocations are continued we shall some day find ourselves obliged to fight under disadvantageous conditions or to confess we were bluffing.

Senator PEPPER's intimation of the direction taken of late by our diplomacy in Europe is another evidence of recklessness in the handling of foreign affairs. Having encouraged the Japanese to regard us as an enemy, we are now encouraging the Germans, Italians, and Russians to take the same view of us. In short, we are inviting Asia and Europe to choose their moment to join in an assault upon us.

It cannot be pretended that this kind of thing benefits anybody. In 1916 it prolonged the conflict and in 1939 it may have encouraged England and France to enter upon a highly destructive war in the expectation that we should shortly be in it on their side.

America needs an American foreign policy. Without it, as Senator LODGE said the other day, our preparations for defense are bound to be inadequate because no one knows what we are preparing to defend.

Commencement Address at Massachusetts College of Pharmacy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KNUTE HILL
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 6, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. KNUTE HILL, OF WASHINGTON

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me on June 5:

President Ellis, Dean Newton, members of the board of trustees; members of the faculty, graduates, parents, and friends: I deem it a high privilege and distinct honor to be permitted to address you on this, to you, auspicious occasion. Especially to you who have completed your course here at the Massachusetts College of Pharmacy is this a red-letter day in your lives. It is truly commencement for you, and I heartily congratulate you on having so successfully overcome the obstacles and difficulties leading up to the threshold of real and active participation in the duties of your chosen field of endeavor. Commencement. Often during my early boyhood I considered that a misnomer—to call the completion of the college course commencement. But I fully realized after getting my law degree from Wisconsin University that it was really the beginning of cooperation with and service to those who travel along on life's highway. I am ever interested in the youth of this Nation. Close association with it keeps me young in spirit, keeps me liberal and progressive in thought, and keeps fresh and unsullied my faith in humanity. You young men and women, together with the hundreds of thousands of June graduates throughout the country represent the hope of democracy in the United States.

To my mind there are three great pillars which constitute the foundation for our modern structure of civilization—the home, the church, the school. All three are essential to the progress, the success, and the happiness of our people. Too often today is the sancity of the home threatened by loose living, by too cheap movies, and by too lax divorce laws. The church, too, is losing its former influence. Especially is it waning in the country hamlets and villages. This may be due to the easy access to better sermons and better music over the radio and modern roads which have annihilated distances. However, both parents and preachers still have their part to play in the rearing of our youth, and the schools must supplement and cooperate with these other two prime factors in the protection and education of our young men and young women. It is the peculiar function of teachers to aid these young men and young women to think for themselves, to discover new facts and use life's tools with the greatest amount of efficiency. That makes for good, sturdy citizenship thereby making the home more secure, the church more influential, and the schools more inspiring. Because I believe that the fathers and mothers, the sons and daughters of America today are more concerned about these peacetime pursuits of democracy than in the wartime marching and salutes of dictatorships, I want to discuss with you today the destiny of democracy. We must not minimize the threat to democracy in these serious days, and must build up an adequate defense; but the greatest defense of democracy at all times is to keep its fires burning brightly in the hearts and souls of our American people.

DEMOCRACY'S DESTINY

More than 300 years ago on the rock-bound coast of the Atlantic, not far from this historic city of Boston, landed the Pilgrim Fathers from their little bark, the Mayflower. As a protest against the denial of the rights of democracy, they left their native shores to seek a new home in the wilderness of a New World. The autocrats of England were still unmindful of the real meaning of Runnymede and Magna Carta, thereby driving from their midst those men and women whose courage and wisdom would have been an invaluable asset for the establishment of democracy in old England.

Plymouth Colony of 1620, together with the earlier Jamestown Colony of 1607, though quite different in outer form, mark the beginning of democracy in the Western Hemisphere. Too often during our colonial period did the spirit of intolerance raise its mailed fist to strike at the infant democracy—as witness the persecution of Roger Williams and the reign of Governor Berkeley. But this is the price we pay for progress in government as well as in science: Obstacles to overcome, difficulties to surmount, prejudices to conquer. Despite the almost overwhelming odds against its survival, so well was the spirit of democracy nurtured by the early fathers that it grew to be the dominating issue in the colonial period leading up to the Revolution. The spirit of democracy is best expressed in Jefferson's immortal document, the Declaration of Independence. Though it may seem rather trite to quote from this great American classic to you who reside in the city where the famous tea party took place, still I deem it quite proper in these serious days to so do. Listen to these principles as everlasting as the hills, as imperishable as the sun, and as permanent as time itself: "We hold these truths to be self-evident: That all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness"; and here may I emphasize the fact that the rights enumerated by Jefferson are human rights, not property rights. We all believe in property rights; they are a part of our plan of living. We love our individual homes and take pride in our various forms of industry. But "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" take precedence over these and too often have been subjected to the tyranny of property rights. In a democracy this is unethical and intolerable. We must place first things first and get a true perspective.

"That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new government, laying its foundations on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness." How radical this sounds; yet how fundamentally sound in a government where the people are the real sovereigns, the officials merely public servants, and the form and framework of that government is subject to complete change in an orderly and constitutional way by the people through their duly elected representatives. This is the essence of democracy—this is the spirit that cannot die. These principles so splendidly enunciated by Thomas Jefferson and adopted by the Continental Congress of 1776 were worth fighting for, were worth dying for. Therefore, these men of 1776 concluded their declaration with these sublime sentiments: "And for the support of this declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor."

There followed 8 long years of patient and heroic effort, of heart-rending struggle, of almost hopeless struggle. Having saved democracy through revolution the wise and patriotic men of those days enshrined this living, pulsing spirit in a grand and noble edifice—the Constitution of the United States—to inspire and guide the coming generations. This instrument is a fitting temple in which to house our common faith, our common heritage. Gladstone, the grand old man of England, said concerning the Constitution: "It is the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man."

What is this firm foundation upon which our governmental structure has been reared? Again may I quote—this time the preamble of the Constitution: "We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America." To safeguard democracy the 13 weak, quarreling, and helpless Colonies were willing to yield some of their sovereign powers to a central authority, responsible to all the people, not to some individual States. Listen: "We, the people of the United States—do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America." Yet three-quarters of a century later, some States questioned this constitutional provision and only the wisdom and the courage and the patience of the martyred Lincoln could save the Union.

Even today there are those who prate of States' rights, when modern transportation, modern communication, and modern discoveries and inventions necessitate a stronger union than ever. The destiny of democracy is wrapped up in a strong union with a constant adherence to the six purposes expressed in the preamble. This preamble is the alpha of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights, the first 10 amendments, guaranteeing liberty of speech, of press, and of peaceable assemblage, is the omega of the Constitution. However great and good this foundation and framework of our governmental structure is, it is subject to modification and change, the same as our physical bodies. It has been amended in the past, and it will be amended in the future to meet modern conditions and demands. But the spirit of democracy is as changeless and immutable as the soul of man. It must be protected, preserved, and made to permeate the remotest parts of the earth. That is our job. Even as Israel of old was given the Ark of the Covenant to cherish and protect, so we Americans have been intrusted with the ship of state bearing the sacred fires of liberty, equality, and justice. While democracies of Europe and Asia are tottering to their ruin and dictatorships are riding to victory through carnage and ruthlessness and reckless madness, we must keep our heads clear and our feet on the ground. What a sad commentary on our boasted modern civilization and Christianity that nations do not sit down around a common conference table to reason out their international difficulties but revert instead to the old methods of savagery and the jungle.

Must we again assume the role we played with such futility in the last World War? The slogan was, "Let us make the world safe for democracy." Did we? Look at Europe today and tell me that the Old World is safe for democracy when she lies there ravished and wretched, helpless and well-nigh hopeless on present-day Flanders Field. Can we, dare we, again join in this terrible holocaust across the Atlantic? The manifest destiny of democracy is to prevail and be a blessing to all mankind. If entrance into this second World War would accomplish this, then I would say with all my heart: No matter what the cost, it is our duty to ourselves, to the peoples of the world, and to the spirit of democracy itself to go in. But to my mind the only way to "make the world safe for democracy" is to first "make America safe for democracy."

This we can best do by frankly facing our own very serious domestic problems and earnestly making a firm determination to definitely and permanently solve them. "Put your house in order lest the day of reckoning come upon you." Had the nations of Europe set their houses in order, had they shown more of the brotherhood of man, had they practiced more of charity and justice toward one another in their international dealings, there could now be no real cause for the devastating war raging through the lands and on the seas and in the air.

We have during the past 2 weeks enacted legislation for huge defense purposes and mobilizing our industries for production purposes. I am heartily for this program. It is not just as necessary, however, to appropriate billions for defense against unemployment, against poverty, against injustices which permit one-third of our population to remain "ill-fed, ill-clad, and ill-housed"?

Today more than ever we must guard against again being deceived or deceiving ourselves as we were in 1917 by overwrought sympathy, false propaganda, and war hysteria. It is our duty to build up an adequate defense against any foreign dictatorship or group of dictatorships but also our duty to keep ourselves out of the unchristian, ungodly, unholy carnage now going on across the Atlantic.

When the war-mad world becomes war weary and war worn and wiser, it can then find a starting place again for Christianity and civilization We can then insist on a peace conference which will promise a permanent peace throughout the whole world. We can by example prove to all these nations that a peacetime constructive program is far better than a wartime destructive pagent. I say this sincerely, I say this earnestly. I say it because I deeply feel that we Americans have been entrusted with the most sacred duty and privilege ever allotted to any people—to guard, to cherish, to protect democracy until an insane world is again ready to follow the paths of peace and practice the principles of justice, tolerance, and equity that alone can "make the world safe for democracy." To this end let us consecrate "our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor."

Democracy! Where we cheerfully abide by majority rule. Where ability, honesty, and perseverance are rewarded. Where personal liberty means "the largest opportunity to be and to do the best that is in you." Where science, invention, and education are nurtured. Where the people are the sovereigns and the officials are public servants. Where "the greatest good to the greatest number" is the slogan. Where we thoroughly believe in Teddy Roosevelt's splendid sentiment: "This country in the long run will not be a good place for any one of us to live in unless and until it is a good place for all of us to live in."

America holds the destiny of democracy in its keeping. Let us guard it well, nourish it constantly, and cherish it forever.

May I commend for your thoughtful and earnest consideration the words of Bishop G. Ashton Oldham in his America First:

"AMERICA FIRST

"Not merely in matters material but in things of the spirit.

"Not merely in science, inventions, motors, and skyscrapers but also in ideals, principles, character.

"Not merely in the calm assertion of rights but in the glad assumption of duties.

"Not flaunting her strength as a giant but bending in helpfulness over a sick and wounded world like a good Samaritan.

"Not in splendid isolation but in courageous cooperation for world peace.

"Not in pride, arrogance, and disdain of other races and peoples but in sympathy, love, and understanding.

"Not in treading again the old, worn, bloody pathway which ends inevitably in chaos and disaster but in blazing a new trail along which, please God, other nations will follow into the new Jerusalem, where wars shall be no more.

"Some day some nation must take that path, unless we are to lapse once again into utter barbarism, and that honor I covet for my beloved America.

"And so, in that spirit and with these hopes, I say with all my heart and soul, 'America first'."

The New Jersey Campaign

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. W. WARREN BARBOUR

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 6 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. WALTER E. EDGE

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, last Tuesday, June 4, my very dear friend, Hon. Walter E. Edge, former United States Senator, Governor, and Ambassador to France, delivered a very able address at the Republican State convention at Trenton, N. J. I ask unanimous consent that the address be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

At the opening convention last Tuesday we were all heartened with the impressive and general display of harmony. The primary struggle, only a week old, was water over the dam, and the forces lead by former Governor Hoffman indicated in no uncertain terms that there would be no "fifth column" within the legions of the Republican Party.

With the adoption of the Republican platform, all the preliminaries have been disposed of, and we are now preparing with closed ranks to open the campaign.

My role today, therefore, requires a frank and very brief discussion of the practical methods through which to approach the first line of defense as presented by our opponents. I will not discuss issues. They should be left to our nominees, Bob Hendrickson for Governor, and WARREN BARBOUR returning to the United States Senate, both in every way thoroughly equipped for their responsibilities. I will confine my informal talk to a brief review of the activities of our Democratic opponents who were wished on New Jersey through orders from the White House.

Mr. Edison, the son of a distinguished and revered Jerseyman, now Secretary of the Navy, has been selected as the Democratic candidate for Governor.

Mr. "Jimmy" Cromwell, a recent resident of New Jersey, has been named as Senator BARBOUR's opponent for the United States Senate.

Neither of these gentlemen had any primary opposition, as that is forbidden under the dictatorial control of Boss Hague, of Jersey City. In other words, no other aspirants dared run. For many years past in Democratic circles the so-called free and open primary has been a hollow mockery.

However, this is a Presidential year, and Mr. Hague was greatly assisted in the selection of his State ticket by the President of the United States. Both Mr. Edison and Mr. Cromwell occupied Federal positions of great responsibility. The former is still Secretary of the Navy, in these trying days clearly the most important Federal post, excepting only the Presidency of the United States. Mr. Cromwell was United States Minister to Canada. He, however, was apparently asked to resign, while Mr. Edison still holds on.

Secretary Edison very frankly and, I think, very properly, suggested in the press 2 weeks ago that he recognized the incompatibility of being the Secretary of the Navy, with the great responsibilities of that office, and its control of the expenditure of billions of dollars, and at the same time being a political candidate for the Governorship of New Jersey. As I recall the statement, Mr. Edison indicated his intention of resigning within 30 days. I noticed in the public press only a few days ago that he would now probably remain as Secretary of the Navy until June 30, which would, of course, extend his original 30 days for some considerable period.

I do not want to be technical about this situation. If Mr. Edison, with his engineering background, was an ideally equipped man for the Secretaryship of the Navy, as he must have been, or surely the President would not have appointed him, then in these days, with the war brought almost to our very door, he should remain Secretary of the Navy. That would be his duty as a patriotic American citizen. On the other hand, if for any reason he does not measure up to his present job, then he should not be wished on New Jersey. The governorship of our great State is much too important to be bartered by designing political bosses. In other words, if he is not good enough to hold down the Navy job he certainly is not good enough to be Governor of New Jersey.

Do not misunderstand me. We do not fear Mr. Edison's candidacy. Quite the contrary. Mr. Edison, estimable citizen as he is, has never to my knowledge had the slightest background of service or experience to fit him to assume this great office. I know little about his engineering or technical qualifications. He must possess them or the President would not have designated him to be Secretary of the Navy. Should he patriotically remain in that most important position, Mr. Hague would of course designate some other New Deal stalwart, as he is listening to Mr. Roosevelt these days, and the campaign would proceed just the same. So it cannot be intimated that the observations I have made are from any standpoint either of fear or of any effort to make Bob Hendrickson's campaign a run-away.

As to Mr. Cromwell, I have known him for years. He has charm. He has personality, and, incidentally, he has a considerable amount of money.

I noticed that in his address before the Democratic convention a week ago, as reported in the press, he very carefully discussed two of his former activities—birth control and his criticism of the American Legion. I naturally assume he reviewed these two interesting topics so that they might possibly be removed from the campaign. However, I was still more interested to realize that he failed entirely to touch upon one of his pet theories, a readjustment of Federal taxation. There is no more important subject than taxation and its present relationship to business development and unemployment.

Mr. Cromwell appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives when that committee was considering a revision of the revenue laws. The hearings were held during January 1938, and the testimony appears in detail in House documents. I have read that testimony with much interest. As a matter of fact, I do not disagree with Mr. Cromwell's objective—if I understand it to be a reduction of taxation on industry in order that the latter may be encouraged to expand and thus decrease unemployment.

However, Mr. Cromwell in his testimony stated without qualification that he proposed the repeal or elimination of all the existing estate and inheritance taxes, also all of the individual and corporation income taxes, which, if added to the so-called excise taxes, have produced an income to the Government, based on the figures of 1937, of something over $5,000,000,000, or, if the excise taxes were eliminated, something over two and one-half billion dollars.

Mr. Cromwell's substitute for these taxes was what he termed a "manufacturer's sales tax." In the course of his testimony before the committee he indicated that to the best of his knowledge the wholesale value of manufactured products sold in 1929 was in the neighborhood of $26,000,000,000. It was soon pointed out by members of the committee that if this was the sole substitute after the elimination of inheritance, corporation, and other income taxes, it would require a sales tax in the neighborhood of 20 percent in order to make up the $5,000,000,000 lost, or 10 percent if the present excise tax were continued.

Mr. Cromwell, in exploiting his theory, went further, and, again without qualification, stated that he would have no exemptions on the character of commodities to be taxed. In fact, the question was asked by a member of the committee, "Would you have the same rate on bread and meat as on, for instance, cigarettes and whisky?" Mr. Cromwell replied, "Yes."

In other words, there would be absolutely no exemption on medicine, staples, and necessities of life, but every consumer would pay the 10- or 20-percent sales tax on every purchase he made, no matter what might be his capacity to pay. Such a system, because of the elimination of most other taxes, would seem very much like transferring the burden of raising necessary governmental revenues from the wealthy to the less wealthy; in other words, completely ignoring the present policy of basing taxes on ability or capacity to pay.

New Jersey has had its experience with the sales tax, and I doubt its popularity here. I am quite sure the electorate of New Jersey will be interested as the campaign progresses in having Mr. Cromwell enlarge on this theory, if he still believes in it.

This is a Presidential year. I listened, as no doubt thousands of other American citizens did, to the President's so-called fireside chat a few nights back. This followed the abortive effort to weaken Republicans, a month before their convention, by calling in the 1936 standard bearers on the plea of national unity.

With the unselfish support of Republicans, as well as Democrats, and without any division in his rush-defense program, I had hoped to hear a message that would have inspired a further display of frank cooperation and nonpartisanship. However, the burden of the entire talk appeared to be an effort to defend Mr. Roosevelt's 7 years as to defense preparation as compared to the equipment of the Army and Navy when he took office in March 1933.

Naturally, the Army and Navy were at the lowest ebb at that time. The entire effort of both Republicans and Democrats in those days was toward disarmament. One conference after another had been held or proposed with the hope that there would be no recurrence of the horrible World War days, and all were convinced the surest way of bringing about continued peace was international disarmament. Unfortunately, that effort failed.

It is startling just to think that in these trying times the President of the United States would try to make it appear by comparison that he had made tremendous advancement in the procurement of Army and Navy equipment. He had to admit in his fireside chat that much of the equipment he claimed for both the Army and Navy was not at hand but on order.

These are not days for that type of evasion, and the patriotic members of the Republican Party are entitled to a franker and more generous exposé of conditions from the Chief Executive of the land.

Again, there is his patronizing of labor and his insistence that social advances already made should not be interfered with in his speed-up program. In my judgment, such a statement was not in place in that message. I believe a large proportion of patriotic labor in this country, with the war at our very door, are quite prepared to temporarily at least give up any advantages they may possess and enlist with capital, agriculture, and all other classes of citizenship, as Great Britain is doing, and give their all in the interest of national defense. It is an insult to labor to put them in a segregated class by themselves.

In a few days the Republican National Convention will select its standard bearers for President and Vice President of the United States. Following the convention in Philadelphia, Mr. Roosevelt will direct the Democratic convention to be held in Chicago whom they are to nominate, himself or a crown prince. In the meantime, Mr. Edison and Mr. Cromwell, fresh from New Deal membership, and apparently exponents of New Deal principles, have been presented to New Jersey by the Roosevelt-Hague combination as the Democratic candidates for the two high and powerful offices of Governor and Senator.

New Jersey, if I do not misunderstand the discriminating ability of its electorate, will select its own Governor and its own United States Senator, free from New Deal taint, free from the Hague-Roosevelt dictatorship, and free to serve and save the people of New Jersey from those catastrophes.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 6 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

RESOLUTIONS OF THE AMERICAN LEGION POST OF BURLINGTON, N. C.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD resolutions adopted by the American Legion Post at Burlington, N. C., one in relation to the air power, in which mention is made of Gen. William Mitchell, and the other in reference to aliens. I should like to have the resolutions prefaced by a letter from the Honorable Thomas D. Cooper, a prominent attorney of Burlington, N. C., who is a member of the American Legion.

There being no objection, the letter and resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BURLINGTON, N. C., June 1, 1940.

Hon. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR BOB: I take this opportunity, Bob, to congratulate you upon your well-known position concerning aliens in this country. You led off with proper warnings several years ago and I believe that you are going to realize now the fruits of such work. Our people now are beginning to realize the importance of adequate armaments for defense and the importance of the alien situation. I hand you herewith copies of two resolutions which I prepared and which have been adopted with enthusiastic unanimity by members of our local post of our American Legion. Such resolutions are self-explanatory and set forth our position about adequate defense and "fifth column" activities. We propose to uphold your position vigorously, and if I can cooperate with you in any way in support of your vital measures for the interest of our country I hope that you will call upon me.

With personal regards and best wishes, I am,
Sincerely yours,

THOMAS D. COOPER.

Whereas recent world events have shown the demoralizing effect of "fifth column" activities of invading nations; and

Whereas it appears that there are many persons residing in the United States seditiously opposed to our democratic form of government and who have not and apparently do not intend to swear allegiance to our country, but, on the other hand, sympathize with peoples of Nazi Germany, Soviet Russia, and Fascist Italy, in open and unstripped design to invade, plunder, and pillage the smaller and defenseless nations of the world and to overthrow democracy throughout the world: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Walter B. Ellis Post, No. 63, of the American Legion:

1. That this post reiterate and resolve anew to protect and preserve the liberties of the American people and their institutions of free government and to teach and promote true Americanism throughout our land.

2. That this post declare and condemn any un-American activities subversive to our democratic institutions and form of government and call upon the police powers of our city, State, and Nation to canvass, identify, and suppress any individual connected, directly or indirectly, with any activity, alinement, or association antagonistic toward the principles of Americanism and our form of government, and that appropriate action be taken to arrest, deport, disperse, disband, and dissolve any individual or association of individuals conducting or conspiring to conduct activities subversive to our democratic form of government.

3. That all aliens and unnaturalized residents of our city, State, and Nation be called upon forthwith to declare or renounce their true allegiance to the United States of America; and upon their failure so to do, or upon their failure to declare the intention to bear arms if need be, in the defense of our country, that each and every such person be held for immediate deportation.

4. That in the absence of appropriate legal procedure now provided by law, that comprehensive laws be enacted forthwith for swift, sure, and certain punishment for "fifth column" activities of any kind or nature within the United States of America.

5. That this post memorialize State and National headquarters of the American Legion for approval of this resolution, and that the voice of the Legion be raised in demand for appropriate action hereon.

CERTIFICATE

Herndon Taylor, commander, and Herbert W. Wade, adjutant, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of a resolution duly adopted by the Walter B. Ellis Post, No. 63, of the American Legion, in meeting duly assembled at Burlington, N. C., on the 28th day of May 1940.

Whereas it is believed that the United States today is woefully unprepared for war and has refused to heed the advice of its own, the former Brig. Gen. William Mitchell, in his attempt more than 15 years ago to convince the rulers of this Nation that the airplane could do what Germany now is proving it can do; that future aircraft would mount cannon and that the airplane would revolutionize warfare; and

Whereas Congress has since appropriated billions of dollars for battleships and diminishing millions for aircraft, while the generals and admirals directing this Nation's armed services went on their way scoffing the theory of General Mitchell, while the generals and admirals in Germany took his lessons and advice and studied his methods and tactics; and

Whereas it is believed that "the only defense against air power is air power," and it should be made certain that our air force be no longer subordinated to the Army and Navy; and

Whereas it is believed that this Nation is or may shortly be placed in a perilous position on account of war events in Europe: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Walter B. Ellis Post No. 63 of the American Legion:

1. That this post deplores the inertia of those directing this Nation's armed services and inability to foresee and consequent refusal to heed the advice of our own, the former General Mitchell, who commanded the Air Service of the First and Second Armies in the A. E. F., and this post further deplores the arrest, court martial, and suspension from service of General Mitchell approximately 15 years ago.

2. That this post record its position and recommendation to the Commander in Chief of the United States Army and Navy, the President of the United States, for definite and immediate armaments adequate for national defense, and especially for a separate air force superior in number and equipment to any the world now knows or any nation has now planned, and that the cost thereof be not considered, either in dollars or in the ranks and titles of opposing Army and Navy officers.

3. That this post memorialize State and National headquarters of the American Legion for approval of this resolution, and that the voice of the Legion be raised in demand for adequate armaments as herein stated.

Unemployment and Idle Productive Capacity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 6, 1940

ADDRESS OF HON. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY, OF WYOMING

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, it is with sincere appreciation of the opportunity extended me that I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD the very timely and challenging speech of the senior Senator from Wyoming and Chairman of the Temporary National Economic Committee, Hon. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY. Especially do I wish to call the attention of Members to what the Senator has to say about the imperative necessity of our working out the answer to the problem of unemployment and idle productive capacity. He warns that we must not for a moment think that organization of the Nation for defense will be a substitute for this absolutely essential organization of our productive machinery for the full employment of our people and the full use of our productive capacity. That warning should be earnestly heeded by us all.

As we assemble tonight the world is rushing with appalling speed toward what may be the climax of one of the great crises of human history. Certainly no group could be more deeply concerned than this in the meaning of the crowding events of the past few weeks in Europe, not only because the business of insurance men is the protection of life and property, but because as Americans you are interested in the preservation of those ideals of living which have enabled America to attain the highest standard in the history of civilization.

A new political system, based upon an old doctrine of arbitrary power, repudiating all our faith in individual freedom, threatens to engulf the world. This new system rejects not only our ideals of human relations, it also rejects the economic system which is based upon the theory of private property and free enterprise.

It is profoundly encouraging to note the practical unanimity with which the people of America are uniting from end to end of the country to defend what the President has called our American way of life. It is important in these circumstances that we should understand exactly what we mean by the American way of life and that we should try to appraise the causes which have imperiled it.

THE INALIENABLE RIGHT TO WORK

If there is anything distinctive about our system, if there is any mark which differentiates American ideals of political and economic organizations from those of other peoples and other countries, it is that here we hold it to be a self-evident truth that to every individual God has given rights which no other individual or no organization of individuals, whether political or economic, can take away. The right of every man to work and to possess the fruits of his toil, to think his own thoughts, to speak his own mind, and to worship God according to his conscience, constitute the very basis of the American way of life and these are precisely the ideals which are being swept away, together with life and property, in the tragedy which is now being enacted upon European soil.

The founders of our country, when they wrote the Declaration of Independence, mutually pledged to one another their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor to maintain the principles of human freedom upon which they were establishing this Government. I have come here tonight to talk to you because I believe that the preservation of these ideals by our people on this continent constitutes the greatest service that America can perform for a bewildered and tortured world. If we are to succeed in this we must first comprehend that the problems of our time are problems of group or collective activity. It will not do merely to seek a scapegoat on whom to blame our economic ills. Though it is very easy to dramatize and personalize the hardships we are unable to cure, such a course serves only to raise temperature. He makes a mistake, for example, who believes that the European dictators are the cause of the European tragedy. They are only the results of conditions which have not been understood. They are the product of economic causes which have compelled men to turn to government for the solution of the problems of living which had grown too complicated for them to handle by themselves.

The seeds of the present disorder were sown when the Treaty of Versailles was written by the men who were accounted the greatest statesmen of the last generation. They did not intend to produce bloodshed and misery. They and the nations which sent them to Paris were just not wise enough collectively to write and ratify a treaty of peace. The seeds, thus planted, were cultivated by the statesmen who followed during the past 20 years and who lacked the wisdom to establish economic justice in an era which requires a greater degree of cooperation and organization than was ever before needed in all the history of the world.

IMPORTANCE OF GROUP ACTIVITY

A few days ago I rode down Constitution Avenue in Washington in a taxicab. Presently we passed a yellow gasoline truck. The radio in the taxi was telling of the bombing of oil storage tanks in Rotterdam. The headlines of my newspaper were telling of the occupation of the Dutch West Indies by the French to protect the Dutch refineries. The label on the Washington truck read "Shell Oil Co." An economic state with bases at Rotterdam, Holland; at Curacao, Dutch West Indies; at Washington, D. C.; and at so many other spots on the map that to list their names would make a geographical gazeteer of respectable proportions.

Just as oil is produced and distributed for the use of individuals by huge organizations, so it is also with practically every commodity upon which the whole commercial structure rests. Power is made available only through the cooperation of large numbers of persons, because no single person is capable, under modern conditions, of making steam or electricity available for practical use. All of the elements of transportation and communication which only a few decades ago were wholly within the control of individuals are today, so far as modern enterprise is concerned, wholly within the control of groups of individuals, and these individuals have found it necessary to impose organization upon themselves in order to make their purposes effective. Old-fashioned methods of transportation are, to be sure, still available, but they are no longer convenient; they no longer serve our purposes. Our great-grandfathers, every one of them, could provide themselves with all the transportation they needed because every practical man of a century ago could, under the press of necessity, build himself a wagon and acquire a horse, but none of us can equip ourselves with the means of transportation which the modern world demands. We have to depend upon the collective organizations which manufacture locomotives and railroad cars, automobiles, and airplanes, and which make steam, electricity, and gasoline available for instant use by every man.

More than that, indeed, the preparation of food has been moved from the family kitchen to the corporate factory. The power spindle has displaced the distaff. The individual for whose benefit all organizations, both political and economic, are formed is being swallowed up by both.

Thus, organization is the mark of the modern world. The troubles of this generation arise from the simple fact that we have not yet learned how to shape this necessary organization in such a manner as to preserve that individual freedom for the protection and preservation of which the United States of America was established. If we understand the meaning of organization and the necessity of making it serve the individual needs of all our people, we shall understand that the economic organization, like the political organization, must not be permitted to become more powerful than the people. We shall then be in a position to offer to mankind the prescription for peace and prosperity, for lack of which the nations of Europe are today tearing away the roots of civilization, for we can then hold fast to all the material advantages of industrial and commercial organizations while at the same time preserving essential human rights.

Europe has organized for war, and, though much against our will, by that very fact we are now compelled to organize for war also; our real duty is to organize for eventual peace. Europe has organized for destruction because of fear, fear that races and individuals cannot live without pillage and rapine upon one another. We can organize for constructive purposes once we realize that the world provides more than enough for all and that by intelligent distribution of the abundance which surrounds us we can actually, through organization, make robbery and pillage as unnecessary among nations as it is among men. Not upon fear of one another but upon faith in the capacity of our people to cooperate can we give the world that organization of political and economic freedom which it so much needs.

PEOPLE COME FIRST

If we are to achieve this end, we must begin by recognizing that people come first, that they precede all forms of human organization and that all organizations justify themselves only in the degree in which they serve people. A railroad system is built across a continent only because it makes cheap transportation available to people. A telephone system is brought into existence only because people want to communicate conveniently at long distances. A great electric company is possible only because people want electricity in their homes for light and for power. Automobiles, airplanes, electric refrigerators, and every imaginable device which has been invented to supply the luxurious tastes of the modern world are possible only because living people demand them; and so, all industry, all business, and all commerce are organized to produce and distribute the unlimited variety of products which human ingenuity discovers and invents. Though we know that none of these things would be possible without people to buy and to use them, we seem to have overlooked the fact that the complex industrial organization necessary to produce and distribute these products will finally defeat itself if it is not so constructed as to guarantee to people the opportunity to acquire what business offers.

The totalitarian governments of Europe sprang into existence because the economic organization had failed to preserve opportunity for the people. Economic organizations and political organizations are separate entities with separate functions. The one is composed of only part of the people and possesses no elements of sovereignty, though it frequently has more wealth and power and intimately affects the lives of more people than do many political sovereignties. The latter, unlike the former, represent all the people, not part of them, and is bound to do equal justice by all individuals and by all economic organizations. Political organization—that is to say, government—is necessarily superior to any economic organization, but in the modern world, because the political government is circumscribed by geographical boundaries while the economic state is not, the relationship of the two is out of adjustment. This arises from the fact that the economic state acts as though it were an individual while the geographical state can only act as a government, and as Americans, we know, since we were so taught by the Declaration of Independence, that governments are inferior to men since they are established by men.

GOVERNMENTS ENTER ECONOMIC FIELD

It is this confusion of the rights and functions of the two entities that has caused our modern chaos. Germany, Italy, and Russia, because they were unable to create and maintain a democratic economic organization that would provide opportunity and employment for people, were compelled to enter the economic field as governments, and the result has been the horrible war organizations which are attempting to preserve the lives and property of some of their own people by destroying the lives and property of their neighbors while sacrificing the lives of countless numbers of their own citizens conscripted for military service and making slaves of other millions conscripted for industrial service. Great Britain and France, blind as we have been blind to this modern political organization of death, allowed the years to pass, as it grew in power, and having failed within their own countries to protect the rights of people in the modern economic world, find themselves in a disastrous extremity, an extremity which we ourselves now share because the arbitrary organization of whole peoples for war has repudiated the old concepts of neutrality and international comity as well as the principles of democracy.

Though as a result we find ourselves compelled, in defense of our ideals of life, to organize for war so that we may not find ourselves utterly unprepared as other peace-loving nations were, we shall make a tragic mistake if we allow ourselves to think for a single moment that such organization will be a substitute for the necessary organization for peace of which I speak. War, and even preparation for war, may, for a time, seem to solve the unemployment problem. Armies which are assembled for purposes of destruction will, to be sure, use the hands which we have not had the intelligence, by organization and cooperation, to put to work in the productive enterprises of peace. But war solves nothing, for when it is over the same stark problems of people and their relation to the economic structure remain unanswered.

He who imagines that in this great crisis America can dodge this phase of the problem of organization by preparing for war misses the fundamental fact that there is neither peace nor prosperity save in production and in full employment. American business can find no permanent prosperity in the sale of commodities to a modern world at war. Modern war, the aggressors have told us, is a total war. That means not only the destruction of soldiers and of civilians and of women and of children; it means also the destruction of the ability of whole peoples to produce. No European country can pay for anything it gets unless it can produce; for commerce among nations, as among people, is merely the exchange of goods and services; and when the ability of one man, one group, or one nation to produce is destroyed, the whole basis of commerce is destroyed. Even when we ourselves prepare, as we must prepare for our own defense, upon the modern scale we necessarily incur an expense of staggering proportions that can only be met by increasing cooperation and production.

PROBLEM CANNOT BE POSTPONED

Let no one delude himself, therefore, into the belief that our problem of organizing people so that they may all reap the benefits offered by modern science can be postponed by either war or preparation for war. We must ask ourselves, and never let the question for one single moment vanish from our minds, what is to happen in this world after the war is over. Who is to bind up the wounds of war? Who is to assuage the suffering of stricken populations? Who is to preserve the American ideal of free enterprise if we are not to do it? And how can we do it if for one moment we consent to set aside the problem of economic recovery for the benefit of all?

I have no blueprint to offer, but I can recognize the elementary principles which have made America great, just as we all recognize them. We know that the progress of America has been the fruit of liberty, the liberty of every man to work out his own destiny. That liberty has been protected heretofore because here in America men, until recently at least, have always been economically free. Political liberty is the product of economic freedom. When economic freedom is lost political liberty is endangered. That is the lesson Europe teaches us today. The genius and energy of Americans have been free to bequeath all manner of discoveries and inventions to mankind, but as these discoveries and inventions produce a more complex economy, depending in greater and greater degree upon complex economic and commercial organization, the individual has been finding it more and more difficult to preserve his economic freedom. The steady increase of tenant farmers and of industrial workers, whose only property is an uncertain job, has marked the growing instability of our economic system. When people are without property, and when, for any reason, they cannot command the opportunity to work, then the danger to established order arises.

We hear a great deal nowadays of the demand for security. That is the phrase, to be sure, but it is not what is actually meant. People want opportunity much more than they want security. People have always been ready to risk everything, even life itself, in the pursuit of an objective. But when organizations become so complex that the individual is overshadowed and has no sure and certain part in the organization, then it is that dissatisfaction and unrest begin to appear. America has heretofore always sought to preserve the open door of opportunity to people. We have boasted, and rightfully so, that in this country every man who is able and willing to work could work, and by energy and intelligence could rise to the highest positions in business and in industry, as well as in Government. It is impossible to read the names of modern American business executives and political leaders without knowing that this is so. The greatest personal satisfaction I have had as chairman of the Temporary National Economic Committee has been the realization as a result of my contacts that America is still devoted to the old traditions of freedom, and that American businessmen, no less than American workers, are willing to protect and defend the elementary principles of human rights upon which our country was founded.

We have seen from what has happened in Europe that if the modern economic organization, for all its internal efficiency, fails to preserve economic opportunity for people, the state inevitably steps in to attempt the task which business is not performing. When people cannot find employment in the avenues of private industry they turn to government. When, as in Germany, the dominant figures of the economic world, in order to protect their own interests, seek to obtain control of government, they only lay the ground for the inevitable result, the government will in the end dominate and control business. When that happens, free enterprise is gone and the state has become not only more powerful than the economic organization, but more powerful than the people.

ECONOMIC CONSTITUTION NEEDED

That is the danger which America seeks to avert. It is the danger that America must avert if it is to preserve democracy, and the only way to avert it is to avoid the mistake that Europe has made of not clearly seeing the difference between the economic and the political organization.

Once before the people of this land faced a great crisis of organization. It was after the Revolutionary War when Thirteen Sovereign States were struggling to cooperate for the mutual benefit of their people in an imperfect Union. They saw the need of political organization then and they called together a convention chosen from among the rank and file of the people to draw a Constitution which would give them the more perfect Union that was needed to protect the general welfare.

The political organization which proceeded from that Convention was the work of all, and it gave to the world a Government of the people, that is to say, a government of all the people; a government which derived its authority not from the desires or needs of any single group, however powerful, but from the desires and needs of a whole people who were determined to provide opportunity and freedom for all.

Our greatest need now is a conception of an economic organization upon the same broad national scale, one which shall not be designed to serve the interests of any group or class, but which, like our political organization, shall be founded upon the abiding conviction that our economic system must be so organized as to serve all.

To accomplish this, it is essential, first of all, to agree that the political function must be reserved to the political organization and the economic function to the economic organization. Once it is made clear that in America it is not the purpose of any responsible leaders to have the Government absorb the economic function, the greatest source of misunderstanding and fear will have been removed. The most effective means the liberal can take now to help preserve democracy and to establish social justice is to make it clear that his only purpose is to protect government from absorption by the economic organization. Likewise, the most effective means the conservative can take now to preserve free enterprise is to make it clear that it is not his purpose to make the economic organization more powerful than the people, but that his only aim is to protect the economic organization from absorption by the state, so that it may better serve the people.

So it seems to me that the opportunity and the duty of America is to perfect such an organization of free enterprise that, by preserving economic opportunity for all it will be unnecessary to appeal to government to perform the economic function. Like our predecessors who drafted our political Constitution, we must draft an economic constitution. Just as they undertook to preserve political freedom for men by fixing the powers and functions of free political organizations, so we must preserve economic freedom for men by defining the powers and functions of free economic organizations.

Such is the challenge that is presented to us. I have an abiding faith that America, founded upon the rock of human rights, will meet it.

The National Defense

OF
HON. ALBERT THOMAS
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 6, 1940

Mr. THOMAS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the olive branch is no longer the symbol of peace. Bombers, battleships, and armored tanks have replaced it. Peace is an earned possession, based upon large expenditures of money, skillful planning, and hard work. It flowers and becomes a reality only by possessing, in adequate quantity, up-to-date instruments of war. Protection from attack by the bully is afforded today just as it has always been. No bully ever was anxious to attack an individual who is not only able to fight back but able to win. The same true principle applies today to nations. Our country, by carrying out the President's rearmament program, will be so strong within a very short time that no bully nation or combination of them can overpower us.

Now, of all times, is the hour when our people should engage in the clearest thinking and invoke the calmest judgment of which the Nation is capable. Hysteria is deadly. It is a deadly anathema to sound judgment, to quick action; and, conversely, it is the handmaiden of confusion, dissension, and despair. Surely upon careful reflection no person will doubt that our country has sufficient time to arm itself adequately on the sea, in the air, and on the ground. We have no time to waste, though.

The job is being done rapidly now. Positive results not only will be seen but will be felt throughout the world within a few months, and I mean before the year 1940 expires.

It is a well-known fact that our Navy on this very day is the best and strongest this Nation has possessed throughout its history. It now is better than Japan's and practically as strong as England's. Within a short time it will be the most powerful the world has ever known. Thanks to the President and to our colleague from Georgia, Hon. CARL VINSON, chairman, and his able Naval Affairs Committee, and to the Senate Committee, our Navy has become strong during the last 7 years. Here is a brief summary of our naval units constructed since 1933. This administration has constructed a total of 111 ships, which is divided as follows: 3 airplane carriers, 11 cruisers, 26 submarines, 7 auxiliary ships, 62 destroyers, and 2 gunboats.

The Navy, in addition to those, has 68 units under construction right now by virtue of authorizing legislation passed by Congress in 1934 and 1938. Here is the break-down: 8 battleships—6 of 35,000 tons, 2 of 45,000 tons; these ships will be completed within the next 2 or 2½ years; 2 of them are about 75 percent completed now. One airplane carrier, 20,000 tons; 6 cruisers, ranging from 6,000 to 10,000 tons each; 27 destroyers, ranging from 1,600 to 1,800 tons each; 14 submarines, 1,500 tons; 12 auxiliary craft.

During the present session of Congress, funds were appropriated by virtue of authorization of the years 1934 and 1938 for the following: Two battleships, one aircraft carrier, two cruisers, eight destroyers, six submarines, and five auxiliary ships. These are to be laid down immediately. In addition to those, Congress during this present session has authorized three additional aircraft carriers of approximately 25,000 tons each; 66,000 tons of cruisers, varying from 6,000 to 10,000 tons each; and 21,000 tons of submarines.

Thus the Navy now has a total of 160 ships, either under construction or to be built, in addition to the units afloat.

Our first line of defense, Alaska, the Philippines, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and the Panama Canal will be immediately strengthened. Our eastern shores will be provided with air bases and sufficient antiaircraft equipment. Texas has been given one naval air base and should have at least one more to insure adequate protection of our oil supply, which is so vital to national defense, and to insure protection from possible invasion from Mexico.

There is no need to fret about our air force; instead, substitute therefor hard and quick work and we shall fare better. The lone voice of Gen. Billy Mitchell, which cried out 20 years ago in vain in behalf of improved aviation, like a voice in the wilderness, is now being heard and heeded like the voice of a messiah. But alas! Suppose that we, and those nations who think religiously, economically, and politically as we do, had heeded his advice, what a different world we would be living in today. But only the enemies of democracy heard and were convinced. We must remember, though, that it is a characteristic of human nature, and not necessarily a fault, to oppose, sometimes vigorously and always cautiously, change. This is true, likewise, of democracies.

The beaten rut always is more pleasant and offers less resistance than the untraveled wilderness. But our present position in aircraft is not nearly as unfavorable as the public generally believes. To the contrary, it is fairly good. Production will be developed presently to thousands of planes per month. Before pursuing this point further, let me return to the shades of Gen. Billy Mitchell.

It is a sign of wisdom to recognize that most of us dislike the thought of making a change, and we dislike to undergo the definite and positive actions that any change produces. I am afraid that the leaders of our Army and Navy of 15 years ago were intensely human in this regard. They rebuffed the sound and timely suggestions of our colleague the gentleman from Mississippi, Hon. Ross COLLINS, whose pleas for mechanized forces of defense are known to all Members of Congress. Surely the gentleman from Mississippi, Congressman Ross COLLINS, was 15 years ahead of our national thinking on this subject. Our leadership in the Army today is in sharp contrast to that of 15 years ago. Under the able guidance of the Honorable Harry Woodring, Secretary of War; Gen. George C. Marshall, Chief of Staff of the Army; and Maj. Gen. H. H. Arnold, Chief of the Army Air Corps, we are rapidly acquiring a fully equipped, modern army.

After consulting some four or five sources, whose opinions are entitled to the greatest weight, I think it is safe to state that within 30 to 60 days the entire production of military planes in the United States will be about 700 per month. Immediately prior to Hitler's invasion of the Low Countries our production of military planes was approximately 500 per month. Near the end of 1940 I have no doubt our production of military planes will be approximately 1,000 per month.

I am told by competent authority that new airplane factories can be constructed from the ground up, including tools and equipment, in not more than 6 months. With that thought in mind it must be obvious that within 12 months hence the number of military planes that this country is capable of producing is astounding. Mr. Henry Ford was making no overstatement of the facts when he stated recently that his plant alone could produce 1,000 planes a day within a few months. Regardless of the boasts of Hitler and Mussolini as to their plane production, it is extremely doubtful if they have a combined production, under present conditions, in excess of 2,800 planes per month. It is even more doubtful if they can maintain that figure.

Under the able and competent leadership of ANDREW J. MAY and Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD and their respective Committees on Military Affairs, our Army will presently be sizably expanded and will be equipped with the most modern automatic guns, armored tanks, armored motorcars, and all necessary equipment.

Too many of our people do not understand that the Regular Army is just one part of the Army itself. The other parts include the National Guard, the Reserve officers, the Air Corps, and so forth. Our present authorized limit for enlisted men in the Regular Army is 285,000—not including officers. Due to "fifth column" activities in Mexico and South America, sound judgment demands that the enlisted personnel of the Regular Army be increased to approximately 400,000.

A few weeks before the World War in 1914 our Regular Army consisted of 4,701 commissioned officers and 87,781 enlisted men. Our National Guard had 8,323 commissioned officers and 119,087 enlisted men. A fairly good start had been made in the installation of our coastal defense.

The Army had 13 experimental aeroplanes. We had practically no modern transportation. The total expenditures for military purposes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, were $114,500,814.39.

To date our Army, with the additions authorized last year by the Congress, is composed of the following: Regular Army, 13,500 commissioned officers, 227,000 enlisted men. Of this number 70,000 are required to guard our overseas possessions, the Panama Canal, Hawaii, the Philipines, and Puerto Rico.

Our National Guard has a strength of 17,000 officers and 235,000 enlisted men. In addition we have 120,000 Reserve officers.

The air force consists of 50,000 officers and enlisted men. We have 5,500 military planes of all types and of varying degrees of modern usefulness.

In addition to this, approximately $600,000,000 will be rapidly spent for purchasing the finest of automatic rifles, of which the United States has the best; armored tanks, war planes, modernized vehicles, ammunition, and all needed equipment.

The needed expansion of the Army Air Corps has been authorized, together with the construction of necessary training fields for training of a sufficient number of pilots, mechanics, and aerial technicians to man a fleet of 50,000 planes. The problem of plane obsolescence will have to be watched.

All in all, there is no doubt but that we will be adequately armed on land, on the seas, and in the air to meet any emergency within a short time. In arriving at a state of complete preparedness, too much credit can not be given to President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Hull for helping to mold public approval of the program. I believe it is accurate to state that the President, the Congress, and Secretary Hull have been fully a year ahead of the public in their thoughts concerning foreign affairs and preparedness.

The ghastly examples of Austria, Czechoslovakia, Norway, Poland, Denmark, Holland, and Belgium loudly speak Hitler's purpose. France and England are definitely on his schedule. Maybe Russia and South America are. Who knows but that Canada, Mexico, or our country may be attacked? As a matter of common horse sense, it appears to be to our national interest to assist the Allies now in every way possible, short of war. It may be too late to assist them 90 days from now. Mussolini is helping Hitler very materially every day without having declared war.

As we all know, there are very few ways at this moment, short of war, that we can help. The Allies do not need funds now. They have several billions of dollars and securities on deposit in this country. Their paramount need is airplanes. No doubt the lion's share of our present production of planes is going to them. That is as it should be. Doubtless one plane now is worth three to the Allies 90 days hence. A material way for us to help their cause and ours, too, is for the Army to let them have its surplus supplies and especially planes. This could be accomplished without violating the rules of common sense—and not to do so would surely be a violation of that rule—by the Army trading in its planes to the manufacturers for new ones for future delivery. The manufacturers are free to sell these and other planes to the Allies.

We are making rapid strides to protect ourselves against the "fifth column." The greatest measures of preparedness along this line will come from the helpful cooperation of an interested and aroused public. The public is on its toes now. Our law-enforcing agencies are using many old but effective laws to reduce the hazard from this treacherous and underhanded method of attack, and new laws are being passed by the Congress which will materially protect us in this regard. The Department of Justice will revitalize the immigration machinery through vigorous prosecution and through the effective and active work of the Bureau of Investigation. This Bureau should have its active investigative force increased by 500 agents. No objections will come from any source on this needed increase in personnel.

In this serious hour, let us not lose our heads. Time is the greatest panacea man has ever known. Let us patiently wait out and work out of our difficulties. Labor and industry, each in its own effective field, will do its job 100 percent. The team of labor and industry will function like a smooth, well-oiled machine. And above all, let us not talk our country into war.

From these dark days of cruelty and almost total suffering, God will bring good out of evil. But, as Cromwell said, "Let's keep our powder dry."

Do We Need a Man To "Save" Us?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 4, 1940

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, for some easily understandable reason, thousands of Federal employees have developed a campaign for a third-term Presidency. The success which has greeted their efforts in the Democratic Party has been accelerated by the European war. Hints that our Nation may become involved in this war have been dropped here and there throughout the Nation in the hope that they might spring forth into an overwhelming "demand" for Roosevelt's renomination and reelection.

Basically there is a weird fallacy behind all this propaganda. There is nothing in the record of American history to indicate that a President who leaves every major problem with which he began his administration completely unsolved can succeed in guiding his country through a critical period of foreign affairs. By what stretch of reasoning is it possible to believe that an administration which is spending more money daily in time of peace than Great Britain is spending daily in the face of a frightful war can be trusted to manage our national affairs, should we become engaged in the war? Granting every proposition of the new dealers, assuming their contention that war is inevitable, are we ready to entrust the management of our National Government in such a situation to a President who has not succeeded in a single major objective which he outlined at the beginning of his first term in office?

If we must participate in a war, which the Republican Party denies, shall the conduct of our affairs be handed over to an administration which has created more internal hatred among our people than we have ever known before in American history?

The record of the present National Government on preparedness is hardly one to give us confidence in its ability to carry on our affairs in time of grave national emergency. Within the War Department a long-standing feud between Secretary of War Woodring and Assistant Secretary of War Johnson has weakened the Army. The recent struggle between large elements of our Nation who are deeply concerned over air safety and the President in pushing through his reorganization plan involving the Air Safety Board has done nothing to encourage a belief in the potential strength of our aviation if war should come. The constant refusal of our high national officials to permit any demonstration of the effectiveness of air attack upon the battleships we have built in the last 7 years is a third confession of weakness.

Surely a National Government which permits the development of such internal difficulties cannot be trusted to conduct our affairs in the event of war. Surely a President who has demonstrated his complete unwillingness to adopt a specific course, and to pursue it with reference to our own domestic problems, cannot be relied upon to do otherwise in the face of war.

If the danger of our participation in another European struggle is truly imminent, the people of the United States must change their leadership. Our present National Government has demonstrated that it is incompetent in time of peace. In time of war it might prove disastrous.

Dedication of the Columbus Arms Mural in the Hispanic Room of the Library of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SOL BLOOM

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 6, 1940

ADDRESS OF HON. SUMNER WELLES, UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include therein the following timely address delivered by the Honorable Sumner Welles, Under Secretary of State, at the dedication of the Columbus arms mural in the Hispanic Room of the Library of Congress, Tuesday afternoon, May 28, 1940, at 3:45 o'clock:

I count it a great privilege to be afforded the opportunity this afternoon, in this beautiful Hispanic Room of the Library of Congress, to take part in the dedication of the mural comprising the arms of Christopher Columbus.

Soon 450 years will have passed since the great discoverer first sighted the lands of the New World in which we live. And while the admiral always maintained, as the words blazoned on his arms demonstrate, "Por Castilla, por León, nuevo mundo halló Colón"—for Castile and for León, Columbus discovered a new world—we Americans know that our New World of the Americas was in truth discovered for a higher purpose and was designed to achieve a far greater destiny than merely to serve as an appanage of the Old World.

Throughout these past four and a half centuries the term "the New World" has come, I believe, to mean, above all else perhaps, in the minds of the peoples of other continents, a land of promise where they could obtain freedom—freedom from oppression at the hands of the tyrant, freedom to think, freedom to speak, and freedom to worship God as they themselves believed right. Even before those colonies which later became the 21 American Republics had all of them achieved their political freedom, in the greater part of the New World men and women had achieved individual freedom. Today, throughout the three Americas comprising Columbus' new world, there still exist the same ideal and the same goal as those which the founders of our republics sought and which they so successfully achieved.

In these darkened hours, throughout a great part of the rest of the world, those liberties which we cherish, and by which we live, have been assailed, and have been, at least momentarily, successfully destroyed. Almost hourly one can see spreading the tide of carnage and of devastation which engulfs millions upon millions of people who desired nothing more than to live their lives peacefully, in amity with all, and as a menace to none, under the form of government which they themselves had devised.

In a physical sense and in a material sense, I realize that we are at last fully aware of these dangers in the Americas. There has never previously existed so comprehensive an understanding, so close a relationship, as that which fortunately—fortunately for each one of them—binds the American Republics together today. Any act of aggression by a non-American power, whether it be committed south or north of the Equator, is a challenge to the security of all and will be so regarded by them.

But, as you and I know, the ability to resist aggression, and to preserve our institutions of freedom, requires something more than mere material preparedness. It requires just as much a moral preparedness.

Too many of us in these recent generations have grown fat—fat, physically, and fat, mentally. We have led ourselves to believe that we were all of us secure because we wanted to believe that we were secure. We had reached the point where many of us even thought only what it was most pleasant—what it was the easiest—to think. And how many of us here in these United States have been preoccupied primarily with what we alleged the country and the Government owed us, rather than with our obligations and our duty to the country and the Government?

As we look back to the earlier days and draw inspiration from the lives of the men and women who created our Republic, and who made our Nation great, we can see clearly that our liberties, our institutions, our very independence were achieved not by blind sloth and self-indulgence, but by sacrifice and by suffering, by austerity and by devotion, and not infrequently by blood and sweat.

The price of our continued security is a rededication of themselves in this sense by our citizens, the eternal vigilance, and unselfish devotion to the public interest of those in authority, together with a continuance of effective and intimate cooperation on the part of all the governments of the Western Hemisphere.

Only in that way, and only in that spirit, can the New World which Columbus found continue to maintain unassailed and unassailable the institutions of democracy which free men and women have here created.

Foreign Trade of the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VINCENT F. HARRINGTON

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 29, 1940

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, exports of United States merchandise during the first 4 months of 1940 were valued at $1,359,000,000, the highest figure for this period in any year since 1930. Exports of agricultural products accounted for 21 percent of the total, and showed a net gain of $88,000,000 during the first 4 months of this year compared with the corresponding period of last year. A further comparison of export statistics during these periods shows that exports of raw cotton increased by $97,000,000; sugar and related products, $6,000,000; fresh, canned, and dried vegetables, $4,000,000; packing-house products, soybeans, and edible vegetable oils and fats by about $3,000,000 each.

Nonagricultural exports, January–April 1940, showed an increase of $353,000,000 over the same months of last year. Almost three-fourths of this increase was accounted for by increased exports in five groups—iron- and steel-mill products, $81,000,000; aircraft products, $61,000,000; machinery, $53,000,000; nonferrous metals, $41,000,000; and chemicals and related products, $25,000,000.

United States imports for consumption during the first 4 months of 1940, valued at $834,000,000, were greater than during the same period of any year since 1930 with the exception of 1937. Agricultural imports, including rubber, silk, and so forth, accounted for 52 percent of the total.

The greatest gains during January–April 1940 compared with the same months of 1939 were in imports of crude and semimanufactured materials required by American industry. The most important increases were in the value of imports of crude rubber, $45,000,000; unmanufactured wool, $19,000,000; tin, $15,000,000; cane sugar, $11,000,000; copper and furs, $10,000,000 each; raw silk and petroleum and its products, $9,000,000 each.

Undoubtedly, gains have been relatively less in quantity than in value for both exports and imports, since prices have been advancing throughout the period discussed.

Resignation of Hon. Charles Edison as Secretary of the Navy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARY T. NORTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 6, 1940

LETTER TO THE PRESIDENT AND HIS REPLY

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from Hon. Charles Edison, Secretary of the Navy, to the President of the United States, and the President's reply:

MAY 28, 1940.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: As you already know, on May 20, 1940, I issued the following statement:

"When I announced my candidacy for the governorship of New Jersey, I told the President that I felt I should not remain as Secretary of the Navy for more than 30 days after the primary. I believed then, and I believe now, that a Secretary of the Navy—the head of our first line of defense—should not also be a candidate for political office. During these trying times there must not be the slightest suspicion that decisions of a Secretary of the Navy are influenced by political expediency."

Accordingly I am tendering you my resignation as Secretary of the Navy, effective at your convenience.

The plans that you and I have discussed, anticipating my withdrawal, are well in hand, and I leave with the full assurance that this action at this time will cause no disturbance in the normal routine of the Department.

In general, the objectives we have striven for over the past 3½ years have in great part been realized, or will be when the present Congress finally passes the current legislative program. The shipbuilding program and plans for its expansion are in good condition, as is the fleet in being. The affairs of the Navy are in the hands of an exceptionally able group of men at this time, from Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Lewis Compton; the Chief of Naval Operations, Admiral Harold Stark; the Bureau chiefs; and Department heads on.

May I thank you from the bottom of my heart for the fine relations that have existed between us and for the opportunity you gave me to serve my country.

Respectfully,

CHARLES EDISON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, June 4, 1940.

The Honorable the SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CHARLIE: First of all, let me congratulate you on your nomination without opposition for the New Jersey governorship. I hope you will be elected; and I say this because you have a deep-seated feeling of responsibility to good government and efficient government, which I hope will be recognized by the people of your State.

I am sorry to lose you as the head of the Navy Department—because you have had experience there, because you understand the multifarious problems of the Navy, and because you have greatly contributed to the present efficiency of the service.

In regard to the date of your resignation taking effect, I apply the old rule laid down by former Presidents when members of the Cabinet or their assistants have been nominated for elective office. I realize that the active part of your campaign for Governor will not begin for a month or two, but I know also that you will want to visit various parts of the State at an earlier period in order to familiarize yourself with all of the sections and all of the problems of New Jersey, even though, because of your previous experience, you are conversant with every section.

I know also that in your present position it will take you several weeks to wind up various matters to the progress of which you are essential.

May I suggest, therefore, that this acceptance of your resignation take place on June 24? This will give you enough time, I think, to finish the immediate tasks at hand.

Also, I want you to know that I will continue to count on your advice in many matters which relate to the defense development now under way, and I hope you will find time during the next few months to come to Washington frequently in order that I may talk things over with you.

I need not tell you of the affectionate personal regard in which I hold you, and of the real admiration I have had for your understanding of naval affairs. I congratulate you on the splendid record you have made.

As ever yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Humanitarian Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. FRANCIS HARTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 6, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE BUFFALO (N. Y.) COURIER-EXPRESS

Mr. HARTER of New York. Mr. Speaker, while we are voting billions to plug the holes existing in our country's defense structure, it is heartening to note practical evidence of legislative action directed toward relief of innocent people suffering through the ravages of war. One of these pieces of legislation is House Joint Resolution 501. If this bill is passed, $15,000,000 will be provided for the relief of overrun countries—all too litle; but if the leaders of the House would only permit it to be brought up and voted on at once, our country could set about doing some good right away. The rule for this bill was given by the Rules Committee on May 8, 1940, and yet we have not been given a chance to vote on it.

The most recent evidence of a practical desire to be of aid is evidenced by the bill of my very able colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. COLE]. His bill is H. R. 9721, and directs that $25,000,000 worth of surplus commodities held by Uncle Sam be turned over to the American Red Cross for distribution to refugees in Europe. Our colleague, with his usual keen recognition of essentials, takes this method of trying to put some of our resources to a practical and humanitarian use. Mr. Speaker, by leave granted to me, I insert at this point a splendid editorial appearing in the Buffalo Courier-Express, Buffalo, N. Y., of June 4, 1940, commending the gentleman from New York, Congressman COLE, for trying to see that some of our surplus commodities be used in helping to save lives:

CHANCE TO SAVE LIVES

Regardless of differences over foreign policy and preparedness and of conflicting sympathies in the present war, all Americans of good will, we believe, will approve the bill introduced in the House by Representative W. STERLING COLE, of Bath, directing that $25,000,000 worth of surplus commodities on hand in the United States be given to the American Red Cross for distribution to refugees in European war zones.

As Mr. COLE reminded the House, the United States "has in warehouses and stockrooms throughout the country millions of bales of cotton, thousands of bushels of wheat and corn, tons of dried fruits—all those things that go to sustain life, and which are so sorely needed by war refugees."

Mr. COLE took cognizance in advance of the argument that we must look out for our own unfortunates first. He conceded that there are millions in this country "who are distressed and living under undesirable and deplorable conditions." But he pointed out that their condition is not comparable to that of the millions suddenly made destitute wanderers on the face of Europe. It might be added that the $25,000,000 worth of surplus commodities on hand in this country is not doing any good lying "in warehouses and stockrooms," to our own "submerged one-third."

Why not turn those surplus commodities loose where they will save countless thousands of lives?

The Bill of Rights My Protection

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. HARRY McGREGOR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 6, 1940

ESSAY BY MARILYN BARNETT, OF ASHLAND, OHIO

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I include an essay written by a young lady who resides in my district.

Six years ago the American Legion of Ohio advocated an Americanism program to be carried on by the school children of the State. Each year the subject selected for the essay contest pertained to Americanism. This year the title was "The Bill of Rights My Protection." Approximately 150,000 essays were written this year as part of the program set up under the efficient leadership of R. B. Gardner, department commander, and W. L. DeWeese, director of junior activities. Out of this number 12 were chosen, and this select few were given a trip to Washington with all expenses paid.

I am happy and proud to put in the RECORD the essay written by one of the winners, Miss Marilyn Barnett, of Ashland, Ohio:

THE BILL OF RIGHTS MY PROTECTION

The founders of our democracy showed amazing foresight when they refused to adopt the Constitution without the understanding that a listing of specified rights would be included. These rights are the first 10 amendments to the Constitution, which are known as the Bill of Rights. Although these men and their parents and grandparents had suffered at the hands of unjust governments, their sufferings were not so great as the sufferings of the millions living today in dictator-governed nations. When those wise men formulated the Bill of Rights, little did they know that in years to come those same 10 amendments would guard 130,000,000 people more efficiently than any other law or government could. For the foresight and wisdom of Madison, who did most of the work, and his coworkers, I thank God. The fruits of their labor have saved me from a life of oppression.

I am especially thankful for the first amendment. As long as that amendment plays the part it now plays in the Government of the United States, I need fear no man. For that first amendment guarantees freedom of religion, freedom of speech, freedom of press, "the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for the redress of grievances." What more freedom could any fair-minded person want?

While all five sections of the first amendment give me the best sort of privileges, I personally get the most protection from the first section. That section states, "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof."

The reason religious freedom means so much to me is because I am a Jew. Being a Jew at this particular time in almost every country on the globe is being in a very hazardous position. In the United States, protected by the Bill of Rights, I have nothing to fear. Nothing to fear. How good those words sound. I am allowed to go to a public school. I am permitted to buy clothes, food, and the necessities and luxuries I need and want at any store I choose. I am able to go to the church of my faith and worship God as I choose. At no time am I taunted because of my religion; never am I excluded from things because of my belief.

At this particular time the first amendment seems to play a more important part in my everyday life than do the others. But still I cannot help but realize the importance of the safeguards guaranteed me by the other nine amendments. Especially the protection against illegal entry and unreasonable searches, and the assurance of a public trial by an impartial jury. With these rights assured, it certainly is the Bill of Rights—my protection.

No Bill of Attainder Under Our System—A Discussion of the Bridges Deportation Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCK R. HAVENNER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 6, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE SAN FRANCISCO CHRONICLE

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein an editorial from the San Francisco Chronicle. For many years this daily newspaper has been the recognized Republican Party organ in northern California. The author of the editorial, Mr. Chester Rowell, was formerly a member of the United States Shipping Board and is one of the acknowledged leaders of the Republican Party in California. I cite these facts to show that among the thinking people of San Francisco, regardless of party affiliations, there is definite opposition to the enactment of a bill of attainder by this Congress, no matter who the individual may be who is the object of such an attack.

The editorial follows:

Congress is still playing with the idea of deporting Harry Bridges by bill of attainder, regardless of the constitutional prohibition of such a process. It is a curious paradox that those who shout most loudly for the Constitution are often those least familiar with its provisions and least concerned for granting to others the rights it guarantees to themselves. In this case, since the effort to deport Bridges by due process of law failed on a finding of want of proof, it is proposed to substitute undue process of attainder. For surely, these objectors conclude, Bridges is an "undesirable alien," since they do not desire him. And if it is pointed out that there is no general law for the deportation of aliens merely because they are "undesirable," what could be simpler than a special law for the deportation of this particular undesired one?

The attempt is even made to support the proposal by illogic Since Congress has passed special laws to confer citizenship on named individuals, it is argued, why not a special law to expel one who is not yet a citizen and whom these proponents do not want as either a citizen or a resident? They forget that it is one thing to confer a special favor and another to deny to a special individual a general right.

So citizenship, being a privilege, may be specially conferred even in excess of general legal right. But it cannot be denied in that special way. And the general right of an alien who legally entered the country to remain here unless found guilty of deportable offense cannot be taken away by a special legislative act declaring him guilty of that offense without hearing and imposing on him a penalty not thereby applied to others. This is the exact "bill of attainder" which the Constitution forbids. It had been a real evil under despotic governments in England. It has since passed so far out of use and memory that most people had forgotten even the constitutional provision against it. This Bridges resolution is the first time it has been proposed in American history.

In these times, when feeling runs high and when the "fifth column," which has proved so dangerous elsewhere, may have to be dealt with here, it is especially important that we realize the importance of proceedings against only actual evils, and not even against them by denying rights whose protection is important to all of us. There was too much of that, under less provocation, in the last war. The temptation may be greater now, which is the greater reason for being on our guard against it.

Here is an illustration, from the beginnings of Hitlerian Germany:

One of the very last really free speeches made in the free Reichstag of the German Republic was an intentionally offensive one, by a Communist deputy just returned from Russia. It was on the opening day of the autumn session of 1932, just 4 months before Hitler came to complete power, but when he already had a large party in the Reichstag and his ruffians were defying all law and order on the streets.

The Reichstag being unorganized, it was the rule that the oldest member call it to order and make the opening speech. There were some hundred Communist members, and among them was the oldest deputy, Clara Zetkin, born in 1857 and a particularly bitter and vituperative revolutionist. She insisted on her right, and made a speech demanding the impeachment of President Hindenburg, denouncing the scowling brown shirts before her, and predicting that she would live to "open the first workers' and peasants' council of a Soviet Germany."

Nothing could have been more provocative and "subversive." If any speech was to be suppressed in the last free Parliament of a free Germany, this would have been the first one banned. But the Nazi members, under orders, received it in frowning silence. They were waiting their day, which was soon to come. And when it came they suppressed not merely that provocative extreme of free speech, but all free speech whatever.

The Germany in which Clara Zetkin could make speeches to which nearly everybody objected was the Germany in which Hitler could also make speeches, equally abusive and revolutionary. But it was likewise a Germany in which reasonable men, Catholics, Protestants, and Jews, reactionaries, liberals, and radicals could make speeches which, if heeded, might have saved Germany. It was a Germany in which workers could join unions and owners could manage their properties; in which rights were protected and crime was punished by law alone. An aged Communist woman, croaking the last words of bitterness, was the final symbol of that liberty.

Four months later Hitler was in power. Clara Zetkin could not have made that speech. But neither could any member of the Reichstag make any speech, except to join in the unanimous roar of "Ja" to whatever Hitler proposed. No person anywhere, in public or private, could freely express his own views on anything. No one had any rights which Hitler was bound to respect, not even the right to be tried for his crime, to choose or quit his job, to own his property, or to worship God otherwise than as Hitler disposed. Now the world is paying the price.

When Americans propose to deprive persons to whom they object of the rights they themselves claim, they might well recall this incident of Clara Zetkin.

French Pre-war Laws Hindered Industry

OF

HON. DEWEY SHORT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 6, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by William Philip Simms from today's Washington News:

[From the Washington Daily News of June 6, 1940]

FRENCH PRE-WAR LAWS HINDERED INDUSTRY

(By William Philip Simms, Scripps-Howard foreign editor)

PARIS, June 5.—With the Germans pounding the Somme front in their drive toward Paris, everyone here now admits that France is paying the price for having attempted too rapid social progress at the expense of national defense while her neighbor, Germany, did the exact reverse.

Today French labor—like British labor—is heart and soul behind the Allied war effort. Leaders who formerly permitted the infiltration of communistic elements now admit their mistake and are doing everything possible to overcome its consequences. But, the tragedy being as it is, France needs planes and guns now, not next fall.

A couple of years ago France's huge program of social legislation brought industry practically to a standstill. The effort was to make over the nation in a day. Wages were raised, work hours shortened, and airplane and other defense industries were nationalized. The program was in large part an excellent one, if it had been worked out over a period sufficient to permit necessary readjustments.

But, due largely to the pressure of left-wing elements in the labor movement, no such time was allowed. Instead, the attempt was to achieve in a few months social gains that might safely have been achieved in as many years.

Sit-downs, slow-downs, and other varieties of strikes became epidemic on a nation-wide scale. Across the Rhine, Hitler was conscripting labor as well as capital and compelling men, women, and children to work day and night on preparation for war. But France, 2 years ago, was turning out 25 to 30 planes a month, and in every other respect French national-defense efforts were suffering disastrously.

Their radicals dropped out of sight quickly after the war began, some of them fleeing to other countries. Today the rank and file of French workers, always tremendously patriotic, are united behind Premier Reynaud, whether they are at their benches or in the front-line trenches.

Americans here say emphatically that France's bitter experience presents a vastly important lesson for the United States.

Expenses of National Preparedness

OF

HON. WESLEY E. DISNEY

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 6, 1940

STATEMENT OF FAYETTE B. DOW BEFORE HOUSE WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement of Fayette B. Dow before the House Ways and Means Committee on the bill (H. R. 9966) to provide for the expenses of national preparedness:

SUMMARY

Owners of automobiles and trucks have contributed liberally and almost continuously to emergency expenditures of the Federal Government since 1917. They have paid and are paying excises upon cars, trucks, parts, accessories, gasoline, and lubricants.

These special taxes produced $1,174,416,070 from 1917 to 1928. Approximately $1,000,000,000 of this sum was collected following the armistice for these levies were continued for several years after other war-emergency taxes were repealed.

Following the war, the States launched an unprecedented highway-building program largely financed through gasoline taxes and registration fees. By 1940, State and Federal revenue from gasoline taxes exceeded $1,000,000,000 per year. Registration fees produced an additional $412,500,000. Special automotive taxes now account for 40 percent of all revenue collected by the average State.

Since 1932 temporary emergency Federal excises on automotive equipment and on gasoline and lubricating oils have produced $2,138,340,518.

These sources have produced the staggering sum of $16,000,000,000 in a little more than two decades.

The tremendous mileage of broad, hard-surfaced highways which has been built with the revenue is an essential contribution by motorists to our national defense.

The proposed increase in the Federal gasoline tax is a 50-percent increase. Such obvious luxuries as distilled spirits, beer, and cigarettes, will bear increases ranging from 17 to 33 percent.

The simple average combined State and Federal tax on gasoline now amounts to 5.44 cents per gallon. With the proposed ½-cent increase, the rate approaches 6 cents per gallon, or a tax of 45 percent of the current retail price, an exceedingly high tax on a necessity.

The present tax on lubricating oils ranges from 25 percent to 100 percent of the wholesale price, depending upon the quality of lubricants used. The proposed increase amounts to 12½ percent.

Under the current program motorist taxes must provide approximately $126,000,000, or nearly 20 percent of the total.

STATEMENT RE H. R. 9966

My name is Fayette B. Dow. I am appearing before you today as a representative of the American Petroleum Industries Committee, the National Petroleum Association, the Mid-Continent Oil & Gas Association, Western Petroleum Refiners Association, Pennsylvania Grade Crude Oil Association, and the Independent Petroleum Association of America.

At the outset I want to say emphatically that I am not here to oppose additional taxes upon the petroleum industry or its products.

No American citizen can deny that the necessity of preparing an adequate national defense is the paramount task of the hour. Few will quarrel with the bitter fact that the patriotism and ideals of freedom which the citizens of our great Nation possess no longer are sufficient protection against modern mechanical warfare. Obvious to most citizens is the need for huge expenditures upon aircraft, tanks, guns, munitions, and personnel, which recently have been recommended so that we may meet any brutal challenge to the American way of living.

It is the hope and prayer of this peace-loving Nation that we may never be forced to use these weapons. But we are not a nation of individuals blind to the needs of the hour, and we now clearly see that armed force must be matched with force. We realize that an adequate defense will entail large expenditures, and I believe that we all are willing and ready to make all necessary sacrifices in order to attain our objective.

I also am certain, however, that it is the desire of those who have the responsibility of levying new taxes to distribute the necessary burden as equitably as possible among those who must bear the expense of this program. In the pressing necessity for immediate action, however, it is possible that certain groups may be asked to bear a disproportionate share of this cost, and I therefore ask your earnest consideration of the following facts with regard to taxation of highway transportation and petroleum products.

During the last war emergency, automotive transportation for passenger and freight service had not become the essential it now is and was taxed as business right along with furs, jewels, sporting goods, theater admissions, and similar articles. In 1917, when a 3-percent sales tax was levied on automobiles, trucks, and motorcycles, there were less than 5,000,000 motor vehicles registered in the entire United States.

It has been said, however, that the World War provided the impetus which motorized the Nation within the 10 years following the cessation of hostilities. The yeoman work done by the hastily assembled trucks and motorcars during 1917 and 1918 brought into bold relief the convenience and necessity of automotive transportation. By 1930, the automobile ranked with food, housing, and clothing as the workingman's necessity, and by 1940 more than 30,000,000 vehicles were registered in this country.

In the days following the war, while the automobile was passing out of the luxury classification, the taxes on furs, jewels, and other luxuries were removed. Taxes on automobiles were so productive, however, that the majority of them were retained until 1926, and the last of the "emergency automotive" levies was not removed until 1928. These special taxes borne by motorists produced $1,174,416,070 from 1917 to 1928, and approximately a billion dollars of this sum actually was collected following the Armistice. Motorists, therefore, helped the Nation return to normality during the twenties, and a large portion of their contribution may be said to have aided the Nation in effecting a $10,000,000,000 reduction in its national debt during this period.

Meanwhile, automobile manufacturers produced a consistently better product which was sold at continuously reduced prices. The petroleum industry kept pace by providing consistently improved fuels at retail prices which were slashed from 29.74 cents per gallon, excluding tax, in 1920, to 13.17 cents, excluding tax, by 1940. These accomplishments brought the automobile within the reach of the average citizen and were accompanied by a pressing demand for more and better highways. To provide revenue for these, the States levied taxes on gasoline, and increased registration fees on motor vehicles.

The growth in revenue from automotive sources was little short of phenomenal. In 1919 the car-owning public paid $1,022,514 in gasoline taxes and $64,697,256 in registration fees. By 1940 State and Federal taxes on gasoline were yielding in excess of $1,000,000,000 per year, and registration fees levied by the State were providing an additional $412,494,000.

Most of the States acted wisely and applied these revenues to the construction and maintenance of a magnificent Nation-wide highway system.

Even with the limited number of trucks and relatively inadequate roads of the period, highway transportation made a substantial contribution by moving huge quantities of supplies from the Middle West to the Atlantic seaboard in the last war. Today, due to the cooperation of State highway departments and the United States Public Roads Administration, we have a greater mileage of broad, hard-surfaced highways than any other country in the world. These highways and our 4,500,000 trucks are an essential arm of our national defense, not only for the movement of munitions but especially for the fast movement of the highly mechanized equipment which modern warfare demands. Highway building, even with modern methods, is a slow process, and I am sure we are all thankful to the motoring public for having contributed more than $16,000,000,000 in gasoline taxes, registration fees, lubricating-oil taxes, and in other levies—both State and Federal—to make possible our present highway system.

During the depression, several States developed the habit of misusing their highway funds to finance relief, schools, and many other general functions of government. The result was that the motorist contributed far more than his fair share of the cost of government during those trying times.

By no means were these the only contributions to the Nation's welfare made by motorists during the thirties. During 1932, the Federal Government again called for aid, and again the motorists responded. In that year "emergency" taxes were levied on gasoline, lubricating oils, cars, trucks, and their accessories. Since 1932 these excises have been repeatedly enacted, although they clearly were designated as "temporary" taxes when they were assessed originally. Federal levies upon gasoline and lubricating oil alone produce revenue at the rate of about $230,000,000 annually. Since 1932 they have produced the enormous sum of $2,138,340,518.

Could it be shown that motorists, as a class, are wealthy persons, some justification for the continuation of this heavy burden might be cited. The fact is, as shown by statistics developed by the Department of Commerce, the average motorist in the United States today earns less than $30 per week and obviously possesses no special ability to pay taxes. This is not the motorist of 1917. This is Mr. Average Citizen, who has never owned a new car, and who pays about 2 weeks of his annual income in special automotive taxes alone. This is the man who has a car simply because he needs it in his business, not the sportsman of 1917, who took his family on an automotive adventure once a week. This is the motorist who now contributes 40 percent of all the revenue collected by the average State in special automotive taxes.

Oddly enough, the taxes on luxuries which were imposed along with the automotive excises in 1932 since have been repealed. It evidently is not the present intention to reenact them. But the average motorist, who owns no jewelry or furs, has received no such tax relief and now is being called upon to bear even stiffer levies upon the operation of his vehicle.

I wish again to emphasize that I am not complaining. I am not even objecting. But I am asking that you weigh carefully these facts, in order that you may give thought to the various important considerations involved in levying additional taxes upon car owners, truck operators, farmers who operate tractors, and other users of petroleum products.

Of the $656,000,000 which is the yield anticipated from the new taxes now under consideration, nearly 20 percent will be raised from special levies on motorists. The increased taxes on gasoline and lubricating oil and the increase in the pipe-line tax alone will provide almost 17½ percent of the total sum.

The proposed increase in the Federal gasoline tax is a 50-percent increase, which by far is a greater increase than that which is proposed on any other commodity to be taxed by this measure. Such obvious luxuries as distilled spirits, beer, and cigarettes, will bear increases ranging from 17 to 33 percent. While other manufacturers' excise taxes will bear increases of only 10 percent, the taxes on automobiles, trucks, and parts will be increased 16 to 25 percent.

In times of emergency, when new revenue is needed, there is a tendency to think of gasoline in the same terms as tobacco, beer, and distilled spirits; that is, as a nonessential. It is true that foreign countries tax gasoline at higher rates than we do. But they do that with a purpose. They deliberately seek to curtail the size and number of cars in use. We, on the contrary, geared our economy to the internal-combustion engine, both in commercial transportation and agriculture. It is estimated that 25 percent of all motor fuel is used by farmers. The Public Roads Administration estimates that 60 percent of the travel by the average passenger-car owner is in connection with making his livelihood.

The simple average combined State and Federal tax on gasoline now amounts to 5.44 cents per gallon. With the proposed one-half cent increase the rate approaches 6 cents per gallon, or a tax per gallon of 45 percent of the retail price. In some States this combined tax will amount to 8½ cents per gallon, tremendous imposts upon a product which is a necessity.

The present tax on lubricating oils, which is applicable both to automotive and industrial lubricants, ranges from 25 to 100 percent of the wholesale price, deepnding upon the quality of lubricants used. The proposed increase amounts to 12½ percent of the present tax, and here again the intent is to secure an important part of this emergency income from one of the commodities essential wherever the wheels of transportation or industry turn.

The proposed increase in the Federal pipe-line transportation tax also directly will affect the motorists, for increased costs of operation of the petroleum industry must be reflected in increased prices of its products to the consumer.

An individual with an annual income of $4,500 who is married and has one child will pay only $4.60 more in income taxes than he previously was paying, under the proposed income-tax increase. Yet the average motorist who earns about one-third of this sum will be called upon to produce nearly as much additional revenue in special automotive-tax increases.

Gentlemen, I have said that the petroleum industry, and I believe the motorists themselves, have no intention of shirking even a minute portion of their duty to their Nation in this time of need. I believe that it generally is recognized that highway users generously have contributed to the cost of Government during the last two decades, and especially have borne more than their fair share of this cost during the economic emergency from which we hopefully are emerging. They now are contributing 83 percent of all the revenue derived from the special Federal excise taxes.

Under the current program motorists and other highway users must provide approximately $126,000,000 in additional taxes, or nearly 20 percent of the total tax increase which is being sought. Most other classes of taxpayers under this proposal will bear increases of but 10 percent. Motorists and other highway users will be required to pay some $95,000,000 annually more than they would pay if they were accorded the same treatment.

Because motorists and other highway users rely upon the economy and convenience of motor transportation in their everyday life, they are particularly cognizant of the value of this medium in the successful completion of the defense program. For this reason, especially, attention should be directed to the fact that inequitable increases in their tax burden well may prevent the fullest utilization of these facilities.

In conclusion, may I say that the motoring public has paid the emergency taxes now in force without complaint and in good faith. In the face of a graver emergency they are again willing to bear their share of the added burden. It is sincerely hoped that Government will recognize this attitude by repealing such taxes as soon as the emergency is ended.

The very fact that I am allowed to present these facts is sufficient evidence that our democratic form of government must be preserved. I am sure that the petroleum industry, motorists, and other highway users, along with all other true American citizens, will do all within their power to facilitate the national-defense program and to lend every possible service in the present emergency.

I am sincerely grateful for this opportunity to discuss these matters and I wish to thank you for your patience and cooperation.

INDEPENDENT PETROLEUM ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA,
Washington, D. C., June 5, 1940.

To the Ways and Means Committee, House of Representatives:

The Independent Petroleum Association of America joins other organizations in the petroleum industry in presenting through the American Petroleum Industries committee the position of this industry in regard to the proposed increase in the Federal sales tax on gasoline and lubricating oil and in the pipe-line transportation tax.

The petroleum industry is an integral part of our national life. It is involved necessarily in the welfare of the Government and recognizes that that welfare must be given first consideration. Times of stress, such as the present, place serious responsibilities upon those in governmental office upon whom rests the burden of meeting the unusual demands of an emergency.

We recognize that to raise the large sums required to support a program so comprehensive as that which is now being considered by the Federal Government, every energy and resource must be made available. We further recognize that this is not the time for those who are not bearing the responsibility of the Government to discuss the merits or the details of one proposal as opposed to another. We do conceive it our duty to defer to the judgment of those immediately charged with the task of making available the money required to carry out the national program.

For these reasons, we do not here object to the suggestion that the sales taxes on petroleum products be increased. At another time, when the emergency does not exist, and when opportunity for discussion may be given without the danger of interference with a great national effort, we will raise the various objections which might be properly offered to a permanent program, but which do not seem appropriate in our present situation.

INDEPENDENT PETROLEUM ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA,

Amendments of National Labor Relations Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOWARD W. SMITH
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 6, 1940

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the special, select committee of the House, appointed under House Resolution 258 to investigate the National Labor Relations Board, I have devoted many months to a study of the operation of the National Labor Relations Act, which created the Board, and to the activities of the Board itself.

Our committee did not base its findings upon mere rumors or gossip, nor yet upon the testimony of disappointed litigants before the Board. Our findings are based largely upon the documentary evidence taken from the Board's own files.

Based upon this experience and study, and with no special ax to grind with any faction or group involved, and with no special interest in the subject other than to serve the public as a whole, I believe that I am qualified to know whereof I speak. And, while others have attacked the findings and recommendations of our committee with unmistakable venom, I have, up to this time, refrained from making any reply. In the interest of a clear and logical understanding of the situation and to refute the intemperate and uninformed criticisms launched at our report by those who would like to see the Labor Relations Act continue to be an instrument that could be used by one side or the other of the warring labor factions for the destruction of the other, I think it appropriate that I should discuss with the House the amendments proposed by our committee and the reasons therefor.

I address myself to those Members of the House who, like myself, believe that the general welfare of the country is paramount to the interest of any special group. It is futile to approach with logical argument those who think that the Labor Relations Act is something sacred. I will not seek to answer those who assert that it is proper that the Labor Act should disregard fundamental rights of citizens merely to protect certain special groups or interests; nor will I seek to debate with those who claim that it is the duty of Government to force the workingman to join and pay tribute to unions against his will by a system of regimentation imposed upon him by the present operation of the act. Those questions I leave to be answered by the American public at some future date.

The amendments offered by the select committee have been criticized on the grounds that amendments to the act should be offered by its friends and not undertaken by those who opposed the enactment of the legislation. Every attempt to correct the glaring defects both in the act and its administration have, for the past 5 years, been viciously and venomously attacked by those who are responsible for the enactment of the legislation.

The country has waited in vain for those who were responsible for the legislation to propose amendments to correct the situation. Not one constructive proposal has ever been advanced by that group, and now, after 5 years of known and admitted maladministration on the part of the present Labor Board, the same group, forced by the weight of public opinion, grudgingly comes forward with the shopworn, repudiated and discredited proposal to "pack the court" by the addition of two more members to the already discredited Board. To some this may appear as a constructive proposal; to the American public it appears as a confession of wrongdoing, coupled with a face-saving device to reward the wrongdoers. No one is deceived, and no one is satisfied.

The question will shortly be presented to the House of whether you will consider the court-packing Norton amendments to the Labor Act or whether you will consider the comprehensive set of amendments offered by the special committee, which this House, by a vote of two to one, created to deal with this troublesome subject. I do not ask any Member of the House to vote for all or any one of the amendments which our committee has proposed. All I ask you to do is to give them fair, open, and deliberate consideration on the floor of this House. If there is any one or more that you believe will destroy the purposes of the Wagner Act, then vote it down. But I believe that our special committee has the right to ask and to expect of this House, after setting up this special committee by a vote of almost two to one, that you will at least consider and vote upon the recommendations which we offer.

Now, let us see what those amendments are and what they are intended to do. The amendments to the first section of the act strike out the general indictment of all industry for its alleged refusal to bargain collectively with employees. That provision has no earthly legislative effect but is a mere recital of purposes and can have no purpose other than to incite a feeling of hostility of employers as a class against the act. We believe this amendment a conciliatory gesture toward employers as a class that would help allay present public criticism. We have also proposed to strike out the declaration that it is a policy of the United States to encourage collective bargaining. That provision has no legislative effect whatsoever and it is obviously not the business of Government to either encourage or discourage collective bargaining. It is only the business of Government to protect the right of employees to self-determination of the question of whether they wish to organize or not.

It has been said, in a statement by the minority of the committee, that this amendment would affect the constitutionality of the act. I challenge the statement, and suggest that the gentlemen who make it, peruse the opinion of the Supreme Court establishing the constitutionality of the act which contains no justification of such a statement. However, these two amendments, as previously stated, have no legislative effect, are unimportant, and can be rejected or accepted by the House without in anywise affecting the substantive value of the act or of the proposed amendments.

A great commotion has been raised about the proposed amendment to section 3, which would prohibit the Board from continuing its practice of ordering the employer to reinstate employees who have been discharged for engaging in sit-down strikes or "willful violence." The objection to this amendment should be made, not to the Congress but to the Supreme Court of the United States. The amendment is taken in almost identical language from the opinion of Chief Justice Hughes in the famous Fansteel case, where it reversed and rebuked the Board for its attempt to compel the employer to take back into employment men who had unlawfully seized the property of the company and engaged in acts of willful violence. All this amendment does is to put the question squarely up to Congress of whether we are going to have law and order or whether we are going to have anarchy under the protective wing of the National Labor Relations Board.

One critic has said that this would cause a man to "lose all right to earn his bread because of a minor scuffle on the picket line." There is nothing in the amendment to justify any such assertion, as it applies solely to acts of willful violence. This amendment deprives no employee of any right, but merely restores to the employer the discretion to decide for himself whether he wishes to retain in his employ persons who are guilty of willful violence. This amendment is necessary, because, notwithstanding the opinion of Justice Hughes in the Fansteel case, the Board subsequently, in another case, sought to reinstate sit-down strikers and had to be again rebuked by the courts.

The next amendment which we propose would make uniform the definition of the term "agricultural labor" by adopting the same definition contained in the Social Security Act. There has been a great demand for such an amendment from Members of Congress representing agricultural districts. I have heard no objection to this amendment, and yet it is significant that the Labor Committee refused to include it in the amendments offered. This amendment, like the others, is submitted for your consideration because we believe that there is an actual and imperative need for it. It is up to the House to determine whether you shall accept or reject it, but certainly, out of all of this agitation, there seems to be no good reason why the agricultural interests of the country should not receive this consideration and be relieved of the uncertainties existing under present law.

We have proposed an amendment which would define the term "collective bargaining." The amendment which we propose, while requiring employers to discuss differences and make every possible effort to compose the same, is not to be construed as "compelling or coercing either party to reach an agreement or to submit counterproposals."

Senator WAGNER, in debating the bill on the floor of the Senate at the time of its passage, said:

> It (the act) does not compel anyone to make a contract of any kind if no terms are arrived at that are satisfactory to him.

In this connection it is interesting to quote from Senator WALSH, another sponsor of the bill, in the Senate debate:

> Let me say that the bill requires no employer to sign any contract, to make any agreement, to reach any understanding with any employee or group of employees.

Our distinguished colleague the gentleman from California, Representative WELCH, one of the outstanding advocates of the bill then and now, stated in the debate:

> It does not require an employer to sign any contract, to make any agreement, to reach any understanding with any employee or group of employees.

Why are they unwilling to write their conception into the language of the act?

Notwithstanding the clear language of the act and the positive statements of its sponsors above quoted, the Board repeatedly holds a club over the heads of employers by threatening that, if they do not make counterproposals, they will be held guilty of refusing to bargain in "good faith."

We propose an amendment to section 3 which would abolish the present Board and set up a new bipartisan Board to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. The object of this amendment is, frankly and obviously, to do away with the present personnel of the Board to such extent as the President and the Senate may deem desirable in the public interest and thereby bring about changes, not only in the Board, but in the employees of the Board. Apparently, no one seeks to defend the present Board or its personnel. That they have completely destroyed public confidence is a fact so well known as not to be worthy of debate. The proponents of the act themselves admit it by their proposal to pack the Board with two more members in order to change the complexion of its conduct and administration. Our proposal, as contrasted with the Norton proposal, presents squarely and honestly the alternative of meeting the situation openly and frankly and correcting it, or resorting to the patent subterfuge of "packing" the Board.

We also propose an amendment to the same section which would set up an administrator of the act, who would be independent of the Board and conduct the prosecution functions under the act. One of the chief complaints against the administration of this act is that the Board acts both as prosecutor and judge, completely ignores and repudiates our constitutional and judicial system of separation of the judicial and executive departments of the Government.

It is constantly said that the amendments which we propose are drastic. This proposed amendment is drastic. It has to be drastic to do the job. It does not take away one single right given under the act, nor does it diminish one jot or tittle the force of the act; it merely provides for an orderly administration. It does not even guarantee fair administration of the act. It merely supplies the means by which, in the future, the operation of the act may be administered in a way that will restore to some extent the confidence of the public. If any additional argument is needed for it, it can best be found in the opinion of Judge Major, of the circuit court of appeals, in the Inland Steel case in which he said, in rebuking and reversing the Board in the Inland Steel case:

> It also illustrates, in a minor fashion, what this record, as a whole, convincingly discloses—that is, the danger of imposing upon a single agency the multiple duties of prosecutor, judge, jury, and executioner.

Probably the most controversial part of the act is section 9, which gives the Board the power to determine the unit of representation in labor disputes. Under the present act, the Board has unlimited power, irrespective of the wishes of the employees themselves, to decide what is the appropriate unit. By juggling or gerrymandering this unit, one union may be favored and the rival union destroyed. One of the most atrocious examples of this is the Harry Bridges West Coast Longshoremen's case, where the Board, by holding that the whole west coast was an appropriate bargaining unit for longshoremen, completely wiped out and destroyed numerous local units of the American Federation of Labor that had been in existence for years and years, with no right of appeal under the act, and crowned the Communist Bridges king of all the longshoremen on the west coast.

It is beyond question that this is one of the most troublesome matters with which the Labor Board has to deal. It can make or destroy a union, and when it does so, its decision is final, as there is no right of appeal to the courts.

Our committee recommends the adoption of the so-called Garrison amendment, which would take away from the Board the power to make this determination of the unit in disputed cases. The proposal is not the invention of our committee nor is it a proposal coming from any source unfriendly to the act. It is the amendment proposed by Dean Lloyd Garrison, formerly chairman of the old Labor Board, an enthusiastic supporter of the National Labor Relations Act, and of the Board. If this amendment is destructive of the purposes of the act, then our committee disclaims responsibility for that purpose, because there is no more earnest and enthusiastic supporter of the Wagner Act than is Dean Lloyd Garrison.

We have proposed an amendment which would fix a limitation of 6 months upon the right of an employee to make his complaint to the Labor Board. We do not regard this as a vital amendment, but we do think that a reasonable limitation should be imposed so that the work of the Board would not be cluttered with stale claims and the limitation of 6 months was fixed because the Board, itself, has already, by regulation, virtually adopted the same rule. The policy of the Board is now to refuse to entertain any claim over 6 months old unless the claimant can show justifiable reason for not having presented it earlier.

We have also proposed a limitation of 6 months upon the time for which the Board can order back pay. We do regard this as a most desirable amendment. When the Board orders back pay, often after months and years of delay during the proceedings, such back pay continues to accumulate until the order of the Board is finally complied with, notwithstanding the fact that the case may be pending in the courts. Some of the enormous back pay awards have been so unreasonable as to threaten bankruptcy of the employer and to serve as an effective deterrent to prevent him from pursuing his remedy in the courts, at the risk of increasing the amount of back wages to a sum beyond his ability to pay.

We have also suggested an amendment which would require the Board to, as far as practicable, follow the rules of evidence in the Federal courts. There is no provision that would reverse the decisions of the Board for failure to do so, but we do believe that the work of the Board could be facilitated, the size of the records and the length of the hearings reduced and a better administration of the act secured, if the Board and its employees are directed to at least pay some attention to the ordinary rules of evidence.

Of a similar character is the amendment reminding the Board of its duty to decide cases upon the preponderance of the evidence. A similar provision is contained in the Walsh-Healey bill. There is no provision in the act which excuses the Board from this duty. Apparently the Board has construed that provision of the law which says that the courts shall not reverse the Board where its findings are supported by evidence to mean that the Board itself, in its original determination of the case, is not required to follow the preponderance of evidence rule. We have not disturbed the present rule as to court review except to provide that the court may reverse the Board if its findings of fact are clearly erroneous or not supported by substantial evidence.

We also propose an amendment, which no one has objected to, making it mandatory for the Board to issue subpenas to witnesses to either party to the controversy on equal terms. No one would ordinarily believe that such an admonition to a judicial agency would be necessary, but the fact is that, while the employee has had, at all times, the facilities of the Board for subpenaing his witnesses, the same is not true of the employer.

We have also proposed an amendment that where the trial examiner who heard the case submits his findings to the Board and there are no objections thereto, within 20 days by either party, the trial examiner's decision shall become final. This would considerably lighten the work of the Board and we have heard of no criticism of, or objection to, this amendment.

We have proposed an amendment which would give 15 days instead of 5 days after the filing of complaint before the trial could begin. We know of no objection to this amendment. In fact, it is pretty generally the practice of the Board.

We have also proposed an amendment giving the right of appeal to the courts in representation cases. Under the decision of the courts, when the Board makes a ruling as to a unit of representation, there is no right of appeal and the courts have held that, although valuable personal and property rights have been destroyed by such decisions of the Board, that there is no remedy by appeal under the present law and that the remedy lies with Congress and not with the courts.

Of vital importance to the orderly and peaceful process of collective bargaining is the amendment which gives to employers as well as employees the right to require the Labor Board to hold elections to determine which of two rival labor unions has a majority of employees. Formerly, the Labor Board did not even permit an employer, when caught between two warring labor factions, to petition for an election. Apparently for the purpose of allaying public criticism, the Board, about a year ago, issued a regulation permitting employers to petition for an election under such circumstances, but gave no assurances that the petition would be granted. The evidence discloses that, up until very recently, only one such election had been held. This amendment would make it mandatory for the Board to hold such elections upon the application of either employer or employees and thus promptly end such disputes.

Section 8 (1) prohibits the employer from interfering with his employees in the exercise of their right of collective bargaining. The Board has gone to the unbelievable extent of penalizing the employer for even the most innocent conversation with his employees concerning labor disputes. For instance, it has been held an unfair labor practice for an employer to say that "If I had a son, I would advise him not to join a union."

This assumed power on the part of the Board to interfere with the right of free speech has been repeatedly used to destroy American Federation of Labor unions where the employer has expressed a preference for the A. F. of L. as against the C. I. O. Our committee merely recommends the amendment prepared and proposed by the American Federation of Labor with one exception. We believe that the A. F. of L. amendment might be construed as going too far in permitting interference by employers and therefore modified it to prohibit acts of coercion and intimidation.

We proposed an amendment to section 4 (a) to abolish the Economic Division headed by David J. Saposs. This amendment is in line with the previous action of this House at this session which by a large majority refused to appropriate money for the continuance of the Economic Division. As illustrative of the insubordinate contempt of the Board for the intent of Congress, I am advised that notwithstanding the fact that a number of employees of the Board have been notified of their separation from the service at the beginning of the next fiscal year, the Economic Division is to be retained in defiance of the action of Congress prohibiting the same.

In conclusion let me say that we are confronted by the gravest emergency of our national life. All of our energies are directed to preparation to defend ourselves against modern mechanized warfare. Every resource must be marshalled to produce guns, planes, tanks, ships, and ammunition. Without these things in great abundance, we are helpless and defenseless.

We have appropriated hundreds of millions of dollars for the purpose of defense, but I say to you that all of the dollars minted since the birth of the Republic will not repel one invader. To be effective, these dollars must be converted into bombs and bullets, ships and planes and tanks.

We may draft the best of the youth of our Nation into the armed service. We may call your brave sons and mine to the colors, but if we do we will merely condemn them to useless slaughter unless we first convert those dollars into modern engines of warfare.

We hear discussions as to the location of our first line of defense. I say to you that today our first line of defense, and our last line of defense, is in the factories and shops and in the great industries of this country. Our safety as a nation depends upon their efficient operation, and that in turn depends upon friendly cooperation and relationship between capital and labor. Neither capital nor labor must be permitted to take advantage of each other or of the Nation.

But, above all, no agency of this Government must be permitted to stir up strife or to strafe or hamstring or persecute the industries of the country upon which our safety now depends.

The evidence adduced before our special committee is irrefutable and overwhelming:

That the Labor Board, as now constituted, is definitely partial to the radical C. I. O., labor movement;

That the Labor Board persistently seeks to punish and persecute the industries of the country, sometimes to the point of bankruptcy;

That the Labor Board destroys legitimate, independent labor unions because they refuse to become affiliated with national unions;

That the Labor Board is honeycombed with employees who do not even believe in our system of private ownership of property, upon which our whole industry is based;

That the Labor Board, itself, with full knowledge of the distorted philosophy of these employees, persists in retaining them in key positions.

There is no more dangerous "fifth column" in this country this minute than some of the employees occupying important positions with the Labor Board and conducting their efforts to destroy capitalism, at the expense of our own taxpayers, under the shadow of the Capitol, and under the protection of the present Labor Board.

I make no specific charges against any member of the Board, except that I cannot fail to be disturbed by the apparent over friendly relationship of Board Member Smith with the notorious Communist Harry Bridges.

I cannot help being disturbed by the overwhelming mass of evidence of Board partiality to the radical C. I. O. group, confessedly infiltrated with communism.

But the Members of the Board themselves know better than you and I do the truth of the situation, and their stubborn refusal to clean house in defiance of Congressional mandate, notably in the case of Saposs, can leave no other belief in the minds of the American people than that they are equally guilty with those they shield, protect, and foster.

The activities of this Labor Board have been condemned in the editorial columns of every metropolitan newspaper worthy of the name.

They have been condemned in the eyes of an overwhelming majority of the American citizens.

They have been condemned by all industry.

They have been condemned by the American Federation of Labor.

They have been condemned by the C. I. O.

If they have any friends left outside of Washington, I do not know who they are.

I appeal to you. I appeal to the coordinate legislative branch to which, God willing, this bill will soon be committed, and I appeal to the democratic administration, responsible for the orderly conduct of our defense preparations, to do something about this situation before it is too late.

Unemployment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 6 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS, OF UTAH

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, recently there was held in Washington an unemployment conference known as the Interfaith Conference on Unemployment. On June 5, 1940, the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] delivered a very able address to this conference. The conference was sponsored by the industrial division of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, the social action department of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, the social justice commission of the Central Conference of American Rabbis, and the social justice committee of the Rabbinical Assembly of America.

I ask unanimous consent that the address of the Senator from Utah be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen, my thoughts tonight are deeply philosophical; they may, therefore, be considered very impractical. Maybe they are, but that does not make them untrue. They are spoken as a result of an attempt to understand partially the great world-wide upsetting that is taking place in the world today.

This conference on unemployment was conceived and brought into existence by three gentlemen whose training is in religion. I trust that, therefore, the significant approach to the employment problem will be reflected by what must be the basic thought of these gentlemen; that is, that the true value for our consideration is the worth of man.

The three gentlemen—or shall I call them brethren—have been trained in that school of thought which accepts the concept of revelation and the concept of the entity of the human individual—revelation based upon the theory that knowledge from the eternal world is of worth and should aid knowledge gained in the temporal world; also that the entity of the individual is of worth both here and hereafter.

Businessmen have met, scientists have met, politicians have met, all have offered their solutions to the unemployment problem, but none has given us an all-embracing plan. Many have suggested a panacea for ills of unemployment. Probably the religious approach in its broad aspects is the one lacking, for religion is merely a bond. It is a tie which connects man with the past and the future. It gives him, therefore, a concept of life broader than his own experience. This in turn gives him a purpose for living and permits his mind to project himself into the unknowns of tomorrow.

We are told by one school of thinkers that the frontiers in American have been lost and that therefore we must create new frontiers that man may have an economic salvation. We are told by other schools that Government's attempts to do so much in solving the unemployment problem have caused business and industry to do little, and that therefore employment is retarded. We are told by another school of thinkers that depressions are overcome by new inventions and that we must await the day of another industrial urge growing out of a mechanical device which will cause new buying habits. We were told by others years ago that the surplus farm products came into existence because women started dieting, that the sugar industry was almost ruined by an advertising slogan which suggested that the ladies "reach for a Lucky instead." If a suger depression followed the reaching for a Lucky, should we not have been saved by the excess expenditure on Luckies?

These economic trends following changing habits are apparent to all, but when we try to make economic deductions from them we become as mixed up in our thinking as did the darky who, on going to a closed bank to draw his savings, was told that his money was gone and he could not get it back. He tried to explain in an economic way what had happened by concluding that the "interest had done eat it all up."

We all know that if 450,000,000 Chinese would wear out one extra cotton garment a year that we could solve our cotton surplus if all of the Chinese could afford to buy another cotton garment, and if we could sell our surplus to the Chinese, and if we could ship that surplus over there, and if in a year we could make and distribute the 450,000,000 garments. Now, you see, the "ifs" seem to be the trouble instead of the surplus and the lack of wealth. What am I trying to say? I am merely trying to point out that men are so intrigued with the idea of the accomplishment of a desired end that they overlook all of the factors entering into its realization.

If society is complex and if the employment problem is complex, how are we ever going to get a simple solution? We can get it by assuming a few simple human values and causing our activities to be directed towards the realization of those values. First, then, let us assume the thesis of our three religious teachers—that the worth of the human individual is the important fact—and build therefore all of our plans toward the end of enlarging the worthwhileness of that human individual. That would mean, I grant, throwing out of the window most of our sloganized, so-called economic social laws. If a happy, well-trained, contented, well-fed, well-employed citizen shall be the Government's objective, let us work to that end instead of making all-important the salvation of those institutions which man has created. In other words, shall the state be the agency of the people or shall the people be the agent of the state? Let us put it in another way, Shall the people be the beneficiaries of government, or shall government be the beneficiary of the people? I am getting involved. Let us just leave that thought by saying that government and people are interdependent. Society must have people and a people must have a society. Let me repeat, though, men should remain at least as important as institutions which men create.

I am probably suggesting something that seems simple, but which in fact in the light of human experience is extremely revolutionary, for in the history and the evolution of culture, the growth and development of that which God made, man, has always seemed of secondary worth to those things which this man himself has made. Since man did not make men, men have been taken for granted. Never have they been thought very important.

Let me put it in another way: A man builds a house, he calls it his, he becomes its master. He loses himself in these three prides which are outgrowths of his creation. "I made a house, I will defend it with my life, it is mine—no one else can touch it, anyone who comes within its shadow shall be subject to my will." Man has thus created what he calls a law of property and a law of political rule growing out of the genius he displayed in building his house. If one of those three things weighs on this man and those who come after him, then he actually becomes not the master of his house and of the economic rule of property which he has created and of the social and political law of control which he has brought into existence, but instead man finds himself the servant of his house, the victim of his economic deduction, and, far from ruling those within his house, he builds so tightly the laws of rule that he himself becomes the least free of all persons in his family. Such is the history of society. The absolute Czar was powerless to abdicate his right to universal rule excepting when he did it in conformity with some unwritten fundamental law that bound him as tightly as he had bound the others. The absolute Son of Heaven whose nod sent men to death could only fan himself in certain ways and could only be looked at by certain people. We today are victims of what those who came before us considered as laws and customs for their protection. This is one of the tyrannies of social life. Let us take an example: Aristotle started observing how men live, he described the household activities of men in carrying on their livelihood. Someone, many centures after Aristotle, works out a law of supply and demand, and men become victims of the deduction. Money is invented, money is man's creature, but the idea takes on so well and so fast that men become victims of that creature. If we should go back to the origins of all of these institutions which bind our thought and cause us to be frightened, we should learn that they are all creatures of man.

There comes a time in the history of states, in the history of churches, that a shifting of the sense of values about what is important and essential and what is unimportant and nonessential causes men to lose much in an attempt to save little. When the great Jewish community had to face a new thought that arose in its own community, a thought which later became Christianity, the Jewish rulers developed a sense of loyalty to the entity which represented their unity and turned their backs upon the rights of individual man to accept a different approach to a fundamental thought. Later on among this same revolutionary Christian group, when absolute loyalty to its will became questioned, war, strife, and death to thousands of men resulted because of a conflict in loyalties. Those two great stands for an assumed attitude place right against right, producing conflicts responsible probably for more individual suffering in our western world than any other two concepts. The great antagonisms caused by these conflicts of loyalties can hardly be understood by an American today who has learned to live and to value his neighbor as a friend, even if that neighbor does worship his God in a way different from his own. Man's changed concepts in regard to persecution, forbearance, toleration, and appreciation have not lessened his faith in God or his love for truth. They have, though, given him different values for placing his loyalties.

Now, as America has shown us how to have many loyalties and still remain at peace with one another, can we not overcome unemployment by many activities without doing violence to a preconceived loyalty to what we call an economic or a social law? We say we do not like regimentation, we say that regimentation destroys individual initiative; but the interesting thing about the persons who live by these slogans is generally that their success is due almost entirely to their having been completely and thoroughly regimented. Once upon a time men tried to build a tower to heaven. They failed of their objective because they destroyed their own unity of action by talking different languages. We in America are talking different languages, and unity of action is thereby destroyed. We are all talking English, to be sure, but one group is proving this slogan, and another group is writing in accordance with that slogan, and a third group is refusing to do good because the effort interferes with some other slogan. Now, if those who want governmental action say that industry cannot solve this problem, and if those who are opposed to governmental action say that Government cannot solve the problem, and if those who favor State action say that the States must solve it because a Federal right is not involved, and those who favor Federal action say that the States must give over what has been their right to the bigger whole, why cannot we accept the thesis of every one of these and put to work industry, Federal Government, the State, and all, in the accomplishment of an end? If my little State of Utah can put at least 5,000 persons to work without Federal aid, let it do so. That benefits 5,000. Are we not all victims of our own slogans?

There seems at the present time to be one way out; there seems to be a unifying factor. We are now today building that unity on national defense. Sad to relate, we are thinking in terms of airplanes, antiaircraft guns, navies, instead of in the terms of men. But since the Greek dramatist discovered that men only unite for war but never for peace, we have found that unity comes easier in responding to the challenge of destruction. Let us accept that technique and overcome, if we can, the dulling effects of unemployment.

But such is the wrong way to move. It is the practical way because man long ago resigned himself to this habit. Why is it that even the success of Hitler's activities, which has brought the fear into the non-Hitler world, causes us to close our eyes to the real elements behind his success? It is because we see only the destruction wrought by the airplane and the submarine and the tank, failing to realize the human factors behind that destruction. Hitler united his nation by social, economic, and religious urges, by spiritualizing a people. He had them all marching for years before he started all his rearmament, his airplane, navy, and tank building. Before he had a military plane he had trained scores of pilots to fly the plane. As a result, these trained human beings were quick to see necessary improvements in the machines. If we build the machine first and train the person to run it later, that person thinks only in terms of mastering his machine. Does it not seem, therefore, better for us to unite our Nation by using every one of those institutions which contribute to the building of our Nation and the making of real American citizens to their utmost first and then turn to machines next? But, someone says, we have neglected the need too long, that it is actually the machine that we must have. Well, then, since we do not have the machine, we can at least train and make simultaneously.

Overcome unemployment, then, if you will, by expanding the activities of those institutions which America counts basic to her life. What are they? First of all, there are the schools. There is not equal opportunity for ordinary grammar-grade education in the United States. Next, expand our hospitals and their availability to doctors. Build the health of our Nation, and the wealth of our Nation will follow. Build and expand to the utmost the activities of our Army and our Navy, stressing always the peacetime socializing activities of those two great institutions. Expand and make greater our large conservation services, including the recreational services, so that wealth might be conserved and leisure create even more wealth. But this process means governmental activity, say some. But does it? I do not know yet which came first, the chicken or the egg, and I do not know now whether the development of the automobile is due to our great road-building program, or whether our road-building program is due to the development of our automobile industry. I do not care. I do know that good roads will make for more automobiles, and if we must justify them on the score of national defense, they will make for more security for our land. A land of happy, contented, busy, healthful people will add to our national defense. No army was ever hurt because it was made up of strong, healthy, well-trained soldiers who knew why they were fighting and understood well what they were fighting for.

Now, then, I have said enough to show that I am never going to support a single panacea as a cure-all for an intensely complex social evil. But I will support every activity on the part of industry, government, and church which will contribute toward the building of better men physically, socially, mentally; and I can justify my position on the score of building our Nation, developing our common defense, or making democracy secure. There is no one single essential thing in society. There are many essentials, but to me there is nothing in society that is quite so much worth while as the individual who composes it. Develop him and society benefits.

Now, for fear someone may assume that I want to change our whole social and economic system to integrate all activities and thereby create a united whole, let me say that such is not the case. I want to build Americans around the fundamentals of the finest things that America has produced. America as a political and social entity has brought more real happiness and has raised the standards of life for more individuals than has any other political and social institution ever brought into existence. Within the range of this great America of ours, there is room for individual differences, for diverse occupations, both of which can be maintained in a classless society if we but extend to all the possibilities of a well-rounded American life. That can all be done by united endeavor; but where unity brings the loss of the concept of the worth of the individual, it is not for America's good. America can build great monuments like the Pyramids which will live through the ages, but those monuments will stand, as the Pyramids do today, as monuments to the fact that man values what he makes greater than he values himself. If you do not believe that is true, please tell me who were the architects of the great Pyramids? Who were the contractors in the building of the great Pyramids? Who were the stonecutters? And who had charge of the transportation? How many lives were sacrificed in their making? Because the structures were regarded more highly than the men who built them, they stand today as monuments to a dead civilization and a dead nation.

I want to build out of America a society of men—not a monument of rock. If we could have the living spirit of George Washington with us today, we would willingly sacrifice the inspiration of the Washington Monument. But I would probably know that Washington would tell us what he knew so well during his life's struggles—that men would appreciate what he was doing in his day only when they built his greatness in stone. Man values that which he himself has made greater than he values himself because man can see and appreciate what he has made. If man could become more of a partner with God in accomplishing the eternal purposes, maybe he could learn the worth of God's finest creation—man. If we would but realize the wealth-producing possibilities of every man, we would not long leave one idle. The waste that comes from idle hands is society's greatest economic loss. The loss to a nation's morale which comes from 10,000,000 idle, discouraged, and dulled brains staggers any mind which will contemplate it. The vitalization of 10,000,000 souls saved from misspent lives would brighten our Nation as if it were charged with electricity. If you would have life, and that more abundantly, make it more abundant for those 10,000,000 and you make it more abundant for yourself. Let us be done with the waste that comes from 10,000,000 idle men.

Federal Administrative Procedure

OF

HON. CARL A. HATCH

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 6 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. WILLIAM H. KING, OF UTAH

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, on the 18th day of May the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] delivered an address on the National Grange hour, over stations of the National Broadcasting Co., explaining the purposes, the provisions, the objections and the issues involved in the consideration of the Logan-Walter bill. I ask that the address be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The so-called Logan-Walter bill is a measure of very great importance. Many believe that it is as important as the so-called Court-reorganization bill, which some have denominated the Court-packing bill. This measure was the result of prolonged study by the Judiciary Committees of the House and the Senate. Senator Logan, one of the great men of the Senate, a jurist and a patriot, offered the bill in the Senate, and had charge of it until his untimely death. Representative WALTER, a distinguished lawyer, introduced the bill in the House and piloted it through to its passage. Two hundred and eighty-two Members of the House voted in favor of the bill, and only 97 against it.

This measure has received the almost unanimous approval of the leading newspapers of the United States, and has met with general approval in all parts of the country.

PURPOSES OF THE BILL

The measure is designed to regulate the regulators and to govern the governors—the men and women employed in the executive branch of the United States Government to administer and enforce the statutes enacted by the Congress. There are hundreds of thousands of Federal employees, all of whom are appointed except the President, who is, of course, elected by the people.

As indicated, this measure is intended to regulate and control administrative officers and employees of the Federal Government in the exercise of their quasi-legislative power and also their quasi-judicial power. The authority of administrative officers to issue rules and regulations is a legislative power—a power conferred by the Constitution on the Congress, but which the Congress cannot, as a practical matter, exercise with respect to the details of many statutes which it is required to consider and finally enact into law to meet the important and serious problems that confront it.

In the exercise of this legislative power, the Federal administrative procedure bill contemplates and requires that Federal administrative officers shall issue regulations; that they shall give notice of their intention to issue particular regulations; and that they shall hold public hearings—if such hearings be requested—before the regulations are issued, in order, as the late Chief Justice Taft stated, that those affected by the statutes, whether Government employees or private individuals, may know how the statutes are to be enforced.

The bill further provides that if any individual is substantially affected by such a regulation when issued, and believes it to be illegal, he may petition the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, within 30 days from the date the regulation is published, to review the same for the purpose of determining whether the regulation is in accordance with the Constitution and the statutes under which it is issued.

Regulations have been reviewed in the courts for a century and a half, if and when such regulations were involved in the merits of some case before such courts. But such a review rarely takes place until several years after the regulation has been issued and after much of the mischief has resulted from an illegal regulation. By the procedure for an immediate review after the regulation has been issued and published, the Logan-Walter bill provides that the legality of the regulation may be determined before the mischief has resulted in the piling up of vast numbers of disputes which must thereafter be settled either by the courts or by means of private bills in the Congress for the relief of those adversely affected by the illegal rule.

PROVISION FOR FULL AND FAIR HEARINGS

As to the exercise of the quasi-judicial authority by any one or more of these hundreds of thousands of Federal administrative officers and employees, the bill requires that the individual shall have a full and fair hearing before his controversy is decided; that he shall have the right to summon witnesses, as he now has in a Federal district court, without obtaining the leave of such administrative officers; that everything which happens at the hearings shall be made a part of the written record of that hearing, so that the reviewing officials, and later the courts, may be informed as to whether there has been a full and fair hearing by officers and employees acting in a truly judicial manner; and also that the deciding administrative officers shall write out their findings of facts and their decisions on the law. As has been well said by Mr. Justice Frankfurter, we all are safer if the deciding officials are required to write out why they think what they think.

In order to insure that the Federal administrative officials, in their exercise of quasi-judicial power in the enforcement or application of statutes, do observe the procedural safeguards stated in the Logan-Walter bill, it is further provided in this bill that all decisions of these administrative officers may be reviewed in one of the various United States circuit courts of appeals located throughout the United States.

This is for the purpose of bringing the judicial review closer to the homes of the individuals who may be affected, so as to relieve them of the time and expense of coming to Washington in many matters, and to insure that the administrative decision is in accord with both the law and the facts. It is intended by the bill that the scope of judicial review shall be approximately that which has existed with respect to the Interstate Commerce Commission for half a century, and as to trial courts, sitting without a jury, for a century and a half.

MEASURE HAS STRONG BACKING

Before this bill was overwhelmingly passed by the House of Representatives it had behind it the unanimous report of the House Committee on the Judiciary, save for one member who dissented, but admitted in his dissenting report that some of these administrative officers had usurped the power of both the Congress and the courts. A corresponding bill had been unanimously reported by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, and is now on the calendar of the Senate. The House bill has been carefully considered by the Senate Judiciary Committee since it passed the House. This committee has directed that a few amendments be offered to the House bill, and that it be called up for passage at this session of Congress.

In addition to this approval by both the House and Senate Judiciary Committees, the bill in substantially its present form has been considered by committees of, and upon their reports approved by, the following organizations: The American Bar Association, the National Association of Women Lawyers, and the State Bar Associations of Arizona, California, Colorado, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Louisiana, Maryland, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, New Hampshire, North Carolina, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Texas, my home State bar of Utah, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia, and Wisconsin. It likewise has been studied and approved by the city bar associations of Boston, Chicago (in principle), Cleveland, Dallas, New Orleans, Philadelphia, Phoenix, and St. Louis. The bill has the approval of county bar associations too numerous to mention throughout the United States.

The members of the House and Senate Judiciary Committees, as well as the members of all of the national, State, and city bar associations which I have just mentioned as approving the bill, are lawyers—but the lawyers do not stand alone in approving the bill.

Various other organizations and members of other businesses and professions have likewise studied the bill through their respective committees, and, based upon reports from such committees, the bill has received the approval and support of the National Grange, an important and honored farm organization whose master has just concluded an able address, the American Federation of Labor, the National Publishers Association, the National Council of Mail Users, Inc., the National Association of Electrical Contractors, the American Manufacturers Association, the United States Chamber of Commerce, the American Coalition of Patriotic Societies, the Good Government Society, the Citizens Emergency Council, the National Association of Master Plumbers of America, the National Association of Piping, Heating, and Air Conditioning Contractors, the California, Illinois, New York, and Ohio State Chambers of Commerce, and a number of State manufacturers' associations, as well as numerous other local business and professional groups.

Notwithstanding the measure has such universal approval, it has encountered some opposition in the Senate, and the opposition has, thus far, prevented its passage. It is opposed by some employees in a number of the Federal bureaus—employees who have not been elected, but have been appointed. Undoubtedly there are some who do not want to be regulated and controlled by the law in the exercise of their quasi-legislative and quasi-judicial functions.

"REASONS GIVEN" FOR OPPOSITION

It is pertinent to inquire as to some of the "reasons given" for opposition to the bill. I say the "reasons given" advisedly, for the real opposition, I assume, is due to the same fact which resulted in supporting the court-packing bill; that is, that these individuals believe that the Constitution of the United States is unsuited to present-day conditions, with its tripartite division of limited governmental powers among the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of the Government, and the balance of governmental power reserved in that Constitution to the States or to the people in such States. Some may have looked with favor across the seas to totalitarian governments of both ancient and modern times, where all power was and is concentrated in the hands of kings or dictators. These were and are governments where the executive, legislative, and judicial power is controlled by one man or one authority.

The American people are not yet ready to adopt the English system of government, with no written constitution, nor the totalitarian system of Germany, Italy, and Soviet Russia. Special objections to the form of the bill are advanced while professing agreement with its principles. As former judge and former Governor of New York, Nathan L. Miller, has so well said:

"By the process of trial and error administrative law has been hit upon as the most effective weapon to destroy our institutions. Through its channels those who have been well called termites can safely attack the foundations of our American system, for it has been discovered that administrative law screens them from judicial scrutiny. Oh, I know that when one swelled with arrogance oversteps the forms of due process he may not escape the judicial eye, but most of them are clever enough scrupulously to observe all the forms while disregarding the substance of due process, and they can do it in such a way as to thwart judicial review, as we all know."

THE ISSUE BRIEFLY STATED

The issue is up to the American people and that issue is simply this: Shall the Federal administrative agencies of government, in the exercise of quasi-legislative and quasi-judicial power—power which constitutionally belongs to the Congress and to the courts, respectively, but which for convenience has been lodged in these administrative agencies—follow in a modified form the procedure followed by the Congress in the exercise of legislative power and by the courts in the exercise of judicial power? Or shall they be independent of control by either of the constitutional branches of the Federal Government in the exercise of the respective powers?

Notwithstanding the general support for this bill, we have been unable to obtain, thus far, a vote, even though it was passed at a former session, and was returned to the calendar with the understanding that it was to be considered at the next session of Congress.

The American people have regarded as the crowning glory of this Republic the fact that an independent judiciary has been created, and to it the people look to guard their liberties and to prevent encroachment upon individual rights and upon the authority of communities and of sovereign States. The present distinguished Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, Mr. Hughes, stated on the 16th of this month before the American Law Institute:

"If democratic institutions are to survive, it will not be simply by maintaining majority rule and by swift adaptations to the demands of the moment, but by dominance of a sense of justice which will not long survive if judicial processes do not conserve it. Men pass—the institution survives, with the Nation keenly conscious of the necessity of safeguarding the independence of its courts and maintaining its impartial service."

The Federal administrative procedure bill is aimed at establishing and maintaining the independent and impartial exercise of judicial power, whether by the Federal administrative agencies or by the courts.

Commendation of President Roosevelt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 6 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE EAST SIDE NEWS

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial which appeared in the East Side News, of New York City, on May 25, 1940.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the East Side News of May 25, 1940]

ROOSEVELT—WORLD SAVIOR

(By Harry H. Schlacht)

While we commemorate Memorial Day with ever-deepening gratitude that our Nation is still at peace, not the least cause of our thankfulness is that God, who gave us Washington, Lincoln, and Wilson, will in His infinite goodness again give us Roosevelt who shall rescue the Nation from the charlatan, the demagogue, and the spoilsman.

President Roosevelt stands before the world today in clear and undisturbed light as a model ruler of democracy; a man "strong without rage, with overflowing full"; with sagacity and resolution and of a visioned faith which has been our anchorage ground in the stormiest times. He has assumed the heaviest burdens that ever descended on man since Washington knelt in the snow and Lincoln watched the Confederate flag across the Potomac.

The world is aflame. The civilization that we know is now being torn by the mightiest struggle of all history. Sparks from Europe's conflagration are blazing in our own skies; echoes of her strife are sounding at our very doors. The fire still burns; that struggle still continues, but Roosevelt has held the flame at bay.

We do not defend but proclaim the New Deal. We need to retain and reelect to the highest office within the gift of our people a man who has equipped himself so that he may acquit himself in this national emergency. We ask this in the name of democracy which is national in its historic background, in its approach and its willingness to deal with national problems in an American way. Government must enlarge its field of activity and supervision to the end that the weak may be protected against the strong and rapacious and that the approximation of justice may be attained among all classes of our people.

It was this impatience with the blighting atmosphere of the political and social antiquarian that made Jefferson the foremost liberal of his day; that drove Andrew Jackson on a course for which he was denounced as a bold ruffian; that inspired Abe Lincoln toward a goal for which he was described as the earthly incarnation of buffoonery, and that Woodrow Wilson was cynically pictured as a dreamy professor bent on political and social experimentation. Roosevelt finds himself in a glorious companionship with these grave spirits who spurned futility and negation.

President Roosevelt will yield to the draft. This is definite. The voters of America will speak in tones of thunder and the popular cry will flash like lightning hailing his nomination and election. Though the President has not had a panacea for every trouble that beset our Nation, he possesses a wealth of human understanding for every human problem and for the hopes and the aspiration of the American people.

Roosevelt has restored the faith from which must spring the defenders of the flag and Constitution. He has renewed and reinforced the belief that Government and trusted leaders may hear and heed the cry of the humblest worshipers at the shrine of equality. He has revitalized the answer to the question which has rung through all the ages: "Am I my brother's keeper?" He has sought to establish an order that will give every man, woman, and child the right to stand erect in pride and self-respect to see the stars on high and share the glory of the sun.

OF

HON. HOWARD W. SMITH

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 6, 1940

OPINION OF THE UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following amended opinion of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit:

[In the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit. National Labor Relations Board, petitioner, v. Sterling Electric Motors, Inc., respondent. No. 9209. May 7, 1940. Revised May 14, 1940]

Upon rehearing on petition for enforcement of an order of the National Labor Relations Board

Before: Denman, Mathews, and Healy, circuit judges.

Denman, circuit judge:

Our opinion in the first hearing of this review appears in 109 F. (2d) 194. The National Labor Relations Board has petitioned for and we have granted it a rehearing of the entire proceeding. The contentions argued covered a much wider area than those of the briefs. This opinion concerns the issue of the right of Sterling Electric Motors, Inc., Employees Association, a self-organized inside or company union, to be made a party or to have notice and an opportunity to be heard before it can be destroyed by the Board's order of nonrecognition and disestablishment. We discuss and attempt to appraise the congressional intent under the Board's renewed contention that Congress conferred on it this kind of administrative absolutism.

As stated in our first opinion, it was for the "protecting" of the laborers' human right to regulate their creative effort in American society, with their increased power in union organization, that Congress created the Board. Its "protecting" extends as much to the self-organized unions, provided for in section 1 of the act,[1] as to the powerful unions already existing and seeking to increase their membership.

In this case the destruction was attempted by an order forbidding the employer to bargain with its employees' union for higher wages, shorter hours, or better working conditions—the destroyed functions being the only ones for which the employees created it. The men's association was not made a party or given notice and an opportunity to be heard in the proceeding.

One of the contentions of the Board is that the Union, organized solely to bargain collectively with the employer, is not destroyed because the order does not "run against" the union, but only orders the employer not to have anything to do with it. To us this contention is as absurd as if old Procrustes of the Greek myth had said to an athlete captured on his journey to the Olympics. "You are not to be destroyed for the races for I am proceeding to cut off only the one leg which happens to protrude over the footboard of my bed. If you are barred at the starting line, it is only because you are indirectly affected. My sword 'runs against' your leg—not against you. Besides, I maintain, Lycurgus has given an opinion stating that you are not a 'necessary party' to the amputating process I administer. Can't you see I am only 'protecting' you from running with that leg?" Yet, the Board insists, such was the congressional intent with respect to its and, necessarily, all the many other administrative processes created by Congress.

As well could it be argued by another board, created for "protecting" religious instead of labor organizations (successfully argued perhaps in cases in which the board meets no opposing counsel), that an order does not necessarily affect the religious freedom of the worshippers, though it "runs against" one bishop to "withdraw all recognition from" the parishes of his diocese, or against other bishops to "disestablish" their missionaries, or against the convention to ignore its baptizing clergy, or against the rabbi to disband his congregation, or against the Synod to refuse to consider anything from the Presbyters, or against the Indian priests to withdraw their clans from their ceremonial dances in prayer for rain in the desert. We are not in accord with the view that, where the denial of any such constitutional right appears in any case, it is then "ill-advised" to afford the injured persons the court's judicial power, or to describe with emphasis the wrong done,[2] whether the "protecting" assault be on a mundane or a religious liberty.

The reargument offered nothing new on the Board's contention that Congress intended to relieve the Board of the burden (sic) of serving notice of the charges and time of hearing on the officials of the union in the same plant as that of the employer, who must be served, with the corollary implication of the vexation to the Board, as prosecutor, in meeting the union's evidence, the cross-examination of the Board's witnesses and the argument of the union's counsel, and of the disturbance to the Board, as judge, in facility in reaching a decision on its own charges.

The Board did not, because it cannot, deny that the employer's interest at the time of the trial often may be quite different from, and opposed to, that of the absent union. The employer himself then may want to destroy the union, either because he cannot control it, or because a more powerful rival threatens a strike and a picket line. He then may "ride to a fall" at the hearing, preferring to submit to an order to desist from something already prohibited by the statute, to the pressure of a disliked union he does not control, or to a costly shut-down which may throw him into bankruptcy. The likelihood of such motivation of the employer, whose trial the Board claims determines the life of the union, is obvious not only to those of us who have had intimate contact with industrial disputes of the recent decades, but to anyone who gives the consideration required here of employer psychology. We cannot believe that Congress ignored it, or rather, would have ignored it if, when the Labor Board bill was under discussion, some Congressman then had had the temerity to propose that the Board should destroy a union without notice and an opportunity to be heard.

Nor has the Board made any answer to the obvious fact that it is a greater evil wrongfully to destroy the union itself than it is to destroy a mere contract made by the union with the employer, leaving the union still existing for future bargaining. If it be true as held in Consolidated Edison Co. v. National Labor Relations Board (305 U. S. 197, 233), that due process requires notice and hearing when a contract between the union and employer is sought to be destroyed, a fortiori, is it true where the life of the union is at stake?

The case loses none of its importance because, recently, the Board, for the time being at least, divested itself of the power it claims Congress gave it to deny to a union its civil liberty of notice and an opportunity to be heard. This was done by the Board's promulgation of a rule granting that right. The right now exists, the Board claims, solely by virtue of its grant. The Board makes strong and now repeated insistence, first, that Congress can create in the administrative process such absolutism of control over human relations and, second, that it intended to create it in the Labor Board. It is apparent that the Board may annul its rule, attempt to abrogate the right and reassume the absolute power it claims. Significant is the absence at the hearing of any request by the Board for a return of this proceeding for service on the employees' association, to give it an opportunity to be heard on the charge of employer dominance.

Preliminarily it may be said that this court recognizes that no case subject to our review could show more clearly the need for a wise and deliberative exercise of the national administrative process which Congress has created for the control of labor relations in industrial plants throughout the United States. This proceeding was initiated by a Nation-wide union of the American Federation of Labor. It was seeking to bring into its organization the seventy-odd employees of a small manufacturing plant in Los Angeles, Calif. A rival union, organized by the men within the plant, had a membership of 75 percent of the employees. The great brotherhood's national organizers filed a complaint which led to the Board proceeding in which the destroying order removed its rival. None of the national organizers was an employee of the plant. One of them had his headquarters in Chicago. The central control of the national union was in Washington, with a power and prestige in the American industrial world which, in large part, arises from its millions of associated employee members in unions in every State. It was such cases as this which must have quickened the congressional intent to enact section 1 of the National Labor Relations Act.

In one of the earliest decisions after National Labor Relations Board v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation (304 U. S. 1), this court in Edwards v. United States (91 F. (2d) 767, 780), construed that decision as extending the congressional power even to the planting in California of orange trees whose product is "to be transported" in interstate commerce. It was on this construction of the act that we upheld the Secretary of Agriculture regulating the flow of the product of orange trees into interstate commerce. True, that statement of the law was by two of the three judges sitting, but it now stands for this circuit as a declaration of the broad area of congressional administrative power under the commerce clause. In that and a succession of cases this court has recognized the congressional intent in a widely expanding creation of administrative agencies. Nor has any court gone further in recognizing the congressional intent to free the Labor Board's administrative process from the technicalities of court procedure (National Labor Relations Board v. Biles-Coleman Lumber Co. (98 F. (2d) 16, 17).

The many cases now decided show that, under penalizing restraints or offer of reward, the fruit grower now must consider a Washington bureau's decision before he may safely add orange or walnut trees to the few acres of his orchard, and a small farmer must do the same before he determines his plowing for next season's crop. The shutdown of the single lumber plant supporting a mill town, by the heavy penalties we impose for infractions of the Labor Relations Act, well may mean the disruption of the family life of the employees, whose children must shift to the schools of a distant plant's neighborhood, the foreclosures of homes with the loss of part payments and, worse than this, the mental agony of parents and children that the supporting father may be marked with the stigma of the jobless and indigent.

These disturbing and often tragic results may be deemed to have been considered by Congress as necessary for the ultimate good of the creative life of Americans. However, because that good is to be obtained by powerful bureaus radiating out, through a major and minor officialdom from a distant Washington, the danger to our democracy is always present of the denial of those civil liberties upon which its existence depends. If the Anglo-American civil right to be made a party and to have notice and hearing must be observed in the orderly procedure of a court of law before a decision, as here, can immediately and directly destroy a citizen's property or his liberty to contract to form a labor association, a fortiori must it be recognized in the looser proceedings we have recognized before subordinate and superior bureau officers, whose administrative decisions are finally made far from the homes of the regulated persons.

It has been said that the Board is accuser, prosecutor, judge, and executioner. This is obvious as to the first three functions. In our democracy their exercise requires the greatest of wisdom and detachment when, as here, the accuser and prosecutor sits as judge. The orders it made in this case are not final against the employer, who is a party in the Board proceeding and has the right to appear here and defend against a petition for our decree of enforcement. With regard to the destruction of the absent union the situation is entirely different.

Here, so far as concerns that destruction, the Board, at the instigation of a rival, accuses the union of employer dominance, the Board's attorneys prosecute the accusation, the Board hears and determines the truth of the charge, and the Board orders the execution of the union by its disestablishment. The Board's orders against the employer, a party, may be regarded as preliminary rules to be made absolute by our decree after a hearing of the employer's defense. So far as concerns any defense which could have been made by the absent executed union, denied its civil liberty of due process, without opportunity to produce witnesses, cross-examine, or to be heard in argument, our decree, the Board claims, must make the preliminary rule absolute.

This is the kind of administrative absolutism denounced in democratic assemblies in America as characteristic of the totalitarianism of the Central European Powers. In the consideration of congressional intent, the polemics of deeply moved public men, whose apprehensions are now realized in the conquest of two of the Scandinavian democracies, are not to be ignored. We do not believe that Congress in the National Labor Relations Act intended to make a long start on the road where our civil liberties are to be regarded as the "pale phantoms of objective law" which no longer control our deliberations, as the German chief justice of the first session of the newly constituted court in conquered Poland is reported to have told his colleagues.

It is our opinion that when the Labor Board bill was under consideration, if any Congressman had stated that such absolute power was intended to be conferred on the Board, it would have been denied promptly by the bill's advocates. If its statement had been persistently pressed as expressing the proper congressional intent, we would have expected that its author would have been shouted into silence.

In making these comments we are not oblivious of the heavy burden thrown on the Labor Board in creating a Nation-wide organization in a period of devastating labor disturbance, nor have we failed to take account of the vast number of labor disputes it successfully has solved, both by conference and formal procedure. That a Federal board so burdened should grasp for power as it does in this case is to be expected. To curtail this inevitable overreaching is one of the first necessities of a democratic government and is one of the most important duties of our courts.

The Board cites the same cases of the Supreme Court and circuit courts of appeals on which it relied on the first hearing. In none was there counsel presenting the violation of the civil liberties of the employees and their union. Particularly was there none in National Labor Relations Board v. Pennsylvania Greyhound (303 U. S. 261), where the Board, free of anyone affected to present the question of civil liberty there involved, was able to destroy the absent union.

The Board correctly claims that its advocacy in other cases has succeeded in destroying other absent unions. It also claims it has established the denial of such civil liberty as a part of our administrative law.

In our first opinion we decided that these cases have been overruled by or are not in accord with Morgan v. United States (304 U. S. 1, 22, 21), in which administrative proceedings are commanded to observe "the cherished judicial tradition embodying the basic concepts of fair play" and in them men are to have their day in court and to be given the "essentials of a full and fair hearing, with the right * * * to have a reasonable opportunity to know the claims advanced against them * * *." Cf. National Labor Relations Board v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation (301 U. S. 1, 47). Our decision in this regard is confirmed by a recent opinion of Mr. Justice McReynolds, who concurred in the result. In that case, in reviewing the area and content of the expanding administrative law, the Court, through Justice Frankfurter stated:

"* * * To be sure, the laws under which these agencies operate prescribe the fundamentals of fair play. They require that interested parties be afforded an opportunity for hearing and that judgment must express a reasoned conclusion * * *."

The Board cites as determining the congressional intent to create the absolute power claimed here the case of National Labor Relations Board v. National Licorice Co. (— U. S. —, 84 L. Ed. 533). The report of that case shows no counsel representing the employees or the union. As we read the opinion, the petition for certiorari raised no question of the disestablishment of the union. The case involves the individual contracts of employees with the employer, which on their face showed agreements in violation of the act. The decision that the employer should not perform such obvious violations involves no denial of civil liberty or of the doctrine of fair play established (or rather recognized as fundamental law) in the Morgan and Pottsville cases. The National Licorice case does not mention either of these two decisions.

The National Licorice opinion (85 L. Ed. at 541) holds, in the language of section 1 of the act, the function of the Board to be that of "protecting the exercise by workers of full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of their own choosing for the purpose of negotiating the terms and conditions of their employment." Our attention has not been directed to any statute in which Congress has declared its intent to afford such "protecting" which consciously has been held to afford it by condemning the protected party in absentia and ordering its execution. Hence, we cannot believe that the Supreme Court in the Licorice opinion holds that Congress, while intending such "protecting," made it mere mockery by conferring on the Board the power to destroy by disestablishment a union, so self-organized, or to frustrate it in the performance of the very functions which the act requires the Board to protect, without making it a party or giving it an opportunity to be heard.

Before we deem ourselves required to recognize that Congress intended such a denial of civil liberty, the Congress or the Supreme Court, we trust in a case in which the union, absent at the Board hearing, is there represented by counsel, will have to declare it in language so plain that no other possible inference may be drawn from it. We adhere to our detailed reasoning and holding expressed in our first opinion (pp. 196 to 200, 109 F. (2d)).

On the suggestion of the Board that further evidence might be taken on the issue of alleged fraud of the respondent in statements in its notice to its employees, considered on pages 204 to 208 of our original opinion, the respondent applied for an order, which we have granted, for a reference on that issue. The Board has advised us that many of the employee-witnesses are widely scattered since the hearing in October 1937, and that it will take a substantial time to prepare to meet the respondent's proffered testimony outlined in its application. The evidence offered in all likelihood will have to be passed upon by the trial examiner and later in Washington by the Board itself, and several weeks more may transpire before the issue is decided and returned to this court. That the Board does not regard the case as likely to be "moot" is apparent from its statement at one of the several sessions, in response to an inquiry as to the time to be consumed in the referred proceeding, that "the respondent will want to except to the decision."

Since our decision of this issue of disestablishment and frustration disposes of the Board's orders as affecting the association, and since the Board insists on asserting its power to destroy the union without granting it or its members the civil liberty here discussed and has not suggested even now that it will reopen the case as a whole and serve notice on the association, as its present rule requires, we decide it now. We leave to our later consideration the orders solely affecting the employer. Further to delay with regard to this small, self-organized union might amount to an unfair labor practice on the part of this court, for in that period the pressure of the Board's order and of its powerful rival well may persuade the men to give up their self-organization as hopeless, and the protection of section 1 of the act a vain delusion.

The Board's petition for enforcement of its order that the respondent employer shall not bargain collectively with the association and that respondent shall disestablish that union is denied. Decision on the petition for enforcement of other orders of the Board is reserved.

Healy, circuit judge, dissenting.

On the reargument in this case respondent Sterling Motors applied to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence, in conformity with section 10 (e) of the act. Leave was granted and the matter is again before the Board for the taking of further testimony. The point of fact to be inquired into is the crucial one on which the Board largely predicated its finding of an unfair labor practice and its order disestablishing the employee union as a bargaining agency.

The statute, section 10 (e), provides that the Board may "modify its findings as to the facts, or make new findings, by reason of additional evidence so taken and filed, and it shall file such modified or new findings, * * * and shall file its recommendations, if any, for the modification or setting aside of its original order."

In this posture of the case, with the question of law dealt with in the majority opinion threatening to become moot, I regard its decision at this, and for the second, time as not only unnecessary but as ill advised. That would be true, I think, even though the question were still open to rational debate. But debate, in inferior Federal courts at least, has been foreclosed by National Labor Relations Board v. National Licorice Co., decided March 4, of this year.

There the Supreme Court unanimously rejected the construction given the act by this court in its original opinion (109 F. (2d) 194). In the present opinion the majority merely reiterate what they said before. While studiously aimed at the Board, the real target of the present attack would seem to be the labor relations law itself or the Supreme Court's interpretation of it.

Federal Administrative Procedure

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR CAPPER
OF KANSAS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 6 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

RESOLUTION OF THE KANSAS STATE BAR ASSOCIATION

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a copy of a resolution adopted by the Kansas State Bar Association on May 27, 1939, endorsing House bill 4236 and Senate bill 915, the so-called Walter-Logan bill, to provide for the more expeditious settlement of disputes with the United States, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE KANSAS STATE BAR ASSOCIATION, MAY 27, 1939

Be it resolved, That the State Bar Association of Kansas hereby endorses H. R. 4236 and S. 915, companion bills now pending in Congress, known as the American Bar Association administrative law bill, and the Senators and Congressmen thereby are requested to support said bills; be it further

Resolved, That the essential principles which are involved in H. R. 4236 and S. 915 should be applied, so far as possible, to administrative boards and commissions created and operating under the laws of the State of Kansas. These principles so endorsed are as follows:

1. The general rules and regulations of procedure applicable to all hearings should be adopted, promulgated, and published by each board and commission.

2. Any interested party should have the right to question any rule or regulation so promulgated upon the ground that it violates the Federal or State Constitutions or is arbitrary and unreasonable.

3. Any party interested in a controversy before such board or commission should have the right to a public hearing with privilege of counsel, the right to produce testimony and to examine and cross-examine witnesses.

4. The board or commission should be required to make written findings of fact upon which any order is based.

5. Any party to a controversy aggrieved by any order of the board or commission should have the right to appeal to the courts to determine whether the order complained of is supported by the findings of fact, whether or not the parties have been accorded a fair and open hearing, and whether or not the findings of fact are supported by proper and substantial evidence.

National Labor Relations Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN LESINSKI
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 6, 1940

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in regard to the Norton and Smith amendments and include therein expressions in regard to the labor situation in the industrial areas in Michigan, as well as communications I have received from Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, and my replies thereto.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to any changes in the National Labor Relations Act at this time because I am of the opinion that the act has not been in force for a sufficient length of time to enable those who have charge of its administration to determine its benefits in entirety, as well as any shortcomings or changes that experience would enable them to properly recommend to the Congress.

I realize that many individuals, as well as Members of Congress, are of the opinion that too long a time elapses from the time a complaint is made to the Board before it is finally acted upon. In fact, I have received a communication from Mr. Clinton E. Van Pelten, Route 2, Reese, Mich., upon this very subject. I am of the opinion that the contents of this communication are of sufficient importance to call to the attention of the entire Congress, and I am therefore inserting it in my remarks at this point.

REESE, MICH., April 22, 1940.

Mr. JOHN LESINSKI,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In regard to the Norton amendment, which has been sponsored by the A. F. L. to the National Labor Relations Act, it is, if truly quoted, to divide the union into several small groups so as to reduce their strength. If this is done, then there might as well be no union. To reduce their bargaining power would be a step backward instead of forward.

Let us take for example the A. F. of L. craft union; it has small groups which must maintain a complete set of officers for each group. That is where the cost of $5 to $7 a month dues comes in, but that is a small matter compared to what a small group of craftsmen must go through. For instance, if the dye makers had a just grievance and went on strike, and the Buick Co. said, "Grievance or no grievance, if you men do not come back to work, we will get dyes made in other States or in other countries, which has been done, and as soon as these dyes come, we will start the production without you."

Perhaps you do not understand what procedure we must go through under the present law and contract in order to call a strike. The grievance must be taken by the man or men to their foreman; then if they cannot come to some settlement, the man or men tell their foreman that they want to see their committeeman, and under the contract signed by General Motors, the foreman must go to the department head under which the committeeman works, and tell him that the committeeman is wanted in his department. The committeeman talks with the men and then goes to the foreman, and if they cannot settle it, he must ask the man or men if he and the foreman should go to the superintendent. If they say "Yes," the foreman and the committeeman must go to the superintendent, and if it cannot be settled there, it must be turned in to the management on Monday morning to be taken up the following Wednesday, and if it is not settled in this office, it must be appealed to the Flint Chevrolet central office. The Flint central office looks over the case and notifies the management on what Wednesday they will come to the plant to hear and discuss the case. Then if it is not settled it can be appealed to the Detroit office and notice will be sent to the management on what date the men can come from the General Motors office in Detroit to the plant to meet with the management and the committee to discuss the case. If it is not settled then, it can be appealed to the heads of the Detroit office and notice will be given when the heads of the Detroit office can meet with an international representative. If it is still not settled, if it goes further, it must be voted on by the executive board and referred back to the local union for action. In order to vote a strike vote of a local union, it must be a 75-percent vote of the paid-up membership, and then if voted to strike, a 5-day notice must be given.

To me, this seems a great drama of labor which is being played in the "richest country in the world." After all, when Mr. Lewis wanted Mr. Green to organize the semiskilled workers in America, Mr. Green's answer was "No," but not so with Mr. Lewis. When Mr. Green realized what a mistake he had made by not heeding Mr. Lewis' warning, he is now trying to disrupt organized semiskilled labor at their expense.

On April 7, 1940, in the T. M. A. in Flint, we did not have all different kinds of unions called to Flint to pack the T. M. A. with 18,000 men and 7,000 more who could not get into the building. The C. I. O. called the labor from the factory.

On April 14, 1940, in the T. M. A. in Flint, Mr. Green, of the A. F. of L. held a meeting. In his paper notice he called for different craft unions and auto labor, and I was at both meetings, and I believe I can honestly say that Mr. Green did not have a total of more than 5,000 men in the T. M. A. Sunday, April 14, 1940, and when Homer Martin aroce to speak hundreds of men got up and left the building.

The Reverend Father Neil O'Connor, of Saginaw, spoke at the rally in Flint on April 7, 1940. He said, "Make no mistake, the Catholic Church takes no sides on this issue, but leaves it up to labor which side they shall choose, of their own free will, of the unions they want to represent them, as guaranteed them under the Constitution of the United States."

It is merely a matter of choice, and the choice was taken on April 17, 1940. The C. I. O. won by a wide sweeping victory in the General Motor's empire by a 3 to 1 majority of 55 plants out of 60.

Tell me why Congress should meddle with anything which is all over and done with by the vote of April 17, 1940, which was done under the National Labor Relations Board. It was the choice of labor by a secret ballot. Could anything be made plainer to Congress what labor wants? Is there anything un-American about this kind of a choice? On page 1 I explained the steps by which a grievance must be handled. Is there anything un-American about the procedure of handling a grievance? If so, what is it?

Congress can take a very unkindly act toward labor by passing the Norton amendments.

When we Americans go to vote for Representatives in Congress we cast our ballot in secret just as it was done in this National Labor election of April 17. You are chosen by a majority of the people. Nobody can come along and say "Let's change the law and throw them out." That is just what the Norton amendments mean to do, tear down what labor has built, destroy what free-minded and free-thinking people choose to represent them as by the secret ballot of April 17, which was won by a majority of 3 to 1. Is there anything un-American about asking Congress to recognize a 3 to 1 majority?

Respectfully yours,

CLINTON E. VAN PELTEN.

It is a matter of common knowledge that the majority of manufacturers of the United States are not in favor of the National Labor Relations Act as it is in force today. That very fact alone would indicate to any clear-thinking person that the provisions of the law as now in force are of great benefit to the laboring class of people of the United States. In fact the National Labor Relations Act has been termed, since its very inception, as "labor's bill of rights."

One of the largest manufacturers in the United States today, in fact, individually he is the largest not only in the United States, but the entire world, is not in accord with the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act and never has been, and it is well known that he has only complied with what sections of it he has been compelled to by court order. He has fought the provisions of the act from its inception and today stands out among the manufacturing people of this country, as well as the laboring people, as the one man who has built around himself an empire, and by his acts refuses to comply with law enacted by constituted representatives of the American people.

I may say that I have great admiration for the achievements of Mr. Henry Ford as an individual. He started out on a shoestring and today the great industrial empire which he heads is without parallel in the world's history. But because I can admire Henry Ford, who incidentally is a resident of my congressional district, as an individual, does not mean that I have to condone his acts. I am an American citizen, born in this country, raised under the protection of our flag, and I yield to no man for my patriotic devotion to my country. However, I am very dubious and skeptical about allowing Mr. Ford to build a thousand airplanes a day for us. First, I do not know why the Ford Motor Co. should get all this work. In and around the Detroit area, in which I was raised and still reside, there are many manufacturing plants employing the finest mechanics in the world. These plants, both large and small, are, in my humble opinion, entitled to their share of this work, and why one manufacturer should hog the production of 1,000 airplanes a day is beyond rhyme and reason. I do not think that the United States Government should award contracts to any one individual when this work could be divided not only throughout the Detroit area but throughout the industrial areas of the entire United States.

As a matter of fact, I have another reason why I would not like to see Henry Ford awarded contracts to build a thousand airplanes a day for our Government. Mr. Ford's gigantic industrial empire has its main plant and activities at Dearborn, which is but the nucleus around which his empire functions, not only in this country, with its plants and assembly plants throughout the United States, but also in our neighboring country, Canada, and also most of the important foreign countries, some of which today are countries without names because of the acts of individuals which are so un-American and so foreign to American principles that they are condemned by the high and the low alike in this country. Naturally, when Mr. Ford extended his gigantic empire beyond the realms of the Detroit area and into foreign countries, it was necessary for him to make certain concessions or he would not have been able to do business in these foreign countries. For example, it is well known in the Detroit area that Mr. Stalin sent to the Ford Motor Co. the engineering brains of his country and these Communists were permitted to study the mass-production methods of the Ford Motor Co., in order that they might carry back these truly American innovations to further the Five Year Plan in communistic Russia.

Now, gentlemen of the House, I ask you Do you think it is right for any one man to build for this country a thousand airplanes a day to be used by armed forces, into which we are going to place the very best American stock available to operate them, planes built by a manufacturing plant in which are employed men from countries whose un-American actions and whose forms of government are contrary to American principles? I say, gentlemen of the House, we would be entrusting our military and naval secrets to the plant and we would be further endangering the lives of the American who would have to fly these planes, because these men who are here as representatives of foreign governments are going to leave no stone unturned to do those little acts known as sabotage, which result in very large losses. As a matter of fact, these Communists will stop at nothing. I can personally tell the Members of this House that I know that there was a small strike in Dearborn several years ago when Communists stoned one of the buildings of the Ford Motor Co., and in talking with officials of the city of Dearborn, in the presence of an official of the Ford Motor Co., I was informed that these Communists were stoning the building in which were housed their own people—in other words, the building that the Communists singled out to stone was shielding the Communist workers of Soviet Russia who were here in America studying the mass-production methods of the Ford Motor Co.

I do not believe it would be proper for me to say all that I have about the communistic government without paying some of my respects to Herr Hitler. Mr. Stalin has not been alone in endeavoring to wrest the secrets of mass-production methods from America. Mr. Hitler has engineers from his country employed in the Ford Motor Co. today. As a matter of fact, the President of the United States recently vetoed a bill to naturalize one of Mr. Hitler's citizens for illegal entry, who at the present time is employed in the engineering department of the Ford Motor Co. I might also call to the attention of the House, and I believe appropriately so, that Mr. Ford has been singularly honored by Mr. Hitler and is privileged to wear one of the highest decorations issued by Mr. Hitler's government. Mr. Hitler not only tendered Mr. Ford this decoration, but Mr. Ford accepted it.

Now in regard to the Norton and Smith amendments to the National Labor Relations Act, I am opposed to all of them, as I explained to the House in the forepart of my remarks. I believe that I understand the problems of the laboring man. I have been in business in my own rights since I was 18 years of age, and I know the problem of the employer as well as that of the employee. Since my election to the United States Congress in 1932, I have served continuously on the Committee on Labor. I had the honor and distinction of being the only Member of the Michigan delegation for 7 years who was a member of the Committee on Labor, and I am today the only Democrat from my State on that committee. I have attended the committee meetings regularly and listened to the testimony of those who favor and those who oppose legislation for the benefit of the laboring man.

My stand on questions of labor is well known. I have always supported and advocated legislation which would benefit the laboring classes as a whole. I have not carried the banner of one labor organization against the other, and I am not interested in the factional fight now going on between our two great labor organizations. Some of the amendments proposed, no doubt, would benefit one organization and perhaps would in some measure retard the activities of another organization. That does not interest me a bit. I am for the laboring man first, last, and always, and for legislation that will benefit the laboring men of this country as a whole. I believe in the principles of union and collective bargaining.

The reports of the National Labor Relations Board show that 81 percent of their decisions were rendered in favor of so-called craft unions, although 75 percent of the American Federation of Labor unions are termed industrial and all the rest are 100 percent industrial. I have been approached by manufacturers in the Detroit area and I have listened to testimony before the Committee on Labor, and I am satisfied that so far as the manufacturers of this country are concerned, they would rather deal with industrial unions because they would be dealing with one representative who has the power to speak for his entire organization, while on the other hand, in dealing with the craft unions, the manufacturer would have to take his problems up with the head of each craft.

Because I have not been altogether in agreement with the principles and the proposals of the American Federation of Labor, its president, Mr. William Green, has seen fit to go into my State and denounce me. I have nothing personal against Mr. Green, but I do not propose to accept his actions simply because I do not choose to follow his dictates, and I do not believe it is fair play for him to go into my State and use the tactics he has. He has informed me that he is going to fight me tooth and nail in my next campaign. In fact, to use his very words, in an address he delivered in Flint, Mich., on Sunday, April 14, 1940, before the General Motors automobile workers, as carried in the Detroit newspapers:

> * * * declare war on Representative JOHN LESINSKI, Democrat of the Sixteenth District, for opposing A. F. of L. sponsored amendments to the National Labor Relations Act.

This does not frighten me a bit, and I have not lain awake nights worrying about the ultimate results of Mr. Green's war. The workingmen of my congressional district know me as their friend, and when we fight this "war" on the battlefield in the Sixteenth Congressional District in November, I am sure that the fair-minded people and my friends will believe what I have to say because I have a record to back it up.

I was indeed surprised to read the article in the Detroit papers, and on April 19, 1940, I addressed a communication to Mr. Green, as follows:

APRIL 19, 1940.

Mr. WILLIAM GREEN,
President, American Federation of Labor, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. GREEN: I have just had brought to my attention an article appearing in one of the Detroit newspapers regarding your address in Flint on Sunday, April 14, before the General Motors auto workers.

I have carefully perused the article, especially point (5) which reads as follows: "Declared war on Representative JOHN LESINSKI, Democrat of the Sixteenth District, for opposing A. F. L. sponsored amendments to the National Labor Relations Act." I need not tell you that I was greatly surprised at this statement, and your emphasizing the word "Democrat," but I note that you did not say anything against the Republicans who have as you yourself know voted consistently against all labor legislation. These same Republicans are attempting to emasculate the Wagner Act; they vote against the appropriations for the National Labor Relations Act and for the enforcement of the Wagner Act, and are now attempting to paralyze these boards.

Yet, you selected me as a target, a member of the Labor Committee who has always favored labor legislation. In my four terms of Congress, I hold as good a record as the man who sponsored this legislation, the late William Connery who was chairman of the Labor Committee. Now, if my record is as good as his was, I can only see one point to the whole situation, and that is, that your personal attitude is a turn-about-face on the present administration and the Democratic Congress.

I gather not only from your speech in Michigan, but also from a part of an address which I heard over the radio several weeks ago which I believe was made before the chamber of commerce or a manufacturers association, that you were willing to stake the benefits of labor legislation for your own personal views and gain. From the lack of applause, it did not appear to me that the delegation before whom you spoke was much in sympathy with your views.

Further proof of the above statement is my letter to you of March 15, 1940, which was in answer to yours of the 14th regarding the Barden amendments. Nowhere in the letter had I stated that I would vote against the A. F. L. amendments. I personally may not agree with some of the amendments, but what strikes me is that you as a labor leader would turn to Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina to sponsor your amendments. On March 3, 1939, Mr. BARDEN of North Carolina did introduce H. R. 4749, a bill which would wholly emasculate the Wage and Hour Act. It provides exemptions on plants and industries in the South which would be to the detriment of your own workers in the North. When you use such poor judgment in selecting an antilabor man to sponsor your amendments, it behooves me to be very careful as to how I vote for those amendments.

You also announced as point (7) "That you are starting a campaign to organize the Ford Motor Co. workers." Well, I wish you good luck and success, although you personally know that you won't do it, as you have tried to organize that company for several years. I personally happen to know something about the service and the employment departments of the Ford Motor Co. This company has always been antilabor, and the employment is controlled completely by a certain personnel who would not give up the free hand they have today in employing labor. They will use the same sort of tactics in labor as they do in politics, and it matters not to them who they hire, be they disbarred attorneys or ex-convicts.

There are numerous other things that have been brought to my attention, in fact, too numerous to mention; however, I am completely convinced that you have turned about-face on your own organization, as well as the administration which made it possible for your organization to grow and receive recognition, which is more than other administrations have done. I am not interested in any misunderstanding between the labor organizations, as that I believe is a matter to be straightened out between the organizations.

My stand on the National Labor Relations Act and the Wage and Hour Act is the same today as it was last year and the year before; and that is that there should be no amendments to that bill at this time. The act should not be changed in any way that would give benefits to one labor organization above any other and to the detriment of 90 percent of unorganized labor. As a Representative from a district which employs more labor than any other district in the country, I believe my duty is to legislate for all people, including unorganized labor.

I have taken this stand for the past 8 years and will not change it now. I was elected by the people in my district and will stand by the labor in my district. As far as you declaring a war on me, I only wish to remind you that that has been done before by the manufacturers and the Ford Motor Co., and I believe that it is up to the people in my district to decide as to whether I have served them, and not the opinion of one person who sees himself defeated and attempts to put labor on the spot. I have had a great deal of correspondence from labor organizations and people in my district regarding labor legislation, and I know that at least 90 percent of all organizations insist that there be no changes to the Wagner

Act and that it should have a chance to work itself out. And I do know that the auto workers are 100 percent against any changes to the act at this time.

I am making this statement to you public so those who have read the article in the newspapers regarding your points may also be acquainted with my side of the story.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN LESINSKI, M. C.

On April 29, 1940, Mr. Green addressed a communication to me in reply to the communication I directed to him on April 19, 1940. His letter is as follows:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C. April 29, 1940.

Hon. JOHN LESINSKI,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I herewith reply to your letter of April 19. You signed a minority report of the House Labor Committee opposing constructive amendments to the Labor Relations Act, approved and sponsored by the American Federation of Labor. You did it after you had been requested by the American Federation of Labor to stand with us and to support our amendments. You made your decision against us. Having done so, why the necessity of sending me a letter such as you transmitted on April 19?

Your reference to our purpose to organize the employees of the Ford Motor Co. was unnecessary and uncalled for.

The membership of the American Federation of Labor will decide whether I have turned about face on them or whether I am serving their interests as they wish me to serve them.

You say your attitude towards the Labor Relations Act is that no amendments should be made to said act. Well, the American Federation of Labor thinks otherwise. We called upon you to help us and stand with us. You refused. That means you forfeit our support. We are against you and will do everything we can to defeat you for reelection.

Very truly yours,

W. GREEN,
President, American Federation of Labor.

On March 14, 1940, I received a letter from Mr. Green, and in order that the Members of the House and the people of the State of Michigan may be fully apprised as to Mr. Green's attitude toward me, I am inserting his letter in these remarks at this point:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., March 14, 1940.

Hon. JOHN LESINSKI,
Member, Committee on Labor,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LESINSKI: I am taking the liberty of enclosing for your consideration a public statement which I ask you to accept as an expression of the attitude of the American Federation of Labor toward amendments to the Labor Relations Act. It seems both fitting and appropriate for me to write you because it has been publicly stated that you are considering amendments to the Labor Relations Act.

The recommendations of the American Federation of Labor upon amendments to the Labor Relations Act are embodied in the measure submitted by Congressman BARDEN. We regard these amendments as reasonable, moderate, constructive, and necessary.

We are firmly convinced that a five-member Labor Board should be created in order to inspire confidence in the administration of the Labor Relations Act and to perform the increasing work of the Board. Surely, experience, as well as the development of facts and information which are now available for public consideration, makes such change in the personnel of the Board imperative.

Please consider favorably the recommendation of the American Federation of Labor, included in the Barden bill, relating to "an appropriate collective bargaining unit. This proposal of the American Federation of Labor was taken verbatim from the New York State Labor Relations Act. It is simple and democratic. It is supported by employers and employees in the State of New York. It has worked well and to the satisfaction of all directly concerned. This means that in adopting this amendment we will not be invading the field of experimentation; instead we will adopt a plan which has been tried and which through trial and application has demonstrated its fairness and practicability in operation in the largest Commonwealth and greatest industrial State in the Nation.

This amendment confers upon workers employed in manufacturing plants the right to determine their own collective bargaining unit, to select said bargaining unit themselves, and to engage in collective bargaining through the appropriate bargaining unit which they themselves selected. It eliminates force, coercion, and compulsion. Under the operation of this amendment, workers cannot be compelled to become a part of a collective bargaining unit set up arbitrarily by the Board against their will and in opposition to their expressed desires. I challenge anyone to offer a more practical, free and democratic mode of procedure than this which is incorporated in the New York State Labor Relations Act and which the American Federation of Labor proposes as an amendment to the National Labor Relations Act.

We maintain that no Government board should be clothed with authority to invalidate contracts honorably entered into, when said contracts are negotiated through collective bargaining, between bona fide, free, democratic unions and employers. An amendment covering this point is included in Congressman BARDEN'S bill.

The right of employers to petition for an election under certain conditions seems to be universally conceded as a matter of fairness and justice.

I recognize that amendments to the National Labor Relations Act should be as few in number as possible. These I have enumerated herein are of transcendent importance. Other amendments which we proposed in the Barden bill cover judicial and administrative procedure. In our judgment, they are important, practical, and necessary.

The administration of the National Labor Relations Act, as shown through the investigation made by the Smith congressional committee, is most unsatisfactory. We have been amazed at some of the revelations made relating to maladministration of the act by a biased, prejudiced Board. Congress should face this issue and amend the act so as to provide better administration and at the same time protect the fundamentals and the vital principles of the Labor Relations Act.

The time to amend the Labor Relations Act is now. It should be done by this Congress, which has manifested its sympathy toward and support of the vital principles of the act. Should this Congress fail to act and leave the situation as it now is, there is grave danger that at some time within the near future the Labor Relations Act, the Magna Carta of labor, will be emasculated and perhaps destroyed.

I appeal to your committee to meet the situation promptly, in a broad, constructive way, along the lines I have herein suggested.

Sincerely yours,

WM. GREEN,
President, American Federation of Labor.

[From the American Federation of Labor information and publicity service. For release in morning papers of March 15, 1940]

President William Green, of the American Federation of Labor, today issued the following statement:

"The investigation of the National Labor Relations Board and its administrative policies, conducted by the Smith congressional committee, developed facts and information which made clear the need of constructive amendments to the National Labor Relations Act.

"The charge of maladministration made by the American Federation of Labor against the Labor Relations Board was clearly established.

"It now becomes the duty of Congress to take such action as the facts warrant and demand, in order to prevent the Labor Relations Board from continuing its biased and prejudiced administration of the Labor Relations Act. It seems inconceivable that Congress should fail to discharge its duty in this respect. Failure to act at this session may result in future moves to destroy or repeal the entire act.

"Amendments to the Labor Relations Act have been prepared by the Smith committee and submitted to the Labor Committee of the House of Representatives. Some of these amendments are practical and constructive.

"However, it is the opinion of the American Federation of Labor that the amendments offered by the Smith committee as a whole strike in a destructive way at vital, fundamental principles of the Labor Relations Act. The American Federation of Labor has repeatedly stated and emphasized its opposition to any impairment of the fundamental principles of the Labor Relations Act in any way whatsoever. We again urge and insist that its principles and its fundamentals shall be preserved and protected. The Labor Relations Act still remains the Magna Carta of Labor. Our appeal to Congress is to amend and change the administrative features of the act and policies of the Labor Relations Board without impairing its fundamentals so that the Labor Relations Act will be administered fairly to all, just to labor and industry, and in accordance with its spirit and its letter.

"It is the opinion of the American Federation of Labor that amendments designed to accomplish this purpose should be simple, direct, and constructive. If amendments providing for a reconstruction of the Labor Board, the right of employers to petition for elections under certain conditions, the abolition of the right of the Board to invalidate contracts honestly and justly negotiated through collective bargaining, the acceptance of the American Federation of Labor recommendations relating to the selection and establishment of the appropriate collective bargaining unit, and the acceptance of a simplified form of administrative and judicial procedure, were adopted by Congress, the Labor Relations Act could then be applied in a way as to meet general public approval and accord equal and exact justice to all.

"The American Federation of Labor will petition and appeal to Congress to act favorably upon these recommendations and to adopt these simplified, limited amendments to the Labor Relations Act."

My reply to Mr. Green's letter, addressed to him on March 15, 1940, is as follows:

MARCH 15, 1940.

Mr. WM. GREEN,
American Federation of Labor, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. GREEN: Your letter of recent date with reference to changes to the Labor Relations Act received. I am glad to have your views, and wish to state that my original stand when this law was enacted was that I was in favor of a five-man board instead of a three-man, as is the case today.

I cannot agree with you, however, on the Barden bill, as it seems to me it would open a way to emasculate the act, inasmuch as it has too many exceptions.

In the seventh paragraph of your letter you state, "I recognize that amendments to the National Labor Relations Act should be as few in number as possible." That alone convinces me that there should be no changes at this time.

I realize fully that the act could stand some changes, and I would favor them providing, however, that a closed rule could be gotten without amendments. This, however, you know is impossible, and with the attitude of the southern delegation, including the minority party, they would soon emasculate the act so that it would have no effect.

My contention still is that the act should be left alone at this time, with the exception possibly of amending it to a five-man board instead of a three-man, as we now have.

I would appreciate your reaction to my statement by return mail inasmuch as hearings will start Tuesday, March 19.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN LESINSKI, M. C.

I do not believe that Mr. Green is fully apprised of the activities of his organization in Michigan. I have, residing in my congressional district, a man who has been active in the ranks of labor for years, and I believe it would be enlightening to the Members of Congress, as well as those interested in the problems of labor in the State of Michigan, to read the communications I received from Mr. Markey, dated May 11 and May 16, 1940, and I am inserting them in my remarks at this point:

DETROIT, MICH., May 11, 1940.

Hon. JOHN LESINSKI,
Member of Congress, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR JOHN: The views I am about to express are not confidential; they are recognized in this State. Therefore I do not care what you do with them. I need not explain to you that I have little respect for Frank X. Martel, but if he is right in his actions for the good of his organizations, I have no other position than to support and defend his purpose. Existing in Michigan in the ranks of labor and controlling the Michigan Federation of Labor are an outstate clique of old double-crossers, who have for years used their positions in labor to promote the cause of the employers. Unfortunately, this rotten clique have the confidence of President William Green, and as a result they are able to force their rotten desires on the Federation movement of this State. Green would not threaten you or any other individual within this State; you can readily realize this and the reasons for it.

John Lovett, the representative of the Manufacturers' Association, along with such associated groups as the Association of Michigan Railroads and the Michigan Trucking Association, formulate policy for this group of labor fakers and pass it on to them to force down the throats of Federation people. The secretary of the Michigan Federation of Labor, John Reid, has long been the errand boy of Lovett and has promoted Lovett's interests at every turn of the road. A real example of his rotten tactics—and this can be confirmed by many legislators of this State—was his sponsoring the manufacturers' occupational-disease law and demanding its passage during the 1937 session of the legislature. Former State Senator Joseph C. Roosevelt, and former State Representative Joseph F. Martin, Jr., will vouch for the veracity of these statements. Many of the fakers associated with Reid in his actions are on the pay roll of the employers and the unions at the same time, so too many of these men have unsecured loans with banks and associated interests of the manufacturers' association, and these are easily verified.

From inquiry I know that Martel nor none of the Detroit men were consulted on your reelection before the Green threat, it was based on these conclusions. Lovett requested that Reid ask such action of Green, all associated interests demanded the same of their stooges, and Green readily complied with their wishes. Their only hopes of defeating you by labor means rests in two places and they were depending on them, but I doubt that Martel will go any further than fail to endorse you in spite of their pressure; their second hope was that they would be able to paint your record black and induce myself and others to work against you, but we are wise to them and this is "out," as we will support you more vigorously. Martel will have many more serious problems politically than to defeat you. I know because I very seldom disagree with Martel on serious labor issues of a political nature.

This situation did have one amusing angle. Before the news of Green's threat to defeat you had been published in the paper, several of Reid's double-crossers, who were just as responsible as Reid for the Green threat, wired you that they disagreed with the Green action and they would support you. Their very make-up is so rotten that they found it impossible to follow the moves they demanded of Green. The truth of the matter is just this, they know that they cannot sway 100 votes in the district, and their own foolishness, although profitable, placed them behind the "eight ball" and, realizing this, they quietly double-crossed Lovett and Reid to save their rotten faces.

I would not blame Green too severely in this matter, and I certainly would not punish the Federation because of this threat as it means nothing. Give Bill Hushing the same cooperation as always on labor issues; the mistake was caused by people who have selfish ends in view. I would, of course, respond only to requests from Hushing or the Detroit and Wayne County Federation of Labor and positively refuse to cooperate with such representatives or letters as come from the Michigan Federation of Labor, the A. F. L., Shop Crafts Railroad Unions of Michigan, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, and the Railroad Cooperative Committee as these are the people responsible for Green's action. Add to this list of hostile groups the Grand Rapids Federation of Labor, the Ann Arbor System Federation, the Owosso Federation of Labor, the Lansing Federation of Labor, the Switchmen's Union of North America, the Michigan legislative department of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen. All these groups can have the desires passed through the Detroit Federation of Labor or they can appeal to Bill Hushing.

This seems like the logical method of aiding the proper people and punishing the double-crossers. With kindest personal regards, I remain,

Sincerely yours,

ED. MARKEY.

DETROIT, MICH., May 16, 1940.

Hon. JOHN LESINSKI,
Member of Congress, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR JOHN: To add to the information already sent to you regarding the actions of certain labor leaders in this State. Here is quite conclusive evidence that all is not exactly kosher, and as in your case, I believe William Green and the American Federation of Labor have been misinformed or they are not acquainted with the facts. It is true, I suppose, that Green should do something about these conditions here, but this is not your responsibility nor mine, and I suppose that only continued loss of membership and prestige will eventually cause the necessary reforms.

During and after the recent Chrysler strike, unemployment compensation claims were filed by the greater majority of Chrysler employees; the Unemployment Compensation Commission of Michigan is composed of Chairman Harry A. McDonald (Republican), of Detroit; Dr. Ashley (Republican), of Wyandotte, and John Reid, of Lansing (Democrat or Republican), and also secretary of the Michigan Federation of Labor, refused, by majority vote, to pay the claims of the Chrysler employees. The United Automobile Workers (C. I. O.), and also the United Automobile Worker (A. F. of L.), through their attorneys, Maurice Sugar and Edward N. Barnard, appealed the commission ruling to Referee Rubinoff who, after a hearing lasting many days, awarded 35,000 Chrysler employees compensation for the idle period.

The Chrysler Corporation appealed this decision to the appeal board of the commission, but this board upheld the decision of Referee Rubinoff; then the Chrysler Corporation filed legal action in the city of Lansing before Circuit Judge Leland Carr, and obtained a temporary injunction restraining the payment of the claims until the case could be tried by Judge Carr. In the meantime the Michigan Association of Manufacturers filed a like case in the Circuit Court of Wayne County. Due to the filing of these cases by the employers, it was now the duty of the Michigan Unemployment Compensation Commission to defend the decision of its appeal board on both the legal actions before the courts, the commission should have been ready to act, as it had for its legal counsel Harry Slavin, who is reputed to be an authority on this phase of law.

Now comes the old story. Recently this unemployment commission met and voted to replace Slavin with a special counsel to be hired by the commission. I understand that Chairman McDonald was supported in this by John Reid, labor's representative, and it was likewise confirmed in this manner by our daily papers. It was also reported in these same papers that the entire commission voted—including John Reid, labor's representative—to hire a woman, Florence Clements, to fight these cases for the commission, and the State of Michigan, with the consent of all commission members, assigned Assistant Attorney General Stanley C. Barker to aid her.

Innocent on the surface, but let's get to the bottom. Florence Clements was in the past, and still may be, on the pay roll of the Michigan Manufacturers' Association. Her duties never were of much value to her employers, and this may be her chance to use her lack of ability to good advantage by losing this case and benefit the employers. Now, let's look at the record of her assistant, Stanley C. Barker. Four years ago he was clerk to Circuit Court Commissioner William J. Griffin. After Griffin's defeat he entered private practice—a very small practice. His political backing is dependent on William J. Griffin, who is today head of hospitalization-insurance plan promoted by the medical association and employer groups. His record as an attorney is slightly better than that of Florence Clements, and this record would be no compliment to even the most unsuccessful of lawyers.

This move by this commission is a deliberate attempt to keep 35,000 workers from receiving their unemployment compensation and was the plan of the Manufacturers' Association, placed in effect by the commission. I know of no other reason Reid would have to hire an employer attorney than to carry out the desires of the Michigan Manufacturers' Association. Surely if he had been a champion of labor's cause he would have exerted every effort to retain Slavin to defend these claims against the employers' court actions.

When a labor leader will, by his actions, endanger the unemployment claims of 35,000 workers, surely no one like yourself could expect that you would receive just treatment for your support of labor on the floor of Congress. This, of course, will be a political issue in the next campaign. We may not be able to rid labor of his useless services, but we can make him and his followers political double-crossers and rid Michigan politics of them. It is time that this sort of political double-crossing be made public and labor's friends be recognized and supported; the workers are entitled to know these things, and then let them pass judgment on them.

Many peculiar things have taken place in Michigan that surely were not based on real labor needs and always anyone who should disagree with the misleaders are held to scorn and punished by both the employers and these same errand boys of the Manufacturers Association. All things good or bad must end, and let us hope that this fall election will be their end in politics and they can confine the efforts along these lines strictly to their own organizations; there's one place we can drive them and limit their activities to their own people, some day even their own will tire of them.

Kindest personal regards.

Very truly yours,

ED MARKEY.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I want to make it plain to the Members of Congress, as well as to those who may read these remarks, that I will always further and support legislation which I believe will benefit labor, but I cannot conscientiously support legislation or amendments to legislation when I do not believe that such amendments and such changes as are advocated by both the Norton and Smith amendments would prove beneficial to the laboring classes of this country.

Hon. Asbury Francis Lever

OF

HON. BUTLER B. HARE

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

Wednesday, June 5, 1940

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, in view of my long, intimate, and friendly association with former Congressman the Honorable Asbury Francis Lever, who died at his home in Columbia, S. C., April 28, I have asked the privilege of paying tribute to his life, character, and public services. From his college days to the time of his death it was my privilege to be thrown with him frequently and to work with him in many activities, both during his service in Congress and following his retirement. For the past 10 years or more I served with him as a member of the board of trustees of Newberry College, our alma mater, and have, therefore, had opportunity to observe and evaluate his life and work.

Mr. Lever was born January 5, 1875, near Spring Hill, in Lexington County, S. C. He attended the rural public schools until he entered Newberry College, where he graduated with honors in 1895. Following his graduation he taught in the public schools of his State for 2 years, or until he was appointed secretary to the then Congressman J. William Stokes, representing the Seventh District of South Carolina. While serving in this capacity Mr. Lever studied law and graduated from Georgetown University, receiving his LL. B. degree in 1899.

During his college days and for a number of years following there was a great political upheaval in his State led by the late Benjamin Ryan Tillman, a practical farmer, a student of scientific agriculture, literature, and political history. Very few men of his State or country had a wider or more accurate knowledge of the classics than did Mr. Tillman, who was the outstanding political leader of his State for a quarter of a century, and who, in the meantime, served conspicuously as Governor for 4 years, and 18 years as United States Senator. Mr. Lever was not a slavish follower but a pronounced student of the new political philosophy headed by Mr. Tillman, which, in effect, displaced what was frequently referred to as the "aristocratic rule" of the State, and opened a new political field of opportunity to young men of character, intelligence, and ambition who had formerly been denied such privileges for the lack of what may be referred to as "historical prestige." Although Mr. Lever sprang from a sturdy, honest, and highly cultured German ancestry his opportunity for political success was greatly increased by the "Tillman Movement."

He was by nature well fitted for public service. From early manhood he was an easy, capable, fluent, and magnetic public speaker, a man of marked native intellectual ability, with a mind of unusual discriminating capacity, a most congenial disposition, and a delightful frankness in his dealings with others. His first venture into politics was his election to the State legislature from his native county in 1900. In the summer of 1901 Congressman Stokes died and Mr. Lever became a candidate for the unexpired term along with four men of outstanding ability as his opponents. Mr. Lever was elected and came to Congress at the age of 26, and in response to his desire and ambition was assigned to a place on the Committee on Agriculture. Having been brought up on a farm he was not only familiar with farming operations but was vitally interested in the many farm problems affecting his native State and other sections of the country. His services as a member of this committee and his activities in connection with legislation originating from other committees proved that he was interested in our agricultural problems from a national standpoint.

He was unselfish and broad-minded enough to see that the success of the farmer in his State was contingent upon the success of agriculture in every other part of the Nation and was, therefore, always found in the front rank advocating sane and sound legislation designed to promote the welfare of agriculture in all sections of our country.

Following the election of President Wilson in 1912 Mr. Lever became chairman of the Agricultural Committee and was soon recognized as one of the outstanding leaders in Congress. He was a key man in the Wilson administration. The President relied wholly upon his judgment in all legislation pertaining to agriculture, and relied as much upon his political judgment as that of any other man in Congress. The first, and possibly the most worth while, legislative act to which he may be accredited was the promotion and passage of the law providing for agricultural extension service, the importance, value, and extent of which is known and well recognized by leaders of thought and action throughout the Nation. Later he was the author of the Smith-Lever Act and the coauthor of the Cotton Futures Trading Act. He was also one of the leaders and contributed much to the passage of legislation providing for long-term farm credit. In 1919 he was appointed by President Wilson a member of the Federal Farm Loan Board and resigned his seat in Congress. Later he became president of the First Carolinas Joint Stock Land Bank, of Columbia, S. C., and at the time of his death was director of the public relations administration of the farm credit administration, Columbia, S. C. He always manifested a vital interest in the education of youth, particularly the rural youth. He had strong convictions about the separation of church and state, but did not believe any education was complete that did not carry with it the fundamental teachings of the Christian religion. For many years he was a life member of the board of trustees of Clemson College, generally referred to as the A. & M. College of South Carolina. For more than 30 years he was a member of the board of trustees of Newberry College, one of the oldest church institutions of his State, and for the past 5 years was chairman of this board. He was a man of many parts and devoted his entire life to the promotion and advancement of the social and economic welfare of his State and Nation. He loved mankind and had deep sympathies for the less fortunate, being personally popular among all types of people. He was as well known and highly respected at the time of his death as any man of his State, and when the Recorder has made an inventory of the efforts and accomplishments of those who have devoted their lives and talents in behalf of mankind it will be found that no man in the history of our Nation has to date been responsible for more constructive legislation for the benefit of agriculture and the rural population of this country than the Honorable Asbury Francis Lever.

Third Termites Put on the Heat When Public Does Not Respond; Now Use Chain-Letter Campaign

OF

HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 6, 1940

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, the third-term boom for President Roosevelt has apparently failed to get off to the spontaneous start with the public which its sponsors had hoped, and today we find that the movement is being given a shot in the arm by means of the old chain-letter gag in an attempt to get the people to write Mr. Roosevelt asking him to break a precedent as old as the Nation and seek the Presidency for a third term.

Now we may expect to see in the newspapers pictures of the mailman toting large bags of mail into the White House urging Mr. Roosevelt to be a candidate. The purpose of these pictures will be to attempt to lead the public to believe there is a spontaneous demand on the part of the people for a third term. They will not reveal that behind the scenes it was necessary for a group to inspire these letters by means of the moldy old chain-letter scheme, which, incidentally, was condemned some time ago by the Post Office Department.

The American people do not have to have the heat put on them to urge them into action when there is something they want done. They demonstrated that conclusively when they told Congress they did not want the Supreme Court packed. And it did not take a chain-letter craze to awaken them either.

The squeeze play now being attempted on John Q. Public appears to have its headquarters in Philadelphia. The original letters are signed by "Anthony G. Neary" and the address is given as "Drexel Building, Independence Square, Philadelphia, Pa." The letter is headed "Rally round Roosevelt."

Enclosed with the letter are a number of cards the size of postal cards and these are supposed to be sent to as many other persons urging them to write the President and on and on down the line. The cards give full instructions for addressing Mr. Roosevelt and saying "your letter need not be long, but it should be your own, in your own language, telling him that you personally believe he should serve the country another 4 years. If you wish, you can tell him why you think so."

The final statement says "Sign your full name and your address." Apparently the promoters of the chain-letter idea to stimulate third-term interest intend to create some sort of an honor roll. Could it be the sponsors of the movement will have access to these names and addresses for campaign purposes? Is the Democratic mailing list running short on names?

Apparently they have taken a page from the late Huey Long's political machine of making every man a king. In this case they are distributing neighborhood chairmanships in connection with the chain-letter program. The letter which goes out over Mr. Nearing's signature follows:

RALLY ROUND ROOSEVELT

DREXEL BUILDING,
INDEPENDENCE SQUARE,
Philadelphia, Pa., May 31, 1940.

DEAR SIR: You have been suggested to me as chairman for your neighborhood of the Rally Round Roosevelt movement.

Will you appoint six friends to your committee, invite them to your home, and each of you write to Franklin D. Roosevelt, the White House, Washington, D. C., and ask him to run again for the Presidency? The letters do not have to be long. Even a post card will do.

When the letters have been written, tell each member of your committee to ask two friends to write. They can be men, women, or children, because Mr. Roosevelt is the President of all of us.

We need him. We need his leadership. We know he has never failed in his duty and that he is the man to carry us through the difficult 4 years ahead. But we must tell him.

Millions of letters from us will show the politicians the man America wants as President.

Don't bother to reply to me. Use your paper and postage to write the President. That's the important thing.

Sincerely yours,

ANTHONY G. NEARY.

Mr. Speaker, I present these to show that it has become necessary to give artificial impetus to this much-heralded third-term talk and so that the people will know the facts when they hear of the great demands being made that the President seek a third term. Then they can question for themselves how many of these were inspired chain-letter demands.

Army Supplies

OF

HON. JOSEPH R. BRYSON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 6, 1940

LETTER FROM THE SECRETARY OF WAR AND REPLY

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letters:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, June 5, 1940.

Hon. JOSEPH H. BRYSON,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BRYSON: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter dated May 24, 1940, forwarding the request of Mr. Dixon D. Davis, commander, American Legion Post No. 3, Greenville, S. C., for information for the American Legion post in Greenville.

The enclosed copy of a speech delivered by Brig. Gen. George V. Strong gives an excellent outline of our problems in safeguarding the Western Hemisphere, and I believe will be helpful to Mr. Davis. I am enclosing also a statement that outlines not only the amount of the 1940 appropriations as requested but shows a break-down of all expenditures during the period 1925–40.

Mr. Davis' statement that he read that there are not enough blankets for the comfort of an enlarged army has been noted. There are sufficient blankets on hand for the present enlarged army. Further extensive increases in personnel would create shortages in this and many other equipment items. These shortages are being provided for by current requests for appropriations.

The Springfield rifle M–1903 no longer is standard for manufacture in the Army, having been replaced by the new M–1 (Garand) rifle. Approximately 40,000 of the new rifles have been manufactured, mostly in the past year. The Springfield rifles on hand will, of course, be retained pending manufacture of a sufficient number of the new automatic rifles.

For obvious reasons a break-down to state types of the approximately 2,800 airplanes now on hand cannot be stated. Deliveries of airplanes from the large amount of funds voted by the Congress a year ago are just now commencing. The absolutely necessary time lag between the appropriation of moneys and actual delivery of these airplanes and other critical equipment is a vital matter, but one for which there is no immediate solution.

The tables printed on pages 421 and 422 of the Military Establishment appropriation bill hearings before the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, and other statements in this and the hearings before the House committee on the same bill contain much detailed information that I believe would be of interest to Mr. Davis.

There are approximately 1,500 of all types of antiaircraft guns in the United States and its foreign possessions. About one-third of these have been produced in the past year. There are approximately 350 serviceable Infantry tanks on hand, and about the same number of new models being produced.

While there now exists a shortage in many items of military equipment, this condition is being gradually overcome by current appropriations.

Sincerely yours,

HARRY H. WOODRING,
Secretary of War.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 6, 1940.

Hon. HARRY H. WOODRING,
Secretary of War, War Department, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WOODRING: This is to acknowledge receipt of your letter of June 5 which has just reached my office.

At the outset, Mr. Secretary, please know that I deeply appreciate your furnishing me with much of the information requested in my recent letter to you. However, I must frankly confess that I am considerably disturbed over the general tenor and meaning of certain statements made in your letter.

You speak of an "absolutely necessary time lag" between the appropriation of moneys and actual delivery of airplanes and other critical equipment, declaring that this is a vital matter, but "one for which there is no immediate solution." In this connection I am compelled to raise the question: Should this time lag to which you refer be regarded as "absolutely necessary," that is, should it be accepted as something absolute and necessary which cannot be avoided or eliminated? I say, we must not take that position. Furthermore we should not, we must not follow the path of resignation by saying that "there is no immediate solution" for this or that problem of national defense. We must follow the path of action with unyielding determination to sweep aside obstacles in the getting of results—immediate results.

You state that "while there now exists a shortage in many items of military equipment, this condition is being gradually overcome." It is not very reassuring to hear that this condition is being only "gradually overcome" for our task of preparedness must be accomplished with speed of unparalleled quickness.

I do not wish to appear too exacting in my interpretation of your statements, but, as already indicated, I am considerably disturbed over the general tenor of what you have to say as it suggests that this Nation must content itself with "gradually overcoming" shortages in military equipment, accepting the "time lag" in filling orders as "absolutely necessary." Only recently I was shocked to learn from a high official of the Navy Department that unnecessary "slowness" was being tolerated in the filling of positions in Navy Yards. This is an attitude or point of view which must be deplored for the history of the world today is being written in almost minutes and hours, not years.

Therefore, in response to your letter, I am writing to ask that there be no compromises with time and ordinary obstacles; that the objective be to overcome shortages in military equipment, not gradually but immediately.

Sincerely yours,

JOSEPH R. BRYSON.

Memorial Day Address

OF
HON. WILLIAM L. NELSON
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 6, 1940

ADDRESS BY HARRY R. DANIELS, ADJUTANT, VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS POST, MOBERLY, MO.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a Memorial Day address by Harry R. Daniels, a veteran of the last World War:

With the world at large torn asunder by war, Memorial Day offers the people of America an opportunity to emphasize those ideals which will help make the United States fireproof against the conflagration which threatens to consume the universe.

For the past 3 years the world has been edging closer and closer to the precipice of complete international chaos. Japan gave birth to this plague with its invasion of China. Next Austria was forced to surrender its independence to Germany. Italy seized Abyssinia as a prelude to its absorption of Albania. Communism and fascism fought for control of Spain with the Italo-German forces emerging victorious. Czechoslovakia was stripped of its independence at a conference table—forced to bow down to German autocracy when threatened with the brutal destruction which Hitler subsequently visited upon Poland. Tiny Finland made a valiant but futile stand against Russian occupation. Civilization was still mourning this atrocity when Germany reached out to grab the natural resources of Denmark, Norway, The Netherlands, Luxembourg, and Belgium.

This is no time for the American people to play ostrich with their collective heads buried in the sands of pacifism. The major powers of Europe are engaged in a struggle for survival. The outcome will determine whether or not world affairs are to be dominated by the totalitarian principles which inspire the Rome-Moscow-Berlin alliance. Despite the skeptics who scoff at the suggestion world democracy is at stake—Hitler, Stalin, and Mussolini frankly boast of ambitions to humble every nation that respects the individual liberties of its people.

The American citizen who thinks we can keep our country out of war by simply repeating the assertion we are not concerned with the problems of Europe is guilty of wishful thinking. Recent events in Europe have proved that aggressors are indifferent to neutrality policies. The neutral power that refuses to give them aid is coldly labeled as an enemy to be destroyed or ignored.

The significance of Memorial Day reminds us of America's rise to its position of a world power after our unity, as a people, was established in the War Between the States. This unity received its first crucial test in the War with Spain. Our victory in this conflict gave notice to the world that America was firmly entrenched as a major power in the world's affairs and that our citizens were united in support of American principles. In 1917–18 our unity as a people again gave our country the necessary strength to become the deciding factor in the World War.

In the current crisis which confronts the United States we must constantly keep ourselves aware of the principle that unity is still our first line of national defense. No one recognizes this truth better than our potential enemies. The danger signal is reflected in their subversive efforts to destroy our unity, through the promotion of internal group hatreds, discontent, and disloyalty.

It is up to us to heed this warning. We must remember strict adherence to the principles outlined in the Bill of Rights is the essence of our unity. Continued resistance aagainst Communist, Nazi, and Fascist propaganda will help keep us immune against the poison of disruption.

Beware of the peddlers of prejudice. Be chary of those who spout Americanism as a smokescreen for ideas that betray its fundamental principles. Be on guard against emotional appeals invented to make you mad at your neighbor, simply because he goes to a different church or belongs to a certain political party. Scorn the sap who tries to make you believe life under Stalin, Hitler & Co. is one continual round of prosperity and pleasure. Laugh at the loon who argues that slavery under Stalin is paradise compared to the comforts we enjoy under capitalism in America. Ignore the ignoramus who holds up Hitlerism as an escape from hard times and unemployment. Denounce the disruptor who would divide us against each other in his treachery to the cause of Americanism.

To make our unity poisonproof we must strengthen our national-defense facilities spiritually as well as physically. Our faith in the basic ideals of Americanism must be maintained on a high plane, with increasing respect for the protection we are afforded as individuals under the Constitution. It is our job to be militantly suspicious of any propaganda which violates the spirit of the Bill of Rights. We must keep ourselves and our neighbors constantly conscious of the realization our security is assured as long as we stand together united under the bonds of "a nation indivisible, with liberty and justice for all."

On Memorial Day we follow the established custom of decorating the graves of our honored dead. But we must do more than hang wreaths on their monuments if our appreciation of their sacrifices is sincere. They had the courage to die as Americans in defense of American principles. We must have the courage to live as Americans if we want them to know their sacrifices were not without purpose.

Harry W. Griswold

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. JOHN C. SCHAFER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 24, 1940

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. HARRY W. GRISWOLD, late a Representative from the State of Wisconsin

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, in the sudden and untimely passing of our colleague, HARRY W. GRISWOLD, the State of Wisconsin and the Nation have lost an able legislator and an eminent citizen. Mr. GRISWOLD was a man of exemplary character, exceptional ability and devotion to the public service. He was born on a farm near West Salem, Wis., on May 19, 1886, and he was an expert on farm problems. His great soul was not satisfied with the dead past, its glooms, and its shadows. He dealt with realities, not fancies. Life to him was an objective; he saw things as they were. He did not fashion them by the more subtle forces of the brain and live in the realm of dreams. In his passing, his district, our State, and the Nation have suffered an irreparable loss.

We read in Holy Writ:

Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friend.

Our departed colleague did lay down his life in the service of his country and his countrymen.

He was an able, diligent, and conscientious legislator, who unstintingly devoted his energies toward the solution of the distressing and perplexing problems confronting our country. In his zeal he disregarded the physical limitations of an ordinary man, and he laid down his earthly life as a sacrifice on the altar of his country's welfare.

HARRY GRISWOLD was loved by his constituents and his colleagues, regardless of their party affiliations, as he was ever looking for an opportunity to perform some kind deed or act for others.

His devotion to his wife and children and to their welfare was unexcelled, and I know that the sympathy of the entire membership of this House goes out to them in this their sad hour of bereavement.

Our colleague has passed into the Great Beyond, but his spirit will forever dwell in the hearts of his countrymen. Although we shall miss him in our councils, we know that while his earthly body is dead, he has just commenced to live in the mansions prepared by our Heavenly Father. He had the works of godliness as well as faith in God, and we know that he who dies in the name of the Lord shall have everlasting life.

Two Great Reasons Why We Must Keep Out of the War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 6, 1940

ARTICLE BY HON. HERBERT HOOVER

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Hon. Herbert Hoover in Liberty for June 15, 1940:

[From Liberty of June 15, 1940]

TWO GREAT REASONS WHY WE MUST KEEP OUT OF THE WAR

(By Herbert Hoover)

The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse are on the march: War, Death, Famine, and Pestilence. Two-thirds of the people in the world are at war. But coming before these old destroyers of mankind are five new horsemen.

The new cavalry are:

Imperialism, the destroyer of the independence of nations;
Intolerance, the destroyer of minorities;
Stateism, the destroyer of personal liberty;
Atheism, the destroyer of faith;
Hate, the destroyer of the unity of mankind.

These are the horsemen of the advance, preparing the way for war and death. After war and death sweep famine and pestilence. And their camp follower is revolution.

Imperialism has already trampled down the independence of Ethiopia, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Albania, and Denmark. We have witnessed attacks upon China, Finland, and Norway, unable to defend themselves. And now the invasion of Belgium and Holland. And there seems more to come.

We have seen intolerance destroy Jews, Christians, and racial minorities.

We have seen stateism, expressed by the despotisms of communism, fascism, nazi-ism, and socialism, destroy liberty in Russia, in Germany, in Italy, and in a half dozen other countries. We have seen its infiltration through the world—including the United States.

Atheism has greatly shattered religious worship in Russia and Germany and weakened beliefs in a score of others.

Hate has grown fiercely since before the first World War began, and its ravages are not alone between races but between classes and religious faiths.

And all the Nine Horsemen have new weapons of destruction. Imperialism has become more dreadful by threat of destruction from the air. Propaganda, the weapon of intolerance, of stateism, of atheism, of hate, is more potent through our rapidity of communication. It now moves through the air over all borders and seas. It comes disguised in the home tongue. Hate has increased its voltage through cruelty of attack upon civilian men, women, and children by food blockade and death by the air. War is more destructive by our chemistry and our machines.

Famine is more terrible by the growth of great cities. Pestilence strikes right and left through the close net of our communications.

Only the Western Hemisphere is free of the full violence of these horsemen. But they affect us. Our emotions are aroused. The attacks upon helpless small nations raise the indignation of all decent men and women. Our economic life is dislocated. The shadow of war hangs over all our decisions.

And from our emotions there are Americans who sincerely believe that we ourselves should go to war. They feel we should be willing to sacrifice our youth and our future to restore liberty against aggression, to assure the recognition of law and human rights.

Reason calls to us not to send our sons into this war. Reason dictates that if we join the military operations of this war, it means the abdication of the remaining seat of liberty in the world. Reason insists the Western Hemisphere should give sanctuary for peace in her flight from all the rest of the world. Reason is final in its demands that we prepare ourselves so that we may defend the Western Hemisphere.

To those who feel that we are not doing our part if we stay out, I may suggest that we look ahead to the end of this war—examine a possibly greater service to mankind. This war will end some time, either in victory or exhaustion. And in that relation we may well explore the grim work of the horsemen—famine, pestilence, and hate.

FAMINE AND PESTILENCE

Western Europe for a hundred years, even in peacetimes, has not produced sufficient food supplies for its own population. It has bought its food by the export of manufactured goods. But on top of this peacetime shortage of supplies, war at once diminishes the food production of every combatant nation. The imports of fodder are cut off or slackened, and the herds must be diminished. The drafting of manpower instantly diminishes the production of milk, and of butter, and of meat. The people eat into their animals and, when war ends, their brood stock is depleted. Beyond this, planting of ground crops must be skipped. The harvesting is imperfect. And, above all, the nitrate fertilizers must be diverted to explosives.

It is true that each nation at modern war rations its population in hope of reducing its food consumption. Scarcity always raises prices and the food goes to those who have the most money. Rationing does secure more equality in distribution and control of prices. It thrusts the hunger upon the civil population. Soldiers, munition workers, and government officials are always well fed. The hunger in the people falls hardest upon the women and children. But rationing has little effect on the total consumption. War experience has proved that armies consume about twice as much food as the same men do when they are at peace. That is partly due to the greater physical need. It is partly due to the inevitable waste and destruction of food in camp, or by invasion, and at sea.

Beyond all this, the food production of the countries free of actual war is also demoralized, for the normal markets are interfered with by blockades and difficulties of credit to war purchasers. Prices are erratic and the farmer is uncertain. Some countries are wholly isolated. Thus production diminishes among neutrals, especially at the beginning of war.

By the necessity of directing food supplies through the whole of the last war I watched these forces unfold with their millions of tragedies.

The food situation in the present war is already more desperate than at the same stage in the World War. Then, except for Belgium, there was no rationing of civil populations until the second or third year. In the present war every combatant country was on bread and meat cards within 90 days. In 1914 Russia was full of food; for years it has been in a state of semifamine. Moreover, today every neutral country in Europe, out of fear, has already mobilized almost its full manpower. The Balkan states, Holland, Belgium, Scandinavia, and Italy will therefore also diminish in food production. The harvest of the Balkan states this year will be reduced. Denmark, now unable to import fodder, must needs kill many of her animals. Many of these smaller nations are already on rations. And in invaded countries there is already famine. It sweeps over Poland.

Out of all these forces, if this war is long continued, there is but one implacable end. That end is the greatest famine in history.

And from lowered vitality by famine comes pestilence. There was a great famine at the end of the World War. The dramatic events of peace making obscured it. And as the people, after the armistice, were mostly fed by American action, there was no major tragedy to attract headlines.

During the 24 months after the armistice in 1918 we sent something over 80,000,000,000 pounds of concentrated foodstuffs from America to Europe. That was more food than we have exported to Europe in the whole of the last 10 years combined. And this food went not only to our Allies but to our former enemies. And of pestilence, an army of typhus came down from Russia on a front a thousand miles long. At its height a million cases raged, with a death rate of a quarter of those stricken. Americans fought that battle and won.

Without all this service, famine, pestilence, and their end in communism would have engulfed Europe. There would have been no peace of any sort.

After the Thirty Years' War a peace was made, and then it is said that one-half of the population proceeded to die from famine and pestilence.

There was no America then.

The conclusion of this observation is "Who will stop the famine after the present war?"

THE SIXTH HORSEMAN—HATE

And now let us examine the destroyer Hate. He will have something to do with the American people. In his modern visage he is probably the greatest of all destroyers.

Racial hates developed to an intensity and over more people in the World War than ever before. From the miseries which followed it came another unparalleled development. That was class hate. Both of them have played a great part in this cataclysm of today.

Hate becomes completely inflamed in modern war. Nowadays fighting quickly flashes from wars between soldiers to wars against civilians. It was not so long ago that wars were fought entirely between soldiers. They had elements of chivalry and sportsmanship. When such wars were over hates did not remain long in courageous men who fought against courageous men.

But where war is made against helpless civilians an implacable hate comes. Do we need to be reminded of the 70 years of hate that survived in our country from Sherman's march to the sea?

As this war goes on, the blockade of food supplies, the attacks on civilians from the air will take more toll from women and children. As action between armies becomes more violent, the long lists of dead stream back from the front into the homes. From these wrongs and sufferings imperishable hates will sink into every household.

And do not let us think that we had not in some lesser degree built up hates in the United States during the last war, although our losses had been much less bitter. We cannot forget the hideous attitudes toward loyal Americans of German descent.

Well do I remember that some days after the Armistice I announced that the food blockade against Germany should be removed at once. That was imperative for reasons of humanity and for the self-interest of the Allies, that Bolshevism could be stopped in starving Germany, and that peace could be made. Despite these obvious reasons, the reaction in every part of the Allied world and the United States was one of indignant opposition and denunciation of any mercy. It took us months to secure so simple an act.

In the end from this furnace fire of hate statesmen no longer are free agents. The bitterness makes sane peace almost impossible. Those of us who observed the making of the Treaty of Versailles knew that the leaders there were consciously or unconsciously dominated by the fires of hate still burning. They had to get their acts approved at home. The sufferings of their people had been too great for rational action.

And one of the consequences of those hates was a treaty which sowed the dragon's teeth of the present war.

In the present war the forces making for hate are even more violent. If this war continues long enough, these hates will sit again at the peace table. Unless there be some allaying force, some entry of reason and compassion, there will be a Carthaginian peace.

The conclusion of this observation is "What powerful nation will still retain good will and reason?"

AND THE CAMP FOLLOWER—REVOLUTION

Hate, this sixth horseman, continues to ride after so-called peace is made. Famine and pestilence, together with the aftermaths of war's destruction—malnutrition, unemployment, and poverty—furnish the fuel to class hate. It is hungry people who revolt in violence. Civilians with filled stomachs do not face machine guns. Helpless, distraught, frustrated peoples accept the leadership of hate, who mobilizes them into revolution. The end is dictatorship and the advance horsemen start on the march again.

AN AMERICAN ROLE

Now America has a role to perform. It can be a great role in our history.

There is no such thing as isolation for the United States. The Monroe Doctrine itself is denial of that. And there can be no such thing as economic or intellectual or moral or spiritual isolation.

There can be no isolation from world effort to allay misery, to save human life, to bring peace, disarmament, reconstruction, and renewed hope from this catastrophe.

There can be military isolation. When I speak of joining in these wars I mean joining in the military side—sending our sons into it.

If we join in these wars, we will start with the already great exhaustion of 10 years of our depression. Then we will further exhaust our already weakened economic strength. And that exhaustion will be in a far greater degree than in the few months we participated in the last war.

And when the war is over we shall need devote our remaining resources to support our wounded, our maimed, our orphaned, and our destitute. We shall need every resource to rebuild our farmers and workers from our own misery and impoverishment. And our sympathies will be justly limited to suffering at home.

If we join in this war, the last great remaining reservoir of economic strength will have been exhausted. And hope of world recuperation will have been delayed while revolution marches unimpeded over the earth.

If we join in this war, we ourselves will develop all the hates that are inevitable from war. We shall have lost the voice of reason in the making of the peace.

And though we stay out, in our indignation at wrong and aggression we must not be led into blind hates against whole peoples. The great masses of the German people and the Russian people did not wish for the wars now going on. The vast majority of both these nations are gentle, decent people who prayed for peace even as did you and I.

And ours is a doubly difficult position. In our emotions we have a different scene from Europe fighting race against race. We have the heritage of every European race. Our war hates are not alone against the enemy. They cruelly divide our own people, not alone for the war but long after.

But if we remain out of war we might, if we have the will to do so, use our unimpaired resources, our courage, our moral strength to do mankind infinite service.

By that service we could allay the destruction of war and the ravages of famine and pestilence. That service of compassion could go far to save civilization and restore hope to men. Free of hate we could exert an insistent voice of reason in the making of peace.

And if we are again called upon for service, we have a right to demand that reason and hope sit at the peace table. Reason and hope for the world call for the restoration of those nations who have lost their freedom.

Amendment of National Labor Relations Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS E. WALTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Friday, June 7, 1940

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, in discussing the wisdom of various amendments now being proposed to the National Labor Relations Act, it is important to view the act and its administration in a proper perspective. This act became law on July 5, 1935. It was bitterly opposed by large employer groups, including the National Association of Manufacturers. Labor supported it and hailed its passage as labor's Magna Carta. This was a true description.

The act was a final recognition by Congress of the essential rights of employees to organize and bargain collectively through freely chosen representatives. Until the act was declared constitutional by the Supreme Court on April 12, 1937, however, those who had fought the passage of the law refused to comply with its provisions. They were encouraged in this position by eminent lawyers. Workers who had placed their faith in this new charter of liberties sadly discovered that they must continue the economic weapon of the strike to secure the rights supposedly protected by the statute. We witnessed a reign of almost unprecedented industrial strife. The peaceful, orderly processes of the statute were not available.

After the decisions of the Supreme Court of April 1937, strikes began to decline, particularly strikes for organizational purposes. When the act became effective its beneficial effect became felt. This has continued, notwithstanding unsupported claims to the contrary.

Let us see if the act has not in fact accomplished what Congress hoped that it would.

Until 1937 the number of strikes called for organizational purposes almost uniformly exceeded the number of cases filed with the National Labor Relations Board. In 1938 there was a decrease from 1937 of 42 percent in the number of strikes called, and in the first 10 months of 1939 it declined to 46 percent of the total for the same period of 1937.

The National Labor Relations Act is peculiarly effective in eliminating the causes of organizational strikes. The figures show it has accomplished this result, sought by Congress. But in addition strikes of all characters have been on a general decline, which still continues as collective bargaining has grown.

Another purpose intended by this great act was to enable workers to join labor organizations, if they so desired, without coercion on the part of the employer to prevent them from doing so. Is the act accomplishing this purpose? During the period employees have had the protection of this act, the American Federation of Labor reports a membership of 4,006,354 in 1939, whereas in 1935 it reported a membership of 3,045,347; the Congress for Industrial Organizations reports a membership for 1939 of over 4,000,000. The figures of the Department of Labor show that the present total membership is now between eight and eight and one-half million, as contrasted with about three and one-half million in 1935. The significance of these figures as showing the act has accomplished the protection Congress intended cannot be overlooked.

A pronounced purpose of this act was to stabilize working conditions—

> By encouraging the practice and procedure of collective bargaining * * *.

Is the act accomplishing this purpose?

Since the validation of the act in 1937 the records show that whereas prior to 1937 there were very few collective-bargaining agreements in the steel industry, about 350 agreements were reported in 1937 and 500 in 1938. In the rubber industry there are now 40,000 workers covered by agreements, of whom more than 80 percent have been covered since April 1937. Figures show similar gains in other industries, such as aluminum, automobile, and electrical equipment.

These figures are proof of the extraordinary increase in collective agreements, and consequent stabilization of labor relations, since the serious acceptance of the provisions of this act. The great significance of this, especially in these times, cannot be overlooked.

Another aim desired by those who passed this act was that it might peacefully resolve questions as to who if anyone represented the employees; that is, who had been designated by a majority, whenever that question arose. In the past industrial strife was frequently caused by the lack of machinery to determine what labor organizations, if any, was the choice of the employees for purposes of collective bargaining. Does the record show that the act is accomplishing this purpose? The record is clear and indisputable.

Whereas for the 18 months prior to April 12, 1937, the Board held only 76 elections, the record of the Smith committee shows that as of December 1, 1939, it had conducted 2,543 elections in which 1,200,414 valid votes were cast. The great significance of this peaceful and democratic method of resolving these questions cannot be overlooked.

Any discussion of amendments must have full regard of this record which shows that the act is accomplishing the beneficial results intended. To millions of American workers it has been a needed protection. It has meant to thousands of employers as well as employees a lawful means for settling the troublesome problems of representation. The amendments proposed must justify themselves as part of a plan to continue and extend the benefits which have been conferred upon this country as a result of the passage of this act.

The amendments which have been proposed for the most part fall into three general categories:

First. Amendments which seek to relax the unfair labor practices condemned by the act.

Second. Amendments seeking to eliminate certain employees from the protection of the act.

Third. Amendments which aim to change the Board's structure and procedure.

The amendments which seek to relax the unfair practices would turn back our whole history of development of the law of collective bargaining, including the provisions of the Railway Labor Act. The advocates of these amendments do not claim that the unfair practices condemned by the act are not in fact unfair. It is claimed rather that the employer should be permitted to participate in the form and type of organization that his employees should join or not join, and that he should be permitted by advice or expressions of opinion, falling short of threats, to indicate that interest.

The passage of the act forbidding conduct of the employer which would interfere with, restrain, or coerce his employees in their right to self-organization, was based on the fact that employers had available and had throughout our history used their economic control over their employees to forbid workers the right to organize. Interference and coercion need not be couched in terms which unmistakably convey a threat.

It must be remembered that the act does not restrict the right of an employer to say or publish anything he desires on the subject of trade unions, provided it is not used as part of a campaign to interfere with a free choice by his employees.

The report of the National Labor Relations Board to the Senate Committee on Education and Labor upon S. 1000, S. 1264, S. 1392, S. 1550, and S. 1580 states:

> In all of the cases where the Board has found expressions of opinion to constitute unfair labor practices, the expressions of opinion have, as a matter of fact, occurred against a background of open manifestations of hostility to self-organization.

If this statement is true—and as far as I know it has not been challenged—what evil is there that the proponents of the free-speech amendment seek to cure? Has the Board interfered with the constitutional right of free speech? What court has so held? The amendment, if passed, would only encourage the employer interference, the very thing this act, as well as the Railway Labor Act, was designed to eradicate. Why should the standard of what constitutes interference with the right to organize be relaxed? No one can seriously question the constitutionality of the prohibition against interference. See Texas & New Orleans Railroad Co. v. Brotherhood of Railway Clerks (281 U. S. 548, 568). If the Board goes beyond proper limits in defining interference with self-organization under the facts of particular cases, then the courts will be, as they always have been, jealous to protect the fundamental right of freedom of speech as guaranteed by our Constitution.

The Board's actions in this regard have been reviewed by the courts many times, and as yet no decision of the Board has been set aside on the ground that it abridged the constitutional right of freedom of speech. This is most reassuring. It is, indeed, surprising to find this situation, because there arise difficult cases. Since there has been no abuse of power by the Board, there is no evil to cure. Even had there been an occasional mistake in this regard, there would be no abuse to cure by legislation, for the present act provides the means for correction of such error by the courts.

A second proposal to relax the unfair labor practices condemned by the act redefines the obligation of "collective bargaining" to require merely that the employer be required to meet with the representatives of his employees. The present law does not seek a legislative definition of collective bargaining. The Board and the courts, however, have adopted the historical meaning of that term—that an employer is required to negotiate in good faith with a representative of a majority of his employees in an appropriate bargaining unit, and if an agreement is reached, shall reduce that agreement to writing.

The figures I have recited before indicate that the act has encouraged collective bargaining and has resulted in the making of more labor contracts than at any time in our industrial history. Is it time to stop that progress? Do the proponents of this measure maintain that collective agreements in industry are not a healthy and salutary condition? To change the meaning of collective bargaining would only furnish a loophole for evasion of good-faith efforts to reach agreement and would bring back the evils the act seeks to remedy.

In Consolidated Edison Co. of New York v. National Labor Relations Board (305 U. S. 197, 236) the Supreme Court said:

> The act contemplates the making of contracts with labor organizations. That is the manifest objective in providing for collective bargaining.

It is only those who desire to substitute industrial strife for the conference table who can justifiably urge any change to lessen the obligation of an employer to seek agreement with the representative of a majority of his employees. The process of bargaining has decreased industrial strife and stabilized working conditions in industry. The proponents of this act contemplated that incipient labor disputes could be avoided and actual disputes ended if the parties endeavored in good faith to reach an agreement. The history of the administration of the act has justified this belief. What purpose can any amendment serve which would nullify this great accomplishment of the act? Such amendments must be rejected by those who profess to be in sympathy with the fundamental objectives of the act—industrial peace.

The second category of amendments which I should like to discuss are those amendments designed to remove certain employees from the protection of the act.

The act now exempts the agricultural laborer by a redefinition of "employee" in section 2 (3). The Board has interpreted this definition so as not to except from the protection of the act workers in packing, canning, and processing establishments whose work is essentially industrial in character and not agricultural. A proposed amendment to the act seeks to exclude this type of worker from the protection of the act.

To one who professes to be in sympathy with the principles of the act, the only possible validity for this proposal would be that the Board had incorrectly broadened the scope of the act to include workers not intended to be included by Congress. However, there is not the slightest validity to this contention. The courts, when they have had the occasion to pass upon the Board's interpretation of agricultural labor, have upheld it on each occasion. (Matter of North Whittier Heights Citrus Association, 109 Fed. (2d) 76, certiorari denied by the Supreme Court; N. L. R. B. v. Tovrea Packing Co., decided Apr. 30, 1940, 9 C. C. A.)

If the Board has been correct in its interpretation, is it now the time to say that the workers in the fruit- or vegetable-packing industry should not have the protection of the Wagner Act afforded employees in other industries? One cannot help but be shocked by the revelations of the Senate Civil Liberties Committee whose records recite in detail the denial of elementary civil liberties to workers in these industries in the State of California. Under the pseudo name of "Associated Farmers" industrial employers have organized on the west coast to deny and frustrate the principles of the National Labor Relations Act. Commenting on the evidence in the North Whittier Heights case, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, in sustaining the Board, stated:

> In this status of this industry there would seem to be as much need for the remedial provisions of the Wagner Act, upon principle, as for any other industrial activity.

Who can deny this? To deprive workers engaged in "processing," which has been held to be an industrial occupation, protection afforded to other industrial workers is without reason or justice. Any such amendment would simply be a "green light" for a large group of employers to violate the principles of the act. At this time in our history we should endeavor to strengthen and extend the principles of the National Labor Relations Act, rather than curb or nullify them.

Another proposed amendment would exempt from the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act any employee who has engaged in any willful violence or unlawful seizure of property in connection with any labor dispute with his employer. It is claimed that this is merely a restatement of the principles of the Fansteel case. (See H. Rept. 1902, 76th Cong., 3d sess.) It is clear, however, that to deny reinstatement for every "willful" act of violence, even though it be trivial or provoked by the employer, is going too far. It is going far beyond the Fansteel case, which dealt only with substantial violence and destruction of property by employees. As the Third Circuit Court of Appeals said in the Republic Steel case (Republic Steel Corporation v. National Labor Relations Board, 107 F. (2d) 472, certiorari denied Apr. 8, 1940), "minor disorders" on the picket line should not deprive a worker of reinstatement under the act. To lay down a rule would be an open invitation to labor spies and other agents of employers to provoke disorders on the picket line. The record shows that the Board has scrupulously followed the doctrine of the Fansteel case as enunciated by the Supreme Court. There is no need to read into the statute a doctrine already there. To go beyond that doctrine, as does the amendment, would penalize employees for minor disorders, whereas the employer who has been guilty of violating the public policy of the land would be relieved of any responsibility. This is not just. These matters must be judged on the facts of particular cases, and decided by a sound judgment. No catch-all phase is the means of doing justice in each case.

Minor disorders are subject to action by local enforcement agencies. Penalties for such violations are fixed by local regulations or ordinances. No one will contend that the employer should be deprived of his right to do business because of his violation of the law. So the employee should not be deprived of his livelihood because of some minor scuffle on the picket line.

This amendment is a modified form of the famous "coercion from any source" amendment sponsored by the United States Chamber of Commerce. During the debate on the original act this proposal was rejected.

Again the same question must be asked the proponents of this measure. What is the evil sought to be cured by this amendment? The Fansteel and other cases has laid down a sound doctrine which eliminates from the protection of the act employees who have engaged in serious misconduct. Can it be claimed that minor violations by employees are of such magnitude that the Federal Government shall displace local law-enforcement agencies, and add new penalties for such acts?

There is no need for its adoption and the harmful results that may flow from its passage justify my opposition to this type of amendment.

The third class of amendments which I shall comment upon deal with the changes in administrative procedure of the Board. Important changes have been urged which affect substantive rights of employees covered by the act. Among these proposals we find:

First. A division of functions now performed by the Board between an Administrator who will have charge of the investigation and prosecution, and the Board which will be restricted solely to a judicial function.

Second. A stricter adherence to the rules of evidence at hearings.

Third. Permitting the courts to reweigh the evidence after hearing by the Board.

What is the purpose of these amendments? Has the recent investigation by the Smith committee disclosed facts sufficient to justify this radical administrative change in the careful procedure set forth in the statute?

We must therefore scrutinize the alleged evil sought to be remedied by the procedural changes dividing the functions of the Board and modeling its procedure after the old-fashioned court trial.

The minority report of the Smith committee states:

> We believe that, in the present state of evidence adduced by the committee, no sound reason has been brought forth for the procedural changes proposed by the majority and, on the contrary, such scanty evidence as is available in the record tends more to impeach the desirability of the amendments than to sustain them. (Vol. III, p. 407, hearings of House Committee to Investigate the Labor Board.)
> Despite the elaborate inquiry conducted by counsel for the committee, and the examination by him of many trial examiners and review attorneys, there is no evidence in the record that these instructions have been violated, except upon such rare occasions as to be of little significance. Nor is there any showing in other respects that the administrative process as it has functioned within the Board, has resulted in any unfairness or lack of due process to parties appearing before the Board. (Vol. III, p. 408, hearings of House Committee to Investigate the Labor Board.)

These proposals to break into separate parts the administrative process now so familiar and well established, in the face of the principles developed from our experience of a half a century, are radical and disturbing. The complexities of administering a labor law and developing national labor policy need not be placed outside the established methods of administering and enforcing public policies. The American worker is entitled to have this law administered by an agency expert in industrial disputes, knowing, as they do, that this statute precisely provides for court review of all adversary orders, in the same manner as provided in the Federal Trade Commission Act for the review of orders of that agency.

The application of technical rules of evidence to Labor Board proceedings will serve no ends of justice. Such a proposal runs counter to the present trend even in the courts of law and equity. It is peculiarly unnecessary to apply technical rules which were designed to prevent lay juries from being influenced by improper evidence, to an agency which is expert in the field with which it deals. It should be remembered that the statute as now phrased and construed by the Supreme Court requires the findings of the Board to be supported by substantial evidence.

No argument can be made that the procedure of the Board does not afford parties before the Board a fair and just hearing. The Supreme Court has stated:

> We construe the procedural provisions as affording adequate opportunity to secure judicial protection against arbitrary action in accordance with the well-settled rules applicable to administrative agencies set up by Congress to aid in the enforcement of valid legislation. National Labor Relations Board v. Jones & Laughlin Steel Co. (301 U. S. 1).

Subsequent reviews of Board procedure have supported this judgment of the Supreme Court. Recently Judge Black, speaking for the Court, stated:

> Mindful of the separate responsibilities Congress has imposed upon the Board and the courts, we have carefully scrutinized this entire record. Within the range of our examination has appeared not merely the testimony but also the procedure followed from the filing of the charge before the Board to final decree of the Court of Appeals. The Board and its representatives solicitously guarded respondent's and intervenor's right to a full and fair hearing; manifested liberality in ruling upon evidence proposed by both sides; and conducted the proceedings in a manner calculated to bring about a just result. And as we have pointed out, substantial evidence supported the result which the Board did reach. Notwithstanding, the Court below declined to order enforcement of the Board's order, and the implications of its opinion are that the Board without a proper regard for either the limitations on its power or the evidence made findings all of which had no substantial support. Bradford Dyeing Association v. National Labor Relations Board (decided May 20, 1940).

The proposed procedural changes would take away the advantages of administrative action without adding any substance to the effective enforcement of the act. The amendment providing for an administrator in charge of the investigations has many disadvantages. The administrator is proposed to be appointed for an indefinite term. He has the sole responsibility for the initiation and prosecution of all violations of the act. He is therefore in a position to control the policy of the Board. To place the total responsibility for the effective development of that policy in the hands of a politically appointed administrator is, to say the least, unwise.

The Board and the act have been under constant attack by those who oppose the principles underlying its philosophy. Recently the Board has undergone an extensive investigation of all its records and actions by the Smith committee. After months of hearings and investigations, the evidence brought forth reveals no more indiscretions or faulty personnel than one would expect to find in any organization of its size. When these minute failures are considered together with a survey of the affirmative accomplishments of the Board, the true friends of the act will say the Board has done a difficult task in a manner which deserves the gratitude and respect of our country.

President Roosevelt stated in his radio talk on the state of our defense on May 26:

> While our Navy and our airplanes and our guns may be our first lines of defense, it is still clear that way down at the bottom, underlying them all, giving them their strength, sustenance, and power, are the spirit and morale of a free people.
> For that reason, we must make sure in all that we do that there be no break-down or cancelation of any of the great social gains which we have made in these past years. We have carried on an offensive of a broad front against social and economic inequalities and abuses which had made our society weak. That offensive should not now be broken down by the pincers movement of those who would use the present needs of physical military defense to destroy it.

There can be no doubt that the National Labor Relations Act represents, in its terms and in its accomplishments, one of our great social gains.

Apply the Monroe Doctrine

OF

HON. C. JASPER BELL

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 7, 1940

EDITORIAL BY RAY RUNNION, EDITOR OF THE KANSAS CITY JOURNAL

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, the other day I read with deep interest an editorial written by Mr. Ray Runnion, editor of the Kansas City Journal of my home city, urging that the Congress take legislative action to assure the enforcement of the Monroe Doctrine as a means for making it possible for the Western Hemisphere to remain at peace in keeping with our good-neighbor policy. It appeared in that paper on May 22, 1940.

It is my understanding that some steps have been taken in that direction in the Senate with the thought of incorporating such a provision in another bill now proposed to deal with the general problem of our national defense.

Feeling that Mr. Runnion's editorial provides a material contribution to these discussions, I wish to quote it here. It reads:

A UNITED STATES POLICY—NOW

With the conquest of the channel ports, Hitler's bombers will be within hopping distance of London. His obvious purpose is to bomb and starve England into a surrender that would give him control of the British Navy and the power to dismember the British Empire.

It is time for the United States to formulate an official policy to be followed in that eventuality. It should be the joint work of the President and Congress and should take the form of a congressional resolution.

It should state whether or not we are prepared to enforce the Monroe Doctrine in the event of European aggression on this hemisphere. It should further state whether that doctrine includes Greenland, a point on which there is no precedent to follow.

If we do not unite on a foreign policy to observe in the event Hitler becomes the master of Europe, it is conceivable that Hitler or somebody else will write a policy for us.

The situation in Europe when President Monroe proclaimed the doctrine in a congressional message in 1823 had parallels with that of today. The sovereigns of Austria, Russia, and Prussia, united in the Holy Alliance, conspired to check the growth of democratic principles and representative government. They proposed, among other things, to overthrow the republics created in Spain's old colonies of Latin America. That was the situation when President Monroe proclaimed:

"In the wars of the European powers in matters relating to themselves we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy to do so. It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced that we resent injuries or make preparation for our defense. With the movements in this hemisphere we are, of necessity, more immediately concerned. The political system of the allied powers is essentially different in this respect from that of America. We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety."

Hitler has conquered no territory which is not already overpopulated. To feed the populations of his new empire he would be compelled to exploit thinly populated areas of great natural resources. South America would be a set-up for him.

The United States would be compelled to ask itself—and to provide an answer—whether the extension of the Nazi system to any portion of this hemisphere was "dangerous to our peace and safety."

But, it is argued, Hitler could not send an army across the ocean, and if he could there would be the problem of supply.

. The answer is that the United States, wholly unprepared in 1917, had transported an army of 2,000,000 men to France 18 months after it entered the war, and it kept them fully supplied.

This was possible through joint protection of transports by the American and British Navies and because the troops landed on friendly soil. But Hitler will have the British Navy if he wins (the British demanded the German Navy in the last war) and he could convert a hostile South American country into a friendly country by an overnight "blitzkrieg."

It may be argued that we could defeat him before he landed a formidable force. Certainly we could, but we should have to go to war to do it. Whether we went to war to do it is a matter of national policy which should be determined and stated now.

Whatever the policy may be, it is the people who will decide it.

To enable them to reach a decision, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee should sponsor a resolution specifically applying the Monroe Doctrine to the present world crisis. The ensuing public discussion would provide a guide of reasonable accuracy for congressional action.

To some the mere suggestion that we form a policy at all will seem alarmist. The answer is that only fools twiddle their thumbs when a Hitler runs loose in the world.

Vocational and Technical Training for National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD W. LANDIS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 7, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE AMERICAN ASSOCIATION OF SCHOOL ADMINISTRATORS

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, with a gigantic national-defense program starting in America, we find ourselves with a shortage of skilled and semi-skilled workers. The ultimate line of national defense is to be found in the loyalty, intelligence, health, technical skill, economic efficiency, morale, and character of our citizens. Our schools should continue their efforts to develop citizens who willingly and effectively participate in the processes of democracy, to banish economic illiteracy, to establish a sense of civic responsibility, to develop habits of healthful living, to encourage appreciation of natural resources, and to improve the vocational and technical skills of our people.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following article from the American Association of School Administrators outlining facts concerning the contributions which the vocational schools and technical colleges are prepared to make in training workers in occupations which are essential to national defense.

Our Nation faces the problem of mobilizing all facilities available for national defense. Of crucial importance now is the quick and efficient preparation of an additional supply of trained persons in those occupations essential to national defense.

The American people have already made an investment of one and a quarter billion dollars in more than 1,200 vocational and technical schools and colleges throughout the country. The program of trade and technical education which this investment makes possible is carried on by an experienced administrative organization and a staff of 35,000 skilled teachers. The facilities for defense training now provided by these schools and colleges could not be duplicated in many years.

These schools and colleges, now operating in every State in the Union, can make greater use of their present plants and equipment to turn out trained workers. If funds are made available, these institutions can expand their programs immediately through additional shifts in late afternoon and night periods and in summer sessions. By giving many of the workers intensive short courses—in some instances requiring only a few weeks—these institutions can train at least 1,250,000 workers annually, thus more than doubling their normal training capacity.

This expanded program can be put into operation immediately if Federal funds are made available. In our judgment the greatest efficiency can be secured by administering this program through the established Federal, State, and local educational agencies in close coordination with the agencies responsible for the national defense.

Signed in Washington, D. C., June 6, 1940, by: Carroll Reed, superintendent of schools, Minneapolis, Minn., president American Association of School Administrators, chairman; F. L. Bishop, University of Pittsburgh, secretary, Society for the Promotion of Engineering Education; William G. Carr, secretary, Educational Policies Commission, Washington, D. C.; D. W. Creel, assistant secretary, Association of Land-Grant Colleges and Universities, Washington, D. C.; L. H. Dennis, executive secretary, American Vocational Association, Washington, D. C.; Willard E. Givens, executive secretary, National Education Association, Washington, D. C.; B. E. Packard, commissioner of education, Augusta, Maine, secretary, National Council of Chief State School Officers; S. D. Shankland, executive secretary, American Association of School Administrators, Washington, D. C.; R. O. Small, State director of vocational education, Boston, Mass., president, American Vocational Association; A. J. Stoddard, superintendent of schools, Philadelphia, Pa., chairman, Educational Policies Commission; John J. Tigert, president, University of Florida, Gainesville, Fla., president, National Association of State Universities.

Proposed training program for national defense in schools and colleges

Facilities to be used	Number to be trained	Average length of training period	Hours of training per week	Cost	Average cost per trainee
A. Public schools:
Summer schools, 1940	150,000	10 weeks	40–42	$15,000,000	$100.00
Extra shifts during the regular school year.	225,000	12 weeks	40–42	27,000,000	120.00
Expanded trade-extension programs for employed workers.	375,000	36 weeks	4	21,600,000	57.60
Total for public schools	750,000			63,600,000	84.80
B. Engineering schools	[1] 20,000	10 months	40–42	14,000,000	466.67
C. Expansion of facilities requiring capital investment.	250,000	10 to 36 weeks.	4–42	50,000,000	[2] 84.80

[1] This number (20,000) can be trained for 10 full months. Probably many persons to be trained in these colleges would need only 3 or 4 months of intensive training. The total number of different persons who may be trained for $14,000,000 would therefore equal approximately 30,000.

Aid to the Allies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 7, 1940

TELEGRAMS FROM CONSTITUENTS

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following telegrams:

MOBILE, ALA., June 5, 1940.

Hon. FRANK W. BOYKIN,
Washington, D. C.:

This organization unanimously urges and implores that all possible aid be dispatched to Allies at earliest possible moment now when days count. While we wholeheartedly endorse all defense measures proposed, what earthly good would they be if Allies suffer early defeat? The Nazis probably wouldn't let us finish them.

B. F. ADAMS & CO.

MOBILE, ALA., June 5, 1940.

Hon. FRANK BOYKIN,
House of Representatives:

I firmly believe, as do all my friends with whom I have talked, that immediate help should be given the Allies in planes, tanks, all war materials. We firmly concur in Senator PEPPER's proposal, but it is not far-reaching enough. Defeat of Germany by the Allies is the best insurance we can seek for future happiness and prosperity of this country.

JACK FRIEND.

MOBILE, ALA., June 5, 1940.

HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN,
Washington, D. C.:

Immediate aid to the Allies at this time is our best defense and the Congress promptly should authorize Government credits for the purchase of the products of the United States, also so arrange that all airplanes not now required for national defense may be traded in to manufacturers to be sold without delay to the Allies and also appropriate $100,000,000 or more to the Red Cross to care for refugees in the war area. Nearly all with whom I have discussed the situation in the last 15 days concur in the above expressed thoughts and this message goes to each Alabama Senator and Congressman.

Memorial Day, 1940

OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 7, 1940

EDITORIAL BY GORDON WAYNE

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under my privilege to extend my remarks, I enclose a powerful, constructive, and timely editorial dedicated to Memorial Day and entitled "Have They Died in Vain?", written by Gordon Wayne, and which appeared in the May 24, 1940, issue of the South Boston Gazette and the Dorchester Beacon, progressive newspapers of the district I have the honor and privilege of representing in this body.

[From the South Boston Gazette of May 24, 1940]

MEMORIAL DAY, 1940—HAVE THEY DIED IN VAIN?

(By Gordon Wayne)

Twenty-six years ago, hell reigned in Flanders Field as man-made instruments of destruction hurled death upon every living organism. From August 1914 to Armistice Day in 1918, the Four Horsemen galloped about the European Continent at a price that can never be fully estimated in terms of the spiritual. We know the material cost, for it is on the defaulted-debts ledger of the American Treasury. Then after 4 years of a terrible holocaust came peace, a troubled peace born out of the unholy conferences at Versailles at which the President of the United States was cruelly deceived and at which the then Vicar of Christ, Pope Benedict XV was not welcome. We do not propose to review the events of a quarter of a century ago. There are a few facts we would like to point out however.

In those days America entered the struggle 3,000 miles away to save democracy and end all wars. We sacrificed the lives of a million young Americans and squandered many millions more of American money. The days intervening between Armistice Day, 1918, and the opening of the second World War 6 months ago, have by no means been happy or propitious for the United States. The greatest economic crisis in all our history fell upon us in 1929 and up to this hour has not been overcome despite the united efforts of a sincere and earnest citizenship in cooperation with its government. Many historians will trace all these unhappy days to the dictates laid down at Versailles.

As we write these words in comparative safety, hell again reigns in Flanders Fields. In the shortest period imaginable we have seen the robot soldiers of the Nazi Hitler lay nation after nation prostrate, while the weak and the impotent are cruelly crushed under the might and power of mentally unbalanced leaders—a ghastly picture which becomes darker with each passing hour.

Within the next week the ordinary billion-dollar appropriation for military and naval purposes will be increased to over $3,000,000,000 at the request of the President. Make no mistake, the United States is preparing for the worst, yet hoping for the best. Where are we heading? Will we be involved? Are the two oceans no longer our most powerful natural protectors? With such weighty problems do we approach Memorial Day, the day which in a special way is dedicated to our war dead. What are your feelings and thoughts as you tenderly place a wreath or flower on the last resting place of your loved ones? What must be the innermost thoughts of those who are entrusted with the task of decorating the graves of their departed comrades in arms? Finally, what must young America be thinking? For it is to young America that we must turn if the worst comes, and to young America will fall the task of carrying on from where their fallen sires now lay. Young America will answer the call as did their fathers and grandfathers before them, but it should not, will not, and cannot refrain from the query, Have they died in vain?

Memorial Day, then, should be a solemn occasion for all of us to implore the God of peace so that the prayers and sacrifices of our hero dead will not have been in vain. In the words of the poet, "They live, they speak, they see." Surely we cannot harbor the thought of having them undergo the tortures they suffered 23 years ago on the battlefields of Europe. Man is required only once to die, and die again they will, if from the great beyond they must powerlessly behold their sons shedding blood for the same cause for which they made the supreme sacrifice these many years now gone. Let us pray, then, to the God of peace—He alone can give the answer to that burning question of the day, Have they died in vain?

All Steps Short of War?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
HON. FRANK O. HORTON
OF WYOMING
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 7, 1940

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, when does a pig become a hog? Is there any fine line of distinction? Can you tell just where one stops and the other starts?

Those are some of the questions that we are asking ourselves, and we refuse to throw our hat in the air and go along with the procession until we know where we are headed and by whom.

For one thing, we can all be eternally thankful, and that is that no American boys have yet been sent "over there" unprepared to meet modern warfare, as they would have been had they been sent at all.

It is well to remember that we are no better prepared today than we were yesterday, and if our boys go they go unprepared, just like cattle being led to the slaughter. And do not forget that the action of the President June 6 in sending 50 of our planes to help the Allies not only leaves us less well prepared but also constitutes another step toward war.

Oh, no; the Government did not sell these planes to a belligerent; they simply turned them back to Curtiss Co., who will sell them. Just a subterfuge which all the world understands.

Apparently the President is about to sell to a belligerent a quantity of surplus World War stock—500,000 Lee-Enfield rifles; 25,000 Browning automatic rifles from our total stock of 60,000; 500 3-inch Stokes mortars; 70,000 machine guns; 300 light field guns of the English type, heavy field pieces, and millions of rounds of ammunition. I suppose this sale will leave us better prepared also. We can fairly hear the "Trojan horse" laugh.

Whether the President will sell these direct to a belligerent or through a junk dealer is not revealed. Little difference, for again all the world will understand.

Article VI of the Hague Convention of 1907, concerning the rights and duties of neutral powers in war, provides:

> The supply, in any manner, directly or indirectly, by a neutral power to a belligerent power, of warships, ammunition, or war materials of any kind whatever is forbidden.

The United States as well as Germany are parties to this covenant.

The United States is a neutral, and England and France are belligerents.

The action just taken and about to be expanded by the President is an utter violation of every principle of international law and is tantamount to an act of war.

Under the Constitution it is the Congress, not the President, who declares war.

If this tantamount-to-war action by the President leads to a declaration of war, then actually the President has usurped the most sacred and inviolate right of the Congress.

Such usurpation of power spells dictator.

If you are asking us, we are into this thing right up to our necks now.

What if these little slaps on the Hitler wrist that we are administering by our pitiful help to the Allies do not turn the tide of battle in favor of the Allies; and what reason has the President or anyone else to suppose that they will?

What if Germany wins? What if the President's action has already been construed as a declaration of war by Germany? Would we or would we not be considered by the victor as among his defeated enemies and demands made upon us to pay the cost of the war?

This man Hitler strikes fast when he strikes, and if the President's action has convinced him that eventually there must be war, why not now?

Certainly we have never in our entire history been in such poor shape to defend ourselves as we are today; the world knows that; and just as certainly, with the completion of our present defense program, we will be the best armed power on earth. What comfort can Hitler find in delay?

Kinda looks as if we had "missed the bus" again.

Right now, when 90 percent of our people want to do something for our natural Allies, we find ourselves unable to do anything effective.

There has been a lot of bluff and bluster, but we have forgotten the club and the world knows that even better than we. A far, far cry from the sane and sensible policy of Teddy Roosevelt, "Speak softly, but carry a big stick." Bluff and bluster mean nothing without the club.

Hitler and Roosevelt are contemporaries, they came into power at about the same time. Hitler knew exactly where he was going and, like it or not, he went. Roosevelt at all times has been advised of Hitler's every move, has had exact information regarding the development of every new engine of war.

For reasons unknown he has not acted on that information nor has he seen fit to reveal his secret information to the Congress or the people.

The people have never been taken into his confidence.

From the very start the real question before the people, the Congress, and the President was whether this was our war or whether it was not.

That question has never been squarely put or squarely answered. Instead, we fooled around and finally adopted an absolutely unneutral Neutrality Act, which permitted us to play around the edges, but always with the hope that we would not get our feet wet.

Had we at that time decided exactly what our foreign policy was and at once taken steps to make that policy stick, then we would not be in the pitiable and despicable position that we are today.

We have had 7 years of Hitler and 18 months of Hitler's kind of war, and here we are, after all that time suddenly caught with our pants down.

We instinctively want to ring Hitler's neck and render all possible help to the Allies. Still we cannot forget that America comes first and that her interests must not be neglected.

With a possible enemy at our gates and a sure "fifth column" enemy amongst us, we simply cannot applaud the action of our Chief in jeopardizing the safety of our own people in disposing of defense weapons so sorely needed at this time.

Air Mail Pick-Up Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW EDMISTON

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 7, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE NEW YORK TIMES

Mr. EDMISTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Times of May 26, 1940:

[From the New York Times of May 26, 1940]

AIR-MAIL PICK-UP SERVICE

In the pressure of measures to provide an adequate air defense, it may be hoped that Congress will find time to authorize the extension of the air-mail feeder service which has been linking 62 communities in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Delaware, and West Virginia into the main network of the air lines. An examiner for the Civil Aeronautics Authority has ruled that this agency lacks jurisdiction either to continue the present service of All-American Aviation or to authorize its proposed expansion to include 210 cities and towns in 7 States. However, the Post Office Department, reporting to Congress on the operation of this unusual pick-up service (by which mail sacks are taken on and discharged in flight), has recommended its permanent establishment. It has also commended highly the safety record of the undertaking, which was inaugurated under the provisions of the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938.

In the time that it has been in operation great convenience has been provided to the communities served. Many off-line points which could not hope for many years to become a part of the broad national system of airways have enjoyed the speed and convenience of the air mail. Operating through one of the most difficult winters on record in the mountainous terrain which it serves, a high percentage of scheduled maintenance has been shown, and no casualty has marred the record. In all, 438,145 scheduled miles have been completed and more than 23,000 pick-ups made, with a total handling of air mail of about 75,000 pounds. Certificates are now sought for additional routes which would extend the service to New York, New Jersey, and Kentucky and provide for the transportation of passengers and express, where feasible, in addition to mail. It is highly desirable to continue this interesting innovation in civil flying.

Highways and the National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. SPARKMAN

OF ALABAMA

Monday, June 3, 1940

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, the armed conflict now raging in Europe presents a terrifying threat to the world's social, economic, and political structure. Motorized ordnance and transport, moving relentlessly at speeds never before visioned, have caught nations off guard and unprepared to meet the swiftness and awfulness of this attack. A power-driven hell has been let loose upon earth to sacrifice countless peaceful, innocent men, women, and children to the terrible gods of conquest. No treaties, no neutrality, no covenants, no pledges protect. Never in recorded history has a cataclysm of such inhuman conception and such fiendish execution brought death so swiftly to so many nor so abrupt an end to the national integrity of small countries. While we do not lose faith in the final outcome, there is no place for a policy of delay in making sure the United States is prepared for any eventuality. Now that it has become certain that a nation can throw off every restraint of international law, of honor, of truth, and of human compassion in a mad attempt to rule the world, there is but one course to follow. It is not the course of conquest. It is the course of security—first for our own country, and second for the Western Hemisphere.

And that course, what are its principal objectives? Fortunately there need be little doubt. We have only to follow the pattern set for us by the aggressor, the pattern from which there has been created the swiftest and most effective engine of assault in history. For speed and efficiency of attack can only be matched by an equal speed and efficiency of defense.

We have read aright the first and most obvious of the lessons of this new, this lightning war, and we are preparing—laggard but not too late—to put into the air over this hemisphere such a fleet of airplanes as will outmatch the greatest and most powerful attack that any foreign aggressor may bring against us.

We have not failed to perceive the importance in both attack and defense of those all but irresistible battleships of the land—the tanks. And we will doubtless be fully equal to the task of creating in good season a defensive equipment of this sort that will completely counter the aggressor's designs.

The tidings of battle that we receive almost hourly by press and radio give full account of the effectiveness of planes and tanks, and we have been duly impressed with their importance as weapons of combat. But we hear much less in the reports from the front of the less spectacular but vitally important functioning of the service of supply, of the skillfully coordinated system of transportation for men and matériel, without which the most efficient combative weapons would be powerless.

Because of its less dramatic quality, because it is less frequently and less strikingly brought to our attention, there is the possibility that we may fail to note the lesson of transport preparedness which is written large for those who care to read in the terrific speed and prompt and massive support of the German advance into the Low Countries.

It was not without definite purpose that Mr. Hitler in 1933, as one of his earliest measures of preparation for the war he has now brought upon the world, began the construction of a system of great motor roads. It is no insignificant fact that these autobahnen, now completed, interlace all the industrial regions and great population centers of the older Germany and are extended as rapidly as possible into each newly conquered province.

These great German highways, the admiration of the road builders of the world, were designed particularly for the service they are now called upon to give. And we may be sure that over them there is moving at this moment the swift and orderly processions of a highly mechanized army and a ceaseless progression toward the front of all the manifold munitions, wares, and goods which are needed to maintain the attacking strength of the combat troops.

Into the making of these great military highways of Germany there was concentrated the utmost of forethought and careful, purposeful planning, and a sustained, intensive productive effort that we, in our own ways, must not fail to emulate if we would successfully meet the challenge that must now be viewed as a definite possibility.

We of the United States of America have viewed with pride the achievements of our own road builders during the last score of years. In that period we have seen the creation of a vast network of main highway arteries, designed primarily for the uses of peace. Through a cooperative endeavor of exemplary efficiency the road-building agencies of the Federal and State Governments have converted matched appropriations of the respective governments into the improvements that have made our Federal-aid highways the magnificently useful arterial system that they are today. The Congress of the United States has never faltered in its support of the Federal-aid highway policy since its inception in 1916, and it is largely to this sustained adherence to a soundly conceived plan that we owe the splendid roadways that we now possess.

I am happy today to be able to say that, while they have been working primarily for the creation of highways of peace in these last twenty-odd years, our highway authorities, under the advice of the War Department, have not been unmindful of the eventualities of war. Ever since 1921 the strategic highway needs of the Nation have been the subject of continuous cooperative study by the War Department and the Public Roads Administration, formerly the Bureau of Public Roads of the Department of Agriculture.

The first result of this study matured in 1922 with the production of the so-called Pershing map, a carefully guarded map of the United States on which were shown all of the highways then considered to be of special strategic importance, with indication of the desired priority of improvement. The Public Roads Administration has been constantly guided by this map and its 1935 revision, first in the approval of roads proposed by the State highway departments for inclusion in the Federal-aid highway system, and second, in its review and approval of the detailed improvement plans submitted to it by the State agencies. To its knowledge of possible defense necessities and its concern that the important highways of the country should be able to meet the tests of war, if it should come, may be attributed the firm insistence of the Public Roads Administration upon standards of design and construction which, at times, have been opposed by some as excessively high and exacting.

Fortunately the Public Roads Administration—the Bureau, as we have long called it—was not unduly swayed by objections to its reasoned demands; for to its seeming rigidity the country now owes in large measure the general war readiness of its major highway system.

But though we may congratulate ourselves upon the possession of highways not ill prepared to meet a war emergency; though we may be confident that there would be no such general highway break-down under the stress of war's usage as widely occurred in 1917–18; we cannot be wholly blind to the presence in our highway system of serious weaknesses, the correction of which has now become our urgent necessity.

We must not overlook the fact that in the more than 20 years during which we have been at this job of road building on a national scale, there have been great changes in the character of motor vehicles and in the present and potential uses of the highways. Some sections of our existing highway plant were built at the very beginning of that 20-year period. They were built to serve types of vehicles that, compared with those of the present, appear primitive indeed; built also to serve a traffic which in volume and weight was but a fraction of the then unforeseeable but now realized heavy movement. Yet so well were they built that they remain today still structurally sound, however inadequate they have become otherwise to the modern service they are called upon to render.

In general, and with the particular exception of some of the older bridges, it is to the great increase in the speed of movement and the tremendous enlargement of traffic volume, rather than to any effects of the weight of vehicles that we must attribute such obsolescence as now exists in the highway system. But such weaknesses as do exist are now known, thanks again to the foresight of the Public Roads Administration, which nearly 5 years ago initiated, in cooperation with the State highway departments, the State-wide highway-planning surveys that now provide us with this important information in practically all of the States. Provision for these important surveys was wisely made in the Hayden-Cartwright Act of June 18, 1934.

With the results of these surveys in large part available, arrangements were made early in 1939 for a reexamination of the highway needs of the modern military establishment and the adequacy of existing highway improvement by a joint committee representing the War Department, the Public Roads Administration, and the American Association of State Highway Officials.

The attention of these committees has been especially directed:

First. To the designation of those strategically important highways to which particular attention should be given, and the indication of a desirable priority of improvement within the designated group of roads; and Second. To a determination of the vehicle weight and traffic volume capacities needed in the roads and bridges that may be required for military use under any circumstances likely to arise.

Following these two particular lines of study, roads of special military interest have been designated by the War Department under two general heads.

They are:

First. A general system of 78,000 miles of main highways, joining strategically important points and vital areas throughout the United States; and Second. Approximately 6,000 miles of roads within and adjacent to 101 military reservations which are considered important as Army concentration points.

In consideration of the weight and dimensions of its mobile equipment the War Department has also indicated the standards of design for roads and bridges which should govern the improvement of all of the designated routes and reservation accesses.

Applying these standards, the Public Roads Administration and the State highway departments, for several months past, have been rating the previously surveyed existing improvement of designated roads of the two general classes, and determining exactly and in detail what further improvements are essential to fit these most important highways to perform their anticipated military service.

In the general strategic system of 78,000 miles, which is composed principally of Federal-aid and State highways, surfaces are found in the main to be adequate in point of strength, less adequate in respect to width and vertical clearance, and largely inadequate in curvature, grades, and sight distances.

The most critical deficiencies are numerous weak bridges, having a rated capacity of less than the 30,000-pound load, which up to now has been the specified minimum for military equipment; and, in passing, it may be proper to note that this standard may require some revision in the light of what is now occurring on the other side of the Atlantic Ocean.

Bridges of less than 30,000-pound rated capacity are found to make up 12 percent of all bridges on the designated strategic system, occurring, on the average, at intervals of about 35 miles. On the average these structures are already carrying a normal peacetime traffic in which the maximum daily load is practically twice their rated capacity, a performance of which they are capable only with the dangerous impairment of prudent factors of safety. Included among these weak bridges are many that are also too narrow to permit passing upon them with safety, and there are many other structures that are deficient in this respect though adequate in strength.

Included among the 6,000 miles of reservation-access roads are many miles, both within the reservations and outside, that are not in either the Federal-aid or State highway systems; and a large part of this mileage is found to be seriously inadequate.

Determination of the further improvements needed on the entire mileage designated by the War Department to render it completely adequate for wartime use is far advanced and is proceeding with all possible expedition. The facts already in hand are such as to indicate without the shadow of a doubt that the further authorization of Federal highway appropriations unanimously recommended by all State and Federal highway agencies are needed, needed for purposes as vital to the national defense as others more generally recognized, needed now, and without any reduction whatsoever. In fact, it is my judgment that it would be desirable to provide that the appropriations authorized by the pending bill shall be immediately available for expenditure, if the occasion demands, and prior to the fiscal years for which they are authorized.

I would emphasize that the administrative knowledge of improvement necessities upon which the requests for these authorizations is based is of the most precise character. No vagueness of belief, but the most positive and accurate knowledge underlies the estimates of the highway officials, a knowledge based upon a most intensive survey of the actual conditions and expected usage of our highway system both in peace and in war, a knowledge which, so far as it has to do with matters of military preparedness is arrived at in full accord with and under the advice of the highest military authorities.

This bill as originally recommended by the committee provided for the authorization of appropriations for each of the fiscal years 1942 and 1943 in the following amounts:

For Federal-aid highways	$125,000,000
For secondary or feeder roads	25,000,000
For the elimination of hazards at railroad grade crossings	50,000,000

The bill as passed out by the Committee on Roads reduced each of these amounts. The respective amounts recommended by the committee are the minimum amounts that should be considered.

The need for these appropriations is supported by the fullest and most exact information. It is rendered more urgent by the probable military necessities of the immediate future. I consider that this House bill be recreant in its duty to the Nation if it votes to authorize less than the amounts provided in the bill originally recommended by the committee.

Columbia Broadcasting System Answers Congressman Mundt's Open Question to Radio Executives

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

Friday, June 7, 1940

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on page 3546 I propounded a question to the radio executives of America growing out of the problem of how far radio should go in broadcasting the horror and hatreds of modern warfare in view of the importance of maintaining steady nerves and clear-headedness as America makes destiny-determining decisions in these significant days. I have received from Harry C. Butcher, vice president of the Columbia Broadcasting System, a very courteous and commendable letter expressing the keen appreciation which C. B. S. has of the problems involved and the sincere steps which it has taken and is taking to guard against highly emotionalized speakers and programs whose broadcasts might render a disservice to the best interests of America. Mr. Butcher assures me the other radio chains are also giving special consideration to the dangers of excesses in war broadcasting.

LETTER OF HARRY C. BUTCHER TO CONGRESSMAN MUNDT

COLUMBIA BROADCASTING SYSTEM, INC.,
Washington, D. C., June 5, 1940.

The Honorable KARL E. MUNDT.
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: As discussed with you on the telephone this morning, I am sending herewith a copy of a memorandum issued by the Columbia Broadcasting System, September 5, 1939, shortly after the outbreak of the war, governing general operations in connection with European war coverage. We have earnestly and conscientiously endeavored to follow the principles and instructions enunciated therein.

I am also sending a copy of the N. A. B. report for September 15, 1939, which carries on page 3717 the text of the memorandum of European war coverage as agreed to by all three networks. This agreement subsequently was approved insofar as it applied to individual station operations at the convention of the National Association of Broadcasters held later in September, in Chicago.

I noticed in your statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, you state that Mr. Kaltenborn is on Columbia. Mr. Kaltenborn has not been on Columbia for some time.

To repeat what I told you on the phone, I think your statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD indicates that you have given a great deal of thought to this subject, as have the executives of the broadcasting networks and stations generally. We appreciate the responsibilities placed upon us by these trying times and are attempting, I believe with considerable success, to inform the public honestly and conscientiously. Certainly Columbia is making every effort in this direction.

Of course, you realize that the networks and the stations largely obtain their news from the press associations. In the case of Columbia our press association news is supplemented by our own reports by our own men—incidentally all American citizens—from European points. The press associations in general have done their traditionally magnificent job and the service rendered by radio would be virtually impossible without benefit of services by these agencies.

The nature and the facts of the war news definitely create grave concern with the listeners but neither radio nor the press has any control over the gravity of the news. Columbia, and I believe the other networks, have risen to their responsibility. Certainly our response from listeners everywhere indicates a generous approval of our efforts and a warm appreciation of the service rendered.

With best regards, I am

Sincerely yours,

HARRY C. BUTCHER.

Mr. Speaker, I am also attaching to these remarks the two enclosures which Mr. Butcher sent me, showing specifically how the radio industry is recognizing its responsibilities and endeavoring to exercise self-restraint, good taste, and justice in shaping its policies in the handling of war news. I am confident that a continuance of this careful attention to the problem by radio executives themselves, combined with a thoughtful rededication to the careful observance of the self-restraint they have imposed, can provide a far better solution to the problem than any congressional action which might threaten or restrict the use of free speech on the air. I believe a study of these self-imposed restrictions, together with a review of recent radio programs must convince any reader that with a few unfortunate—although rather conspicuous—exceptions, radio is now trying hard to live up to the standards of public service it has set for itself in the attached regulations. It is to be hoped that exceptions to the rule will not be permitted to mar the record.

I have every confidence that American radio is trying to do a sincere and sensible job of reporting war news to America. In conversation with Mr. Butcher, he told me of how certain radio commentators had been discontinued because their methods were on the side of the hysterical rather than the factual, and he assured me that radio was constantly watching its programs to keep them in harmony with the best interests of the country. It is encouraging to us all to be assured that so young an institution as radio in the field of reporting is already building a tradition and establishing standards which indicate it is paralleling the record of the American press in richly meriting the important responsibilities reposed by the rights and privileges which it enjoys.

I am frank to say that I do not quite share Mr. Butcher's enthusiastic endorsement of the degree to which radio is conforming with the admirable code it has established for itself. As vice president of the Columbia Broadcasting Co., however, Mr. Butcher may be excused for being somewhat inclined to play down radio's excesses and errors and to stress its commendable features.

RADIO IS NOT BLAMELESS, BUT IT IS ALERT TO ITS CHALLENGE

I have heard too many Members of Congress condemning "hysterical radio commentators" and "upsetting radio programs" and have read too many editorial complaints and letters of protest to believe that radio is blameless and that its self-imposed restrictions are either quite inclusive enough or quite sufficiently respected. But radio is young in this field of public service, and I am encouraged and gratified by the fact that, first, it has recognized that the war situation reposes unusual responsibilities upon it; second, it has set up a set of voluntary regulations to govern its handling of war news; third, it has replaced some of its more hysterical and least stable announcers and commentators by men and women with a greater devotion to factual reporting and less of a flair for amateur dramatics; and, fourth, it is keeping alert to the situation and is endeavoring to further regulate itself as new needs for such restraints become evident.

Radio has thus demonstrated its desire and determination to protect its privileges by the intelligent course of establishing its own restrictions against public-penalizing excesses. As a firm believer in the significance of free speech, I am sure this method has many advantages over the various proposals for intensified Government regulation and supervision which are beginning to be discussed informally, and rather too generally, in the congressional cloakrooms.

IF WAR SHOULD COME—PRIVATE RADIO CONTROL WOULD GO

If war should come to America or if America should inject itself into foreign war, complete Government censorship and perhaps Government ownership and operation of radio would probably follow as the night the day. Personally, I would abhor this action but there is little reason to doubt its eventuality. It is altogether too possible that privately owned and operated radio would never again prevail in America should we be drawn or driven into war.

One has only to look at the harrowing experience of the railroads since the Government took them over in the World War to realize what Government-operated radio would do to this great industry if we should go to war again. Too, once a political administration tasted the intoxicating blood of power which would come from Government radio, it is extremely unlikely, and contrary to all the lessons of history, that private businessmen would ever again be given the right to own and operate the radios, determine what programs to use or decline, and hold virtual monopolies over favored airwaves for private profit. Private radio would, in all likelihood, be one of the first and one of the permanent casualties of another war involving America. But America is at peace.

I know it is the hope of Members of Congress and radio executives alike that the peaceful progress of this country can go ahead without new regulations and restrictions being placed on the radio industry. I hope a faithful devotion to the following self-imposed radio regulations and a frequent revaluation of their adequacy by radio itself will prevent emotional excesses and broadcasting bad taste which might goad a disillusioned America to insist on Congressional action to prevent abuses which I am sure radio itself is ready, willing, and able to prevent.

SEPTEMBER 5, 1939.

C. B. S. EUROPEAN WAR COVERAGE—A MEMORANDUM GOVERNING GENERAL OPERATIONS FOR THE INFORMATION OF THE ORGANIZATION

This memorandum is issued to formalize and amplify the instructions under which we have been operating ever since the crisis developed.

Our plan of operation represents no basic change in the policy which this company has maintained in the past. This policy has been to deal honestly, accurately, and fairly with the news and with public discussion.

Columbia's announced policy of having no editorial views of its own and not seeking to maintain or advance the views of others will be rigidly continued.

President Roosevelt said in his address to the Nation on Sunday night that America is the best informed nation in the world. This is because we have in America a free radio and a free press. We shall continue to keep America as well informed as possible on all phases of the war, including the propaganda of various nations and the proposals and discussions which go on in this Nation and other nations about war or any aspect of it. We are not responsible if the facts either help or hinder participants in the conflict or either please or displease advocates in America of any particular line of conduct here or elsewhere.

Columbia, as an organization, has no editorial opinions about the war. It has no editorial opinions about what this country or any other country should or should not do. Those, therefore, who are its voice in presenting or analyzing the news must not express their own feelings. This does not preclude informed appraisals of the meaning of facts. The opinion phase of the situation will be covered by speakers under our usual policy for the fair discussion of controversial public issues.

In being fair and factual, those who present the news for Columbia must not only refrain from personal opinion, but must refrain from microphone manner designed to cast doubt, suspicion, sarcasm, ridicule, or anything of that sort on the matter they are presenting. This should be particularly observed when it is necessary to interpolate comment because an address is being received in a foreign language or in running fragments necessitating the filling in of time between breaks. It should always be remembered that the speaker is entitled to get his own point of view over as effectively as he can.

What news analysts are entitled to do and should do is to elucidate and illuminate the news out of common knowledge or special knowledge possessed by them or made available to them by this organization through its news sources. They should point out the facts on both sides, show contradictions with the known record, and so on. They should bear in mind that in a democracy it is important that people not only should know but should understand, and their function is to help the listener to understand, to weigh, and to judge, but not to do the judging for him.

It is impossible, within any reasonable limits, to define completely this last-mentioned aspect of news analysis. Fairness and temperateness are of its essence.

In this connection, prophecy, so far as possible, should be avoided. It is foolish to say "Germany will be licked in 6 months." It is perfectly proper to say that certain military experts (or the speaker himself, if he be such an expert) believe, in the light of the following known military facts that the defeat of Germany in 6 months might be possible.

An unexcited demeanor at the microphone should be maintained at all times, though the tempo can, of course, be varied with the nature of the news. Dire forebodings, leaving the radio audience hanging up in the air and filled with suspense and terror, of our own creation, are not good broadcasting. We should not tell the listener that, at this very moment, innocent women and children may be drowning somewhere in the Atlantic because another ship may have been torpedoed by a German submarine, or anything of that nature.

The basis of our operations is a staff of trained Americans, both in this country and in Europe, most of whom have had news training with newspapers or press associations, and all of whom have had training in broadcasting in general and in our own operations in particular. We are to continue to use Americans as far as possible, and all our correspondents abroad have been instructed and will be reinstructed not to make use of foreigners (except on those occasions where they are making speeches frankly presenting their own points of view). Foreigners will be used in our regular news coverage only in emergencies when a satisfactory American cannot be immedaitely obtained. In these cases his nationality is to be stated.

We have three main sources of news: (1) The three press associations—the Associated Press, the United Press, and the International News Service; (2) information possessed or obtained by our own staff of editors in the news department and our news analysts here and our news staff in Washington, London, Paris, Berlin, Warsaw, Rome, and Tokyo, and such other points as we cover from time to time; (3) short-wave broadcasts by government-owned European stations and miscellaneous sources of information of various sorts.

In making use of all of these sources, we must at all times be careful to label information for what it is, using the same kind of care that is habitually used by press associations and good newspapers. We must try to distinguish fact from rumor, official information from semiofficial "high sources," and so on, and from mere gossip. Of course, the greatest weight should be given to those things known to be factual. We should make known at frequent intervals that the news received from many sources is censored and that, therefore, it may be incomplete and at times even inaccurate.

If all our own people presenting news will present it in this way and analyze it with due weight given to these factors, we can keep the American public very well informed on every phase of things as they develop, help them continually to appraise and weigh the news, and make them well aware of current opinion throughout the world. It must be recalled that this opinion is, in itself, a fact. For instance, if the British people believe that the Germans are committing atrocities, the fact of their belief is important. That these atrocities are real, false, or unproven is another fact.

Broadcasting of properly identified fact, allegation, opinion, rumor, and all the other attendant circumstances in which the conflict progresses will continue to keep the American listener the best informed in the world. In no other way can he know all that he should know.

In presenting the addresses of foreign statesmen and other speakers, we will be guided solely by news judgment (in the light of program balance). If we present them when the given situation indicates that they should be heard over here, we shall do a fair and honest news job. We will have to use our best efforts to overcome the handicap of one side not talking our language. We also will have to be guided by the breaks of the news. For example, if Hitler speaks one day and no one else does, or if Chamberlain speaks and no one else does, it would, of course, be silly to leave off the speech of one side because we had none from the other. An excellent example of how fair and comprehensive broadcasting can be was furnished on Sunday, when there were speeches from London, from Paris, and from Canada, but none in Germany which were made available for broadcasting. We succeeded in obtaining the text of various Hitler proclamations and statements and presented his side perhaps just as well as if he had spoken.

The point in the foregoing and in guiding much of our operation is that if we will honestly and sincerely try to present the news, regardless of which way it points, we shall do a much better job than if we merely strive for a sort of mathematical fairness. Let us take for example the round-ups of editorial opinion which we occasionally present. Decision to present one of these should be based solely on a belief that newspaper reaction to a given thing (the British-French declaration of war, or the President's speech at the outbreak of the war) is of great interest to the general public. As long as we present them on this basis, we are being honest and fair. The minute we presented one because somebody here had some personal desire to influence public opinion on some given question, we should be operating badly. By the same token, if we refrained from presenting one because it did not reflect the point of view we had hoped for, or if we selected editorials to make a particular point of view emphatic, we would be doing an intolerable kind of job. I know this would never happen here; I mention it merely by way of illustration.

The same thing applies to presenting either individual broadcasts of European government stations or a summary of such operations for a given day. If we were merely on a mathematical basis to present so many minutes of each, it might very often be dull and tedious. If, with honest news judgment, we pick out what is salient, we will do a good job even though on one occasion we might present nothing except that which had been said over a German station or some station presenting the point of view of the other side. Here, too, we must be guided by honest, sincere news judgment and our fundamental purpose of presenting all points of view as the breaks of the news require.

We come now to the question of speeches over here on public questions related to the war. Here we shall follow our traditional policy. If there are persons in America who think we should enter the war, and others who think we should keep out, we shall permit the public debate of this question, selecting as far as possible speakers with varying points of view. We cannot do an honest job for the American public without letting them know that there are varying opinions and that these opinions are being agitated. In the same way, if, for example, the President proposes repeal of the present Neutrality Act, we shall carry as fully as possible the outstanding debate on this issue. The amount of debate naturally will be gaged by the public interest in the current question, its importance, and the imminence of action.

Our own purveyors of news over the air, both here and abroad, will be free to deal with controversial issues discussed in speeches, the same as they deal with any other phase of the general situation. For instance, they may give factual information about the progress of the argument, and our broadcasters from abroad may tell how those countries feel, what their officials are doing, if anything, toward trying to influence a given issue over here, and so on, as long as the broadcaster himself refrains from doing anything that comes out of himself which is designed to influence action one way or the other.

This memorandum has purposely been made lengthy in the hope of clarifying the thinking of all concerned about the general principles which will guide us in broadcasting the war. As a final word, it should be remembered that Americans should know everything we can possibly tell them about every phase of the situation, provided only that it is important that we put it out for exactly what it is, that we do our best to inform and explain with honesty and sincerity, and thus demonstrate once more that radio plays a tremendous part in the maintenance of all that is best in a democracy.

COLUMBIA BROADCASTING SYSTEM, INC.

NETWORKS ADOPT ARRANGEMENT FOR WAR BROADCASTS

(From N. A. B. Report, September 15, 1939)

Neville Miller made public on Monday an arrangement voluntarily reached by the Columbia Broadcasting System, Mutual Broadcasting System, and National Broadcasting Co. last Thursday in New York for the conduct of their broadcasting during the present emergency. Chairman James Lawrence Fly, of the F. C. C., and his committee, Commissioners Thad H. Brown and Commander T. A. M. Craven, were informed today of this voluntary arrangement at an informal meeting with Neville Miller, president of the National Association of Broadcasters; Niles Trammell, executive vice president of the National Broadcasting Co.; Alfred J. McCosker, chairman of the board of the Mutual Broadcasting System; and Edward Klauber, executive vice president of the Columbia Broadcasting System.

Mr. Miller explained that the arrangement had not been made public hitherto because it was felt that as a matter of courtesy the new Chairman of the F. C. C. and his committee associates should be informally made aware of it first.

Mr. Miller expressed satisfaction that the major networks of the country had been able to find ways to apply the experience they have gained in broadcasting many critical events through the years to the war crisis without eliminating that competition which all concerned felt to be so essential to good public service.

The text of the arrangement:

MEMORANDUM OF EUROPEAN WAR COVERAGE

General

Every effort consistent with the news itself is to be made to avoid horror, suspense, and undue excitement. Particular effort will be made to avoid suspense in cases where the information causing the suspense is of no particular use to the listener. For example, news of air-raid alarms should not be broadcast until we actually learn whether or not there has been an air raid; also, we will avoid descriptions of hypothetical horrors which have not actually occurred, such as discussing the things that might go on if another ship were to be torpedoed. In all broadcasts about the plight of refugees, the number of killed and wounded, and so on, we will use our best news judgment and try to avoid undue shock to the radio audience, without taking upon ourselves an unjustifiable responsibility for concealing how bad the war really is.

Broadcasters will make every effort to be temperate, responsible, and mature in selecting the manner in which they make the facts of war and its attendant circumstances known to the audience.

Broadcasters will, at all times, try to distinguish between fact, official statement, news obtained from responsible official or unofficial sources, rumor, and matter taken from or contained in the foreign press or other publications, so that, by reporting and identifying these sources, we can help the radio audience as much as possible to evaluate the news brought to it.

The radio audience should be clearly informed that the news from many sources, whether it be press bulletins or direct broadcasts, is censored and must be appraised in the light of this censorship.

Broadcasts from Europe

Broadcasters will designate, if they choose, broadcasts of news and news analysis, either or both, from Europe at such intervals as they individually deem to be desirable. It is advisable that these broadcasts be by Americans as far as possible, and that each individual broadcaster instruct the persons he employs, either permanently or temporarily in the general principles set forth here. Insofar as European broadcasts contain news analyses, they are to conform to the definition of news analysis hereinafter set forth.

Speeches by foreigners from abroad, public proclamations and statements, and like matter are to be handled by each individual broadcaster in such manner as he deems best to serve his audience, but it is essential that fairness to all belligerents be maintained and that this phase of the operations be carried out in such a way that the American audience shall be as completely and fairly informed as possible.

Broadcasters recognize that, if they do not handle the war with complete responsibility toward the American people, and if they deviate from these principles, they run the risk of involving all other broadcasters in the consequences of their acts. The operation of these principles should include at all times a strong responsibility toward the industry as a whole.

Remotes

If broadcasts become available from scenes of battle, bombed areas, air-raid shelters, refugee camps, and so on, broadcasters will not deprive the audience of the ability of radio to give them first-hand information, but will use taste and judgment to prevent such broadcasts from being unduly harrowing.

Propaganda from Europe

If broadcasters put on propaganda disseminated by radio stations or the press of European countries or distributed by these countries in any other manner, each will be guided by his own news judgment and endeavor to label precisely the source of the material, and to do this sufficiently often so that no reasonably careful listener is likely to be misled, and he will also be governed by the same rules of fairness in presenting all sides, though not necessarily in the same broadcast, nor need this judgment be a quantitative one. In this connection it is recognized that there are certain hazards in bringing these broadcasts direct to this country and extreme care will be exercised in so doing.

Domestic news

All the foregoing general principles will, of course, apply to domestic broadcasts on any phase of the war. All news broadcasts, whether sponsored or unsponsored, are to remain in the strictest control of the broadcaster in order that the standards herein set forth may be maintained. News analysts are at all times to be confined strictly to explaining and evaluating such fact, rumor, propaganda, and so on, as are available. No news analyst or news broadcaster of any kind is to be allowed to express personal editorial judgment or to select or omit news with the purpose of creating any given effect, and no news analyst or other news broadcaster is to be allowed to say anything in an effort to influence action or opinion of others one way or the other. Nothing in this is intended to forbid any news broadcaster from attempting to evaluate the news as it develops, provided he substantiates his evaluation with facts and attendant circumstances. His basis for evaluation should, of course, be impersonal, sincere, and honest.

In order not to keep the public unduly disturbed and alarmed, each broadcaster, exercising his own news judgment, will endeavor to interrupt programs for news bulletins as little as seems consistent with good operations.

Commercial programs

No propaganda in connection with the war will be allowed in either the commercial announcements or the context of commercial programs. Nothing in this shall be interpreted as barring straight news or news analysis, as herein have been described, from commercial programs.

Speeches

The safeguards of fairness and program balance now applied in the handling of speeches on controversial issues will continue to be applied and, in order to make this effective, every effort will be made to obtain the text of speeches before they are scheduled.

Memorial Day Address

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE J. CONNERY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 7, 1940

SPEECH OF HON. LAWRENCE J. CONNERY, OF MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech I made over Station WOL, Washington, D. C., May 29, 1940:

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, America rejoices today. These three words, coming as they do from a veteran of the first great World War, must seem a strangely paradoxical introduction to remarks dedicated to the memory of his departed comrades on Memorial Day. Yet, within a few hours' span of the blue Atlantic chaos the like of which civilization has never before experienced, continues to reign in barbaric horror. Simple rules of international law have disappeared, and the great teaching of the brotherhood of man seems to have been entirely obliterated.

While Europeans, human beings like ourselves, hasten terror-ridden to dig new, fresh graves for their mangled dead, we pause as a nation to place new, fresh flowers on our heroes' graves and to rejoice that we are at peace. Rather than a day of sadness for us, this Decoration Day is one of complete gratitude to those who have died for our country, for to them we are indebted for the preservation of the principles of Americanism, which, in offering life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, fundamentally mean peace.

And so we pause to pay our various tributes, and by word and pen, by parade of colors, by religious and patriotic exercises, to testify to them by these so inadequate gestures that they are not forgotten. Individually their deeds may have faded from memory, but collectively the sacrifices made by our soldier dead cry out to us for whom they died, a warning and a challenge to remember why they died.

To remember first and always that there is a God to whom, regardless of our religion, race, or creed, we can at all times turn for guidance. To remember that religion forms the background of our daily life, that it is the bulwark of our home and family, and that it is the safeguard of our national existence. Without it tolerance ceases to be. Man rises above the level of primitive animals, and a neighbor's rights and privileges must be inviolate. So we are warned not to forget that man's right to worship God as he chooses must be preserved.

Our departed heroes challenge us as acquiescent Americans. They bemoan the fact that we know that we are living in the greatest country in the world and talk so little about it. In our self-sufficient everyday lives, we leave the extolling of the precious gift of American freedom to a few golden-voiced orators, and then berate them as political or professional flag-wavers.

We allow subversive influences to thrive in our midst, and leave their chastisement to the veterans' groups which have organized primarily for the purpose of protecting our American institutions in peace as they did in war. In reality every man, woman, and reasoning child in this glorious country of ours should be crusading and boastful Americans. For boast we can and crusade we must. Possessing as the basis of our Government the most nearly perfect document of human rights in existence, the Constitution of the United States, we can speak with pride of its complete success as an instrument in governing, and, as we near the one hundred and sixty-fifth year of our national history, can boast that in all that time never once has the waging of a war of aggression by our country darkened its pages.

For the professor in the university, the man on the bench near us, the doctor, the lawyer, the chemist, the manufacturer, the clergyman, the politician, and all others who with their minds befogged by "isms" other than Americanism, try to belittle by petty criticism our system of government, let us be prepared with counter-offensives. Our privileges are our weapons—weapons we seemingly have forgotten—our religious freedom, freedom of the press, of public speech, our free national parks, playgrounds, recreational music, sports stadia, our rights as workers to organize, our care of veterans, care of the aged and underprivileged, and, mightiest of all, our right to vote without pressure. Truly we should say often "God bless America," and mean it.

We veterans of the World War know the message our dead comrades send to us today. Their challenge resolves itself into a demand that we do all in our power to keep America out of war. Only too well they know its futility. They beg us, as tomorrow we march to their resting places and mark their graves with flags and flowers, not to be satisfied with these simple gestures, beautiful as they are, but to preach the doctrine of preparedness—for in that only lies our national peace and the saving of American youth.

I have no desire to parade my war service during the World War. It is so insignificant in comparison with the thousands of acts of heroism of our American boys in 1917 and 1918 on the seas and in France that it is not worth mentioning. And I only drag it forth on this occasion in order to emphasize the fact that having had the great privilege of serving as an enlisted man with the Twenty-sixth Division in France for 19 months I am in a position, because of that experience, to talk at first hand of the horrors of war and the tremendous need of preparedness.

The fact remains that the United States is now rushing pell-mell to protect itself, finding its protective armaments entirely inadequate. Should we not have learned our lesson from our experiences in the last World War? I served with a National Guard division that landed in France in September of 1917. So unprepared were we, through lack of proper up-to-date equipment and experience, that it was several months—February of 1918, in fact—before the division was in proper shape to actually take the field.

We found that at the last minute our wartime strength of 150 men to an infantry company had to be augmented to 250 which meant complete reorganization. Although the division had served for 6 months on the Mexican border in 1916 and the World War had been going on since 1914, the men had received absolutely no training whatever in trench warfare. Therefore, while the Twenty-sixth Division was considered one of the best National Guard divisions in the country, the entire organization upon arrival in France in those fall days of 1917 was placed in the hands of French Army instructors and compelled to learn in a few short months that which they could have been absorbing in training during the previous 3 years.

In addition to all of this, on arrival in France we were without gas masks; we were without steel helmets. Both of these had to be supplied by the already greatly taxed British supply sources until such time as they could be produced here at home.

Our American artillery at the last moment was forced to discard the well-known 3-inch light field-artillery piece and adopt the famous French 75. Our boys never saw this French gun until they arrived in France. It was completely strange to them, and it is to their everlasting credit and their American ingenuity that they were able to so quickly acquaint themselves with its intricacies and accustom themselves to the sudden change from the old 3-inch gun they had been using for years.

The scarcity of heavier type field guns was also sadly apparent. The 105-mm. and 155-mm. howitzers and guns had to be supplied by the French. If we had any, they were few.

We had no worth-while American machine guns until the American-made Browning was invented, adopted, and delivered in small quantities in the closing days of the war. Even sufficient uniforms were lacking, and it was no uncommon sight to see an American doughboy dressed in a British tunic, breeches, or puttees.

It has always been our boast that the United States had the best infantry rifle in the world, the Springfield. But here, too, there were not enough to go around, and the greater portion of the vast army we raised was equipped with rifles of an inferior grade and hurried manufacture.

Conditions were deplorable and without excuse. From the moment the war started in 1914 it could readily be seen that not only were we inadequately equipped but that the very method of warfare adopted by our military authorities was completely out-moded. We had 3 years in which to prepare and did nothing.

I am by no means a militarist. But, in the light of my own experiences, I cannot but feel that the strongest possible armaments for our land and sea forces will constitute our greatest safeguard for peace. We have never been an aggressor nation. We want nothing belonging to anybody else, but, by the same token, we demand that what belongs to us be left alone by others.

What matters the original cost if never a shell is fired from an antiaircraft gun defending our shores or a torpedo is never shot from one of our naval ships or a bomb never drops from a plane on an enemy target, if by their very existence they serve as sentinels on guard to inform the world that we here in America consider human lives and the preservation of our democratic ideals and institutions to be more precious to us than anything we possess.

And so, fully cognizant of the posthumous desires of our departed heroes—the heroes we memorialize tomorrow—with the accompanying warning and challenge, we have awakened; we accept the torch they have flung to us and solemnly promise them that we will do all in our power to place America in such a position that it will not be necessary to die gloriously for her, as they did, but to live well for her, cherishing and protecting her always. Thus, and only thus, they—our comrades—will not have died in vain.

God bless the United States of America.

Pilot-Training Program Will Be Expanded to Perform Necessary Service for America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

Friday, June 7, 1940

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I am highly pleased at the plans being formulated to expand the pilot-training program in the United States. It has been my desire to assist in this worth-while governmental endeavor and now we are seeing the splendid results of the first few months of this program.

I have had the opportunity to see first hand the instructors as they have tutored the young men learning to fly in the colleges of my district and State.

At West Virginia University, Davis and Elkins, and Shepherd Colleges the youth of the Second Congressional District have responded well to the training. Plans are ready to further participate in the expanded program, beginning June 15.

A day or so ago I discussed this fine work with Grove Webster, of the Civil Aeronautics Authority, who has been in direct charge of this work. I assured him of our desire to go forward under the new schedule, which will make available the training to additional youth of the Nation.

At this point in my remarks I include the following explanatory articles:

[From the Washington Times-Herald]

CIVIL AERONAUTICS AUTHORITY TO TRAIN 45,000 PILOTS AS RESERVES—FLYERS TO STUDY AVIATION COURSE AS CIVILIAN GROUP

(By Eugene Warner)

Creation of a reservoir of 45,000 new pilots by July 1, 1941, was announced last night in plans of the Civil Aeronautics Authority. Most of the 45,000 will be college men, 15 percent being drawn from noncollege sources.

Of this number it is hoped to put 15,000 students through preliminary training by September 1 of this year, Chairman Robert H. Hinckley announced.

ONE THOUSAND PLANES AVAILABLE

A considerable but as yet undetermined portion will be drawn from the District of Columbia, which lies in the first training district. The first district will supply 2,800 college men and 690 noncollege men.

Chairman Hinckley disclosed that not enough high-powered planes are available at the moment to give flying students advance training, only 1,000 being available this summer, but added he expected 3,000 to be ready by fall and 5,000 by next spring.

Service will be entirely voluntary, he made clear, without it being necessary for an enrollee to join the Reserves. While the training is coordinated with Army and Navy, it will remain a civilian group of flyers not supervised by the military branches.

WILL RELY ON CONGRESS

Asked where the money was coming from, Hinckley said $5,000,000 was available for the year to come, but that he was going to use it up immediately, relying on Congress to supply an additional $32,000,000 before the year is out.

He said a bill was before the Appropriations Committee now to provide the extra $32,000,000, and said he was going ahead with his high-speed program for the coming summer and fall, regardless of what Congress does about the winter and spring months.

An initial complement of flyers from colleges will finish their primary courses by June 30, 1940. There are 9,810 in this first group. The entire expansion will be based on facilities already set up for them.

AIM TO MASTER RUDIMENTS

Graduates of the C. A. A. courses will by no means be ready for Army or Navy flight, but at least will have mastered the rudiments of aviation. Three additional finishing courses are required by the Army before a pilot is deemed suitable for combat flying.

As an adjunct to the program, 1,500 instructors will be trained this summer. As the huge program rolls forward on many fronts, some 5,000 active and inactive commercial pilots will be given "refresher" courses of 25 hours, refitting them for defense uses.

Another phase of the program will see the "salvage" of thousands of civilian pilots who at some time or another began flying careers at their own expense but for one reason or another have allowed their flying certificates to lapse.

THOUSANDS OF APPLICATIONS

Still another phase will provide for "refresher" courses for 7,000 private pilots who have been inactive in flying. These will be 15-hour tune-ups.

Applications have already been received, the C. A. A. stated, from "thousands of individual candidates who have been thus far unable to take training because of lack of funds." Several hundred colleges and air lines have volunteered to take part in the program, in addition to those already offering courses.

Age limit of applicants has been lifted 1 year. Boys from 18 to 26 may now take the course at Government expense. Last year youths of 25 were the oldest accepted. The noncollege group is now expanded from 6 percent to 15 percent.

Plans for further training have been mapped out for students who finish the first course. The first course calls for 72 hours ground training and 35 to 50 hours in the air. This roughly matches Army requirements.

When the autumn school year rolls around 15,000 boys will be given preliminary training during the fall. In addition, secondary training for 3,000 of the summer-school graduates will begin.

During the spring school semester 15,000 more novice pilots will be launched into the air, and this time 5,000 will start their secondary courses.

APPLY TO COLLEGES

The first district includes Maryland, Virginia, the District of Columbia, New England, New York, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Delaware. Applicants will be under the direction of Earle Southee, at Roosevelt Field, Long Island.

Applicants should apply to the nearest college offering the training courses or to any aviation company in their vicinity. Some 435 colleges which offered courses during the past will continue their courses under the program.

AERONAUTIC LEADERS FORM PLAN TO TRAIN 54,000 PILOTS—45,000 PRIVATE FLYERS, AND 9,000 ADVANCE STUDENTS ON PROGRAM

An integrated pilot-training program to develop 45,000 private flyers and 9,000 advanced students for the Army Air Corps by July 1, 1941, has been formulated by the Civil Aeronautics Authority, the Army, and civil aviation leaders.

Designed in answer to President Roosevelt's implied recommendation that 50,000 civilians be trained to fly in the next year, the program, it was estimated today, will cost about $37,000,000. A final draft will go to the White House Saturday.

The civilians instructed under the program would be in addition to the pilots available to the Air Corps under the stepped-up training courses now under way at nine civilian schools.

Whether the projected program would substitute for, or supplement, the plan for 10 "aviation Plattsburgs" advanced by Col. Frank Knox, of Chicago, has not been decided.

EIGHT THOUSAND TO ADVANCE COURSE

Out of the 54,000 flyers included in the plan, 53,000 would receive their primary training, and 8,000 of these would go on to advanced instruction which would qualify them for the Army's school at Randolph Field, Tex., if they so desired.

One thousand more advanced students would be drawn from the ten thousand-odd pilots who have taken the C. A. A. course during the college year now closing.

Primary students would receive between 35 and 50 hours of flying instruction, advanced students between 45 and 50 hours. Those chosen for transfer to Randolph Field would have a maximum of 80 hours.

Established civilian flying schools would be used for all the primary and secondary work.

NOVICES TO BE INSTRUCTED

Coordinated with this training would be the instruction of about 2,200 apprentice instructors to care for the growing number of novice pilots.

To keep a civilian flyer reservoir of military material available for a national emergency, the plan also contemplates affording 35 hours of instruction to 7,000 persons already possessing commercial licenses and 25 hours for 5,000 with private licenses.

The South will be the training ground for virtually all the new pilots to be turned out annually under the Army's air force expansion program.

Brig. Gen. Jacob E. Fickel, assistant chief in charge of training, said the general policy would be to use schools and training centers south of the thirty-seventh degree latitude. Roughly, this follows the northern boundaries of North Carolina, Tennessee, Arkansas, Oklahoma, New Mexico, and Arizona. Southern California is south of the line.

Congress Should Look This One Over

OF
HON. CHARLES H. ELSTON
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 7, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE CINCINNATI TIMES-STAR

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Cincinnati Times-Star for June 1:

[From the Cincinnati Times-Star of June 1, 1940]

CONGRESS SHOULD LOOK THIS ONE OVER

Mr. Roosevelt's request for authority to call the National Guard into full military service should serve as a "Stop, look, and listen" signal on Capitol Hill.

The recent demonstration of the power of Hitler's fighting machine has put the American people squarely up against the greatest preparedness problem of our history. It is not a phoney problem or one that arises from unwarranted public fears. The necessities of the near future are real and obvious.

Mr. Roosevelt is going to remain President in any event until the 1st of next January. Those should be months of hard work and driving production. In any moves Mr. Roosevelt makes, with the world as it is, toward a genuine strengthening of the national defense, he can count on the support of every right-minded American.

But even in this period we should not allow hysteria to confuse the needs of national defense with other things that are quite different. The greatest danger of American participation in the present war in Europe is not the sending of our men into battle on land, on the sea, or in the air. The greatest danger is that, in the fervor incident to the beginning of war, we will entrust powers to an administration, always inordinately anxious for power, that will overnight establish the dictatorship at home that we are so much afraid of abroad.

Appropriations for battleships, fighting planes, mechanized equipment for the Army—all these are urgent necessities in view of what has occurred on the Continent during the past month. Of course, appropriations alone are not enough. The development of a strong fighting force is never a matter only of money. The making of such a force requires money—but it requires, also, organizing ability of a high order in high places and a spirit of discipline, sacrifice, and high patriotism among the mass of the people. We are not going to build up forces strong enough to keep us safe from Hitler if at the same time we conduct, and our public officials are not courageous enough to resist, a series of "gimme" raids on an already hard-pressed Government.

As a matter of course, Mr. Roosevelt should have complete public support in every genuine preparedness move he makes. But the request for discretionary powers to combine the National Guard with the Regular Army is something else again. If it isn't a war move, it at least has strong indications leading in that direction.

The founders of our Republic very wisely entrusted the war-making power to Congress, not to the President. They wanted that great power left in the hands of a large group of men, closely responsible to the people, rather than to one man, farther away in the National Capital. Even in the natural enthusiasm of a great crisis Congress should not give away discretionary powers which, by every reason of patriotism and good sense, it should keep in its own hands.

Amendment to National Labor Relations Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY N. ROUTZOHN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 7, 1940

AMENDMENT PROPOSED BY THE SMITH COMMITTEE TO SECTION 9

Mr. ROUTZOHN. Mr. Speaker, under section 9 of the National Labor Relations Act, it is expressly provided that representatives selected for the purposes of collective bargaining by a majority of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purposes shall be the exclusive representatives of all the employees in that unit. This section of the act directs the Board to decide in each case, in order to insure to employees the full benefit of their right to self-organization and to collective bargaining, whether the unit appropriate shall be "the employer unit, craft unit, plant unit, or subdivision thereof."

Major attacks directed against the Board by organized labor have arisen from the administration of this provision of the act. These attacks have arisen because of a combination of circumstances involved in the designation of the appropriate bargaining unit and the application of the so-called majority-rule doctrine. When the boundaries of an appropriate unit are established, the organization designated by a majority of the employees becomes the exclusive representative of all. As a result it frequently happens that large minorities of employees may be without representation or may be compelled to affiliate with a union with which they are unsympathetic and to which they are actually opposed. Moreover, application of this provision of the act has resulted in depriving unions of their rights and privileges as the bargaining agents for their members.

The disputes concerning the appropriate bargaining unit fall in well-defined patterns. The simplest form of dispute involves the question as to whether all the employees in the plant of a particular employer shall be grouped together in one unit or whether those employees of special training and skill shall be permitted to associate themselves into smaller separate craft units. In other instances the controversy has assumed broader aspects.

There are numerous cases in which the controversy has involved the grouping of several widely distributed plants of a single employer and the combining of employees in all such plants with one large unit. In such cases the dispute may involve more than mere segregation of employees identified with a particular craft. For instance, one of the several plants of a single employer may be unorganized, or two or more unions may have substantial membership within that plant. In such cases the selection of the larger employer unit may work to the detriment of not only unorganized employees but also to the detriment of the union which may have a majority in one or more plants but a minority of the total number of employees in all plants combined. Cases in this category are related in principle to the controversies in which the Board has grouped the employees of two or more employers, where circumstances indicated that these employers banded together in an organization of their own. Results in such cases have been similar to those in which the Board has joined the numerous plants of a single employer. Unorganized employees have been forced to affiliate with unions or else lose their means of livelihood; other employees have been compelled to abandon union membership of long standing and to affiliate with other organizations.

The results of these controversies have not been pleasant. When unions have been disfranchised and deprived of their representative functions, strikes and boycotts have frequently occurred. In several cases these defeated industrial unions have threatened employers with drastic action if they proceeded to carry out their statutory obligation of giving exclusive recognition to the victorious organization. Employers caught in this dilemma have suffered tremendous losses, even when complying fully with their responsibilities and duties imposed by law.

The Board has attempted to avoid some of the criticisms directed against it by adopting a principle of determination of the appropriate unit called the Globe doctrine. The original Globe doctrine provided that in a conflict between a craft union and an industrial union, the employees in the craft union would be given an opportunity to vote as to whether they desired to be incorporated into the industrial union or to remain separate. However, the application of this doctrine has proved ineffective, due to the widely divergent views of the three present Board members. For instance, Board Member Edwin S. Smith has admitted his bias in favor of the industrial type of union, and therefore applies the Globe doctrine only when there is a previous history of collective bargaining for the craft union within the particular plant. Board Member William Leiserson believes that the Globe doctrine should not be applied where there has been a past history of collective bargaining that has culminated in the selection of a bargaining unit and the making of a contract. Furthermore, Dr. Leiserson believes that once an industrial union has been selected and contract entered into, a craft union is forever foreclosed from having a separate collective-bargaining representative. Board Chairman J. Warren Madden believes that the Globe doctrine should be applied in a situation where the majority of a craft unit desires a separate bargaining representative.

The net effect of the application of this formula as applied by the present Board has resulted in more or less chaotic conditions. Board Chairman Madden himself stated that there was no uniformity in the views of the three Board members, and, while there had been some experimentation in an attempt to reach a satisfactory formula, the experimentation has not succeeded in finding a satisfactory formula. Furthermore, this doctrine has created a situation where an industrial union may drive out a craft union and establish itself forever without fear of dislocation.

It should be noted that the formula of the Globe doctrine has no effect in those situations involving more than one plant of a single employer or the grouping of two or more employers in a single bargaining unit. The Board has worked out no system for the determination of these situations, and the result, therefore, has been determined by the pressure upon and bias of the Board members in particular cases.

It has been truly charged by the president of the A. F. of L., William Green, that the Board has committed all the crimes in the calendar in its definition of the appropriate bargaining unit. For example, in the Pittsburgh Plate Glass case, which decision was criticized before the Smith committee by Dr. Leiserson as "thoroughly impractical," there resulted a certification of a union in a unit composed of the several plants of a single employer. In at least one of these plants the union had no representation whatever and, in fact, the plant was not even in the same State as the others. In the Pacific Longshoremen's case, the Board exercised arbitrary discretion, in gerrymandering of a geographical district in determining the proper unit for collective bargaining. By this ruling, working men are obliged to accept the representation of an imposed labor collectivity which they actively oppose. The decision in this case was in direct contravention of the collective labor agreements between the A. F. of L. unions and employers, and had the effect of wiping out valid contracts and destroying an entire west coast federation as a collective bargaining agent.

That the Board's interpretation and application of section 9 is in defiance of the clearly expressed intent of Congress is demonstrated by the comment of Senator WAGNER, who was largely responsible for the National Labor Relations Act. He assured the American Federation of Labor that the principle of free choice of representatives "whether the workers are what are commonly understood to be craft workers or so-called general-production workers" was "completely and perfectly protected" by the act.

As a result of the Board's evasion of the congressional intent in its interpretations of section 9, it has long been apparent that some change is necessary to prevent the arbitrary exercise of the Board's biased discretion. The majority of the Smith committee, in an attempt to arrive at a satisfactory formula that would prevent this or any other Board from emasculating the intent of Congress, adopted the substance of a proposal made by Dean Lloyd K. Garrison, of the Wisconsin Law School, former chairman of the old Labor Board. As a witness before the Smith committee on behalf of the National Labor Relations Board, Dean Garrison stated that the question of the appropriate bargaining unit was one which could not be settled by the Board, by the courts, or by the Congress. It was his suggestion, therefore, that the responsibility for determining the unit should be left to the union themselves. As a temporary solution the Smith committee adopted Dean Garrison's proposal and recommended an amendment along those lines. After more careful consideration, consultation with profound thinkers in the field of labor relations, and a study of legislation suggested by interested groups, the majority of the Smith committee now feels that Dean Garrison's proposal does not go far enough in settling that troublesome question.

The majority found that, in essence, Dean Garrison's amendment proposed to relieve the Board of all responsibility in determining the appropriate bargaining unit when presented with petitions from two or more unions each claiming a different unit. The majority of the Smith committee feels that this proposal is merely one to save the Board from criticism brought on by its arbitrary actions. It further feels that it is the duty, as it is the privilege, of this Congress to protect the rights of American working men in their democratic choice of collective bargaining representatives. To leave employees in bitter internecine warfare would be to deprive them of the gains which have come through the enlightened public opinion of recent years.

The procedural defect in the Garrison proposal of the lack of an arbiter to require the contending units to reach an agreement is provided against by the substitute amendment in that the Board is empowered to compel those units to settle their differences by means of the ballot box. This gives each contending unit as fair an opportunity as the others. There is no chance that the wishes of the majority of a unit smaller than one of all the employees would be ignored; it is their own choice as to the type of organization, if any, they desire for a bargaining representative. By such an immediate and fair determination of differences the reasons for resort to strike action or boycott pressure to settle such differences can be largely removed.

Both Dean Garrison and Mr. Madden agreed that the problem of the appropriate unit was not one for either the Board, the Congress, or the courts to attempt to decide. Therefore, it would seem that the only possible alternative is to leave it to the employees themselves. This is done under the proposed amendment to section 9; all that we have done is to provide the machinery whereby the employees may express their desires; all that the Board is to do is to provide the framework by which those desires may be expressed; and all that the courts are to do is to see that the congressional intent has been carried out by the machinery established.

Some thought may be expressed that, by the terms of the substitute amendment, favoritism is being shown to craft unionism as opposed to industrial unionism. This is not true. The effect of the new section 9 (e) is solely to allow the wishes of the majority of the employees to be expressed while protecting the rights of those employees who desire a smaller unit.

In the trade-union movement the craft type of union has had a long and honorable history. Practically all of the gains achieved by labor prior to the passage of the National Labor Relations Act were achieved through the efforts of this type of unionism. Therefore, to foreclose craft unionism in favor of the industrial type, which has a much more recent history, by legislative or administrative fiat would be working an injustice to craft unionism that is undeserved.

Advocates of industrial unionism have argued that in our form of industrial economy the industrial unit will survive because of its greater adaptability to that economy. I do not share this belief, but I do believe that it is not the place of the Congress to determine that survival; that should be worked out by labor itself. Principles of democracy demand that the rules of the game be made fair to both contestants and that neither side be favored by the Congress. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the fundamental purpose of the National Labor Relations Act under the proposed amendments, as well as in its original conception, is the protection and promotion of the right of collective bargaining, not the development of a system favoring any one type of unionism over another, with the accompanying probability of perversion of industrial democracy into single-system labor dictatorship.

In conclusion, this substitute to the proposed amendment to section 9 has the virtues of certainty, expediency, and impartiality. It is certain in that the process for the selection of a bargaining unit is provided by legislative enactment and is not subject to the vagaries of Board personnel; it is expedient in the sense that a solution is to be reached with a minimum of delay and friction; and it is impartial in that no outside agency—neither the Congress nor the Board nor the courts—may select the bargaining units for the workers; they select such units for themselves.

STATEMENT OF HON. RAMON BETETA, ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE OF THE REPUBLIC OF MEXICO

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I have had called to my attention a very suggestive address delivered over WJZ, of the National Broadcasting Co., on June 5, by Señor Ramon Beteta, the Assistant Secretary of State of the Republic of Mexico.

It will, I believe, be of interest to my colleagues of the House, with the suggestion that having myself lived and carried on business in Mexico, it was my pleasure and honor to furnish to President Wilson, upon his request, the facts upon which he based his Mexican policy during his administration.

Mr. Beteta quotes President Wilson's final judgment in relation to Mexico and the Mexican people. I wish to add my own testimony to that of President Wilson and say that during the 12 years I was there I was treated with every consideration that any businessman could ask for. It was my privilege to know Mexico most intimately from the workers who served me up to and including the President of Mexico and many of the Mexican officials.

When great numbers of Mexican citizens and great numbers of citizens of the United States come to know each other, we find that differences in aim and sympathy cease to exist. For this reason it has delighted me to know that Mexican students are coming to America to study and that we are sending students there to study in their great universities. Such practice can only result in very much better understanding and more just cooperation between these intimately associated American Republics.

I am hoping to speak within the next few days on a subject involving the cooperation of the American Republics.

MEXICO-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

(Statement of Señor Ramon Beteta)

The war in Europe, with all its incredible cruelty, devastation, and loss of human life, has had, however, one effect which may prove highly beneficial to the world—the unity of the countries in this hemisphere.

Never before was the existence of a common destiny felt keener than today, or the realization of the need to maintain the spirit of freedom, indigenous to the New World, more clearly understood.

The American Continent has before it the tremendous task of keeping peace and freedom safe for the present generations to enjoy and for future generations to maintain. This responsibility makes cooperation between Mexico and the United States the more vital for both countries and should make all other considerations secondary.

Although Mexico is supposed to be a turbulent country, it is as a matter of fact, a peace-loving nation, whose history has taught her the bitterness of the high-handed methods used by certain European powers. Perhaps on account of it Mexico has gone on record before the world, whether before the League of Nations or in the pan-American conference or in any other international gathering to condemn aggression in any form. Whether it was the conquest of Abyssinia, or the undeclared war against China, or the unlawful foreign intervention in the Spanish war, or the dismemberment of Czechoslovakia and Poland, or the cowardly invasion of Finland, or the uninvited "protection" of Denmark and Norway, or the unprovoked invasion of Luxemburg, Holland, and Belgium. This unfailing record is a guaranty of Mexico's position in the present world crisis. Mexico will never be on the side of the aggressors.

Those who fear that Mexico would fall into the hands of Germany and become the base for an attack against the United States, either know nothing about Mexico or have been misled by certain interests who want to give the wrong impression about Mexico to the effect that she is on the verge of internal disturbances. Happily, there is no danger of an armed uprising of any kind in Mexico. Rumors about so-called "fifth column" activities have been grossly exaggerated. Political minorities, which are free to organize and to express their views in Mexico, the same as in the United States or in any other country where democratic methods prevail, exist there, but they have neither the support nor the sympathy of the present Government of Mexico, which may be called progressive or liberal, but never Nazi nor Communist. Mexico's antitotalitarian attitude is a matter of record and the lack of influence of Soviet Russia is evidenced by the fact that not even diplomatic relations exist at present between Mexico and Russia.

All figures now being published about large numbers of Germans coming into Mexico, posing as tourists, are false. I have exact information to the effect that not more than 100 Germans entered Mexico during the last 3 months and not more than 400 Germans entered during the last year. These figures include men, women, and children, most of whom went to Mexico to visit members of the rather small German colony residing there. The Mexican Government is keeping a vigilant eye on all foreigners who live in the country and will not hesitate to expel anyone attempting to disturb public order or to interfere in Mexico's internal affairs, regardless of the foreigner's political ideology.

In her efforts to raise the standard of living of her working classes, to help the underprivileged groups, and to enforce her labor legislation, in order to give adequate protection to the workers, Mexico has followed the same general policies of other democratic countries. Like them, Mexico is also attempting to preserve individual liberties and democratic methods without ignoring the necessity of correcting the gross injustices of a system whose excesses are responsible for the antidemocratic reactions we are witnessing elsewhere. In following this policy and in seeking these aims, Mexico is neither imitating foreign systems nor accepting imported theories. Years before the Russian Revolution, Mexico launched her agrarian reforms, whose purpose it is to make independent farmers out of the peons, who had been kept in a state of practical servitude by a feudal system based on absentee ownership of land, of which Indian communities had been ruthlessly despoiled. Such reforms are essential for organic peace in Mexico and have been instrumental in making a democratic government possible.

Mexico's economic philosophy is not a complicated one: The reasonable exploitation of her natural resources for the benefit of the Nation as a whole; the improvement of her people's standard of living, which, in turn, will increase her purchasing power and her commerce with the rest of the world.

To accomplish these aims, Mexico welcomes capital which comes with the purpose of exploiting Mexico's natural resources, not her people; investors who are ready to cooperate with the working classes within the framework of the laws of the land; Mexico welcomes such investors and is happy to see them obtain legitimate profits while helping the Mexicans to make their country a better place in which to live.

President Woodrow Wilson, more than 20 years ago, understood Mexico's problem perfectly when he wrote:

"What Mexico needs more than anything else is financial support which will not involve the sale of her liberties and the enslavement of her people.

"Property owned by foreigners, enterprises conducted by foreigners, will never be safe in Mexico so long as their existence and the method of their use and conduct excite the suspicion and, upon occasion, the hatred of the people of the country itself.

"I am speaking of a system and not uttering an indictment. The system by which Mexico has been financially assisted has in the past generally bound her hand and foot and left her in effect without a free government. It has almost in every instance deprived her people of the part they were entitled to play in the determination of their own destiny and development."

The freedom of Mexico to determine her own destiny and development is essential, not only for Mexico's welfare but also for the friendly and mutually profitable relations between our two countries.

Mexico will never be a menace to her neighbor to the North; her natural resources, such as they are, will always be ready for use in the defense of this continent against any aggression, for she will be willing to do her share in any policy of collective security for the New World decided upon by the countries concerned. Mexico's faith in democracy has not faltered, in spite of the apparent destructive efficiency of other governmental systems. Mexico's love of peace and liberty has become stronger during the present world crisis and her determination to maintain her democratic institutions is firmer than ever. Mexico will go hand in hand with the United States and the other American republics in a common effort to maintain the Western Hemisphere free from war and tyranny.

HITLER'S ARMING MEANT NOTHING TO ROOSEVELT—INSTEAD OF REPAIRING AIRPLANES, HE PUT UP A $100,000 SUNDAY-SCHOOL BUILDING ON LANGLEY FIELD

(By Morris D. Ervin)

WASHINGTON, June 4.—One thing is pretty sure, and it is that if President Roosevelt really hopes to get nonpartisan support from the Republicans for his rearmament program, he had better not make any more fireside chats like the last.

Time after time he compared what had been done during the 7 Republican years preceding his administration with the 7 years that have followed. As he has done in all his political speeches, he compared present conditions with the conditions that prevailed in March 1933, when he took office.

The Republicans insist that there were reasons, and very good reasons, why the national-defense system of 1933 was and should be a smaller system than the one that the Nation should now have. As a matter of fact, had Coolidge and Hoover advocated one-half the armament program that Roosevelt is now quite properly urging, they would have been accused, and quite properly so, of starting another world-wide armament race.

IT WAS ANOTHER WORLD

Up until 1933 the whole world was depending upon the new systems of collective security. Germany was disarmed, Hitler was still an eccentric painter, our friends, England and France, had the biggest navy and the biggest army in the world, and the whole world was intent on getting along with the least armament possible. Navies were limited by treaty. The League of Nations, which in 1920 Roosevelt campaigned for, was still functioning.

This system of collective security did not begin to break down until 2 months after Roosevelt came into office. It was then that Hitler came into power. Under him Germany began rapidly to rearm and England and France permitted it.

It was not until then that there was any reason for America to enter upon armament extension.

So, the comparison of what has been accomplished during the past 7 years with what was done in the 7 years prior to that is not a fair comparisen.

But in view of the fact that the heads of the present administration did know that the system of collective security had broken down in 1933, it is a fair question to ask whether it has done everything during these past 7 years that it might have done.

Assuming that what money has been spent on defense has been well spent, it is still fair to ask whether enough money has been spent. And more money could have been spent without adding to the national debt, for a great deal of money has been spent on nonmilitary projects.

PUBLIC WORKS INSTEAD

It is known, for instance, that of the original $3,000,000,000 fund appropriated by Congress in the first year of Roosevelt's administration, to be spent at his discretion, General Johnson urged Roosevelt, pointing to what was happening in Germany, to spend $2,000,000,000 of that amount to mechanize the Army. Roosevelt thought well of the idea and was prepared to follow the general's plan. But Secretary Ickes got wind of it and talked the President out of it, selling him instead on the idea of a vast program of public works.

This correspondent saw one result of that change in plans. I saw bombers, pursuit planes, and training ships laid up in the hangars at Langley Field, Va., because there was no money to make minor repairs and put them back into service. And I saw the idle pilots sitting around watching the W. P. A. workers erect a $100,000 Sunday-school building in the middle of the post.

Roosevelt indicated in his speech that the United States was slow in getting started, though he lays the blame for that on his predecessors; but he also indicated that everything is pretty rosy now. He gave figures to bear out his assertion.

"ON HAND"

These figures, too, are worth examining. The President, while he used figures for material "on hand" to show the condition of the armed forces in 1933, did not use comparable figures for 1940. His 1940 figures are for material "on hand and on order." When you're faced with a hold-up man there is a lot of difference between having a gun in your hand and one on order from the gun factory. It's the difference between shooting a robber and being shot.

"In 1933," said Mr. Roosevelt, "we had only 355 antiaircraft guns. We now have more than 1,700 modern antiaircraft guns of all types on hand or on order."

A table submitted to the Senate Appropriations Committee only 4 days before Mr. Roosevelt made his speech shows that we have four hundred and forty-eight 3-inch antiaircraft guns, no 90-mm. antiaircraft guns, and fifteen 37-mm. antiaircraft guns. The rest are "on order," but many will not be delivered for 2 years.

"In 1933," the President said, "there were only 24 modern infantry mortars in the entire Army. We now have on hand or on order more than 1,600."

The same table shows that we have "on hand" two 60-mm. mortars and one hundred and eighty-three 81-mm. mortars. The rest are "on order."

"In 1933," Mr. Roosevelt said again, "we had only 48 modern tanks and armored cars; today we have on hand or on order more than 1,700."

The same table shows that we have "on hand" 10 light tanks, 18 medium tanks, and 114 combat cars. "On order" there are enough to bring the total for all three up to 1,136 at the end of 2 years.

Prior to 1933 the Germans were building no antiaircraft guns, no mortars, and no tanks. Neither were we. Since 1933 the Germans have been building plenty of them. And we, apparently, have been "ordering" them.

GENERAL WAS FIRED BECAUSE HE TOLD THE TRUTH—PRESIDENT MADE HAGOOD WALK THE PLANK FOR SPEAKING OUT IN 1935 ON AMERICA'S WEAKNESS IN DEFENSE

(By Morris D. Ervin)

WASHINGTON, June 5.—The New Dealers in Washington are very touchy on the subject of the present state of the Nation's defenses and resentful of the charge that they failed to build up those defenses as they should during the 7 years they have been in power.

Their answer to date has been that they did more in their 7 years than the Republicans did in their last 7. That is, of course, true as far as it goes. It fails, however, to take account of the fact that Germany did not begin to rearm until after Roosevelt was in office, and that before Germany began to rearm there was no logical reasen for this country to do so.

As to the charge that the New Deal wasted money on civilian projects that might have been more profitably spent on rearmament the New Dealers simply deny that it is so.

IT WAS IN 1935

On this subject the so-called Hagood incident, seemingly forgotten by most people, throws some light.

In 1935 Maj. Gen. Johnson Hagood was in command of the Eighth Corps Area of the Army, stationed in San Antonio, Tex. General Hagood was an expert on coast defense, and his reputation along that line was high. He had devised some mechanical gadgets to improve coast-defense equipment and was known both here and abroad as an expert in his line.

A subcommittee of the House of Representatives, in December 1935, was holding hearings on military expenditures with a view to ascertaining whether the national defenses were in good shape, whether they were adequate, and whether the money being spent on them was sufficient and was being spent in the best manner.

General Hagood was requested to appear before the committee and testify as an expert. He had no choice but to do so. He came from San Antonio to Washington and testified before the committee on December 17.

FROM AN EXPERT

General Hagood frankly told the committee that the Nation's defenses were not in good condition, that they were not adequate, that money was being wasted on "boondoggling" which ought to be spent on building up the country's Military Establishment.

He said that Uncle Sam was apparently keeping his money in three pockets. There was the money for regular expenditures, such as maintenance of the Military Establishment on an adequate basis, which was very hard to get. There was P. W. A. money which was easier to get, but more difficult to spend for useful and needed purposes. And in the third pocket there was W. P. A. money, which was very easy to get in almost any quantity but was practically impossible to spend it for any useful purposes.

He said he couldn't get a nickel to buy a pencil for the Army, but he didn't have any trouble at all getting a thousand dollars to teach hobbies to the C. C. C. boys. He told the committee that he had no difficulty at all in getting $200 to build a gravel walk to the "garden house," but he couldn't get $10 to fix a busted steam pipe.

Hagood wasn't telling the congressional committee anything that he hadn't already told the War Department. He testified that he had taken these matters up with his civilian superiors and urged them to correct what he thought were mistakes which were resulting in a waste of money, a weakening of defense.

One would suppose that the heads of the administration would have welcomed the suggestions and advice of such an expert on national defense. But it didn't turn out that way. The testimony of General Hagood was given to the House committee in executive session. On February 11, 1936, it was made public.

ROOSEVELT STRIKES

On February 24, by order of the Secretary of War, General Hagood's command was taken away from him and he was relieved from active duty, a punishment only a little less severe than dismissal from the service.

Members of the congressional committee which had heard the general's testimony defended his conduct and pointed out that he had been summoned to testify by the committee, that he was under oath to tell the truth, and that he was rendering a patriotic service. Other Members of Congress also defended him and protested against the action of the War Department. It availed nothing. General Hagood was kept on inactive service for 7 weeks. Then he was summoned to the White House for a conference with President Roosevelt. Following this he was restored to active service, permitted to serve on active duty for 1 day, and retired.

That was the fate of a man who knew what he was talking about and who dared to advise the administration that the national-defense system was going to seed while public money, in sufficient quantities to prevent it from going to seed, was being "thrown down a rathole." For this service he was cast out of the Army and disgraced.

The "Hagood incident" makes it difficult for New Deal chieftains to escape the charge that the Nation's present predicament is in no small measure due to their shortsightedness and stubbornness, even in the face of warnings by experts. Nor does it help their argument that they are the only ones qualified to undertake the rebuilding of the Nation's defenses and should be kept in office to do it.

EDITORIAL FROM THE LOUISVILLE COURIER-JOURNAL

Mr. STEARNS of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial appearing in the Louisville Courier-Journal of June 6, 1940:

WE CAN STILL GIVE HOPE TO THE WORLD

Nashville has joined the long list of cities where pro-Ally rallies have been held demanding immediate aid for France and England. The great battle against the northern French armies has begun. If those armies break, freedom will be murdered in three continents. And the Americas will be laid open to Nazi blackmail, intimidation, conspiracy, and in the end perhaps ruin.

Yet Washington does nothing. In God's name, how long must this paralysis endure? With weak despair we tell each other that tomorrow will be too late, but today we do nothing.

"The Allies are fighting," says Walter Lippmann, "as men fight last when to die is the least of all the evils that confront them. It is at this point that hope is an elixir. * * * For if men are deprived of hope they may still prefer to die where they stand. Most of them will. But in place of an indomitable determination to resist and to make the foe pay the utmost and to mitigate his triumph, utterly brave but utterly hopeless men will come to think of death as a sweet release."

We, and we alone, can give that hope. But we do nothing. Were we willing to take risks we would send them at once almost a thousand planes. We could change our laws so as to speed the delivery of the planes. We could give our hoarded bomb sight. We could provide World War destroyers, World War 75's, World War rifles—the pitiful fact being that these outmoded tools are needed. We could prepare to send food in American ships if that becomes necessary. But we do nothing.

We could serve notice on the Italian tyrant that if he helps to kill France he will be killing what we hold vital for our own and for the world's welfare, and that the deed will never be forgiven. When the will to act seizes us we can be a formidable enemy. But we do nothing.

We could cease pretending that this is a crisis that can be met left-handedly, met without deep sacrifice, met by appropriating money and making big plans for the future. We could start today bending our whole economy and applying every resource of brains and experience to the task of supplying the materials with which other men may save the world. But we hesitate to make the effort. Are we afraid that someone may call this "war"? What does the name matter?

The freemen of all the earth look to America for hope. And we answer that when we have had time to change our minds a little more we shall doubtless do something remarkable.

We have had all the time that fate intends to give us. Now we must act. To act effectively we need daring leadership. We, too, are ready for hard work and for sacrifice, if it is asked of us. But our leaders appear to be afraid of us, and in this they do us wrong. Why are there no high demands from Washington?

This is not sending men overseas.

OF

HON. C. ARTHUR ANDERSON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 7, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON TIMES-HERALD AND EXCERPTS FROM RADIO BROADCAST BY FULTON LEWIS, JR.

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I introduced H. R. 9944 to provide military training for C. C. C. enrollees on a voluntary basis for the purpose of building up an adequate force to act as an adjunct to our armed forces in the defense of this Nation. In connection with this proposal I include in my remarks a brief editorial from the Washington Times-Herald and excerpts from a recent radio broadcast by Fulton Lewis, Jr.

EXCERPT FROM BROADCAST OF FULTON LEWIS, JR., FROM STATION WOL, WASHINGTON, D. C., WEDNESDAY, MAY 29, 1940

Now, in connection with all this new defense program, there was one rather interesting program, proposed in Congress today * * * a nonpartisan proposal, by the way, because it was introduced in the Senate by the Republican Senator, STYLES BRIDGES, of New Hampshire, and in the House by the Democrat, Representative C. ARTHUR ANDERSON, of Missouri.

The purpose of it is to provide the manpower behind the fighting forces—just in case we may need it. It takes far more than the army in the field, of course, to fight a war. The men behind that army—producing guns and airplanes and fighting equipment—are equally important. Even the so-called stand-by plants, which we do not have, but hope to get, to be able to turn out guns and planes and ammunition, are no good unless there are trained men to operate them.

This program is really the brain child of a military engineer from Laconia, N. H., by the name of E. G. B. Riley * * * and as it was introduced in the House and Senate today, it proposes to set up, under the War Department, a so-called home-defense force. The enlistment in that force will be strictly voluntary. The enlistments will be for 2 years * * * and no one in the home-defense force can be drafted for regular military service * * * but—

It is open only to young men, between the ages of 17 and 21, who must have the written permission of their parents or guardians * * * or to older men, 36 years old and over * * * or to any veterans of past wars.

The idea would be to take over a large part of the Civilian Conservation Corps—in which case the individuals would be paid the same amount and on the same arrangement as they are now paid * * * perhaps absorb a large part of the young people on the National Youth Administration pay roll * * * as many people as possible from the W. P. A. rolls.

Under the Army, they would be taught military training as a side light, but, more important, they would be put to work on the improvement of our coast defenses and Army posts and defense equipment of all kinds. Part of them would be trained in various skilled trades—to be ready to take their positions in industrial plants for emergency production work in time of war.

In other words, the simple objective is to turn as much relief work—in W. P. A. and C. C. C. and N. Y. A. and all of the other relief agencies—as much of the relief rolls as possible, into a force that would be building up our national defense * * * and organizing a trained personnel for the industrial plants behind the guns.

By way of background, that is almost identically the program that was adopted in Germany * * * the program by which Mr. Hitler has been able to build up his industrial production to support his fighting machine * * * except for two very important differences: First of all, in Germany the plan was compulsory on the part of the individual; in this case it is voluntary * * * and the other difference is that in Germany there was no exemption from being drafted for military service; in this case there is.

WHY NOT LET THE C. C. C. BOYS THEMSELVES DECIDE?

It is planned, as part of the national-defense effort, to let down to some extent the pacifist bars that hedge the Civilian Conservation Corps—C. C. C.

Up to now these boys have been carefully shielded from the horrid fact that wars happen now and then. Now, with Adolf Hitler's young, hale, and hearty legions stomping around Europe and a lot of us fearing a direct or indirect blitzkrieg over here, the C. C. C. boys are to be given what is interestingly described as nonmilitary military training.

As far as we can digest this term, it means that they are to be taught how to valet a tank, chambermaid a fighting plane, dust up after a cavalry horse, and so on, but are not to be shown how to shoot a gun of any kind.

The main reason for this delicacy is that the C. C. C. was started in 1933 by pacifists who mortally feared it might become militaristic, and that the pacifists are still hanging onto it.

Contributing to the discussion, Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt says that the best kind of universal training for youth would be nonmilitary—cultivating character, self-discipline, and big muscles.

Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE (Republican, Massachusetts) says:

"It would be far better to have universal service for all boys of 18 for a 6 months' period and expose the well-to-do boys to the broadening and hardening influence of Army life, rather than confine it to a single class which happened to be in moderate means financially."

Very true, but the country is not yet in the mood for conscription. That may come later. Meanwhile, we can prepare for conscription by training a lot of potential noncoms in the C. C. C.

With all due respect, there is a good deal of softness in the above-outlined thinking, no matter who utters it.

Poor boys are not drafted into the C. C. C. We think, indeed, that the regulations ought to be loosened to let well-to-do boys enroll if they want to.

CLASS ISSUE IS HOG WASH

The notion that some frightful wrong is done a poor boy by teaching him how to fight is so much hog wash. The British and French Empires were built mainly by poor boys who were born fighters, and who enlisted in the appropriate outfit to go out and fight—Kipling's Ortheris, Mulvaney and Learoyd, the French Foreign Legionnaires, and the like.

It may be most unfortunate, but the world is coming around again to a fighting era. Any nation which neglects to train plenty of fighting men and equip them with the best weapons is likely to wake up some morning to find foreign colonial Governors telling all its people, rich and poor alike, what they may do and what they may not do.

This country, being big and rich and somewhat addicted to handing out free and unpleasant advice to dictators, is in considerable danger.

TWO KINDS OF CAMPS

To calm the fears of those who think straight-out military training for the C. C. C. would be somehow antidemocratic, we have a suggestion.

Why not leave it up to the C. C. C. boys themselves to choose between military training and the dam building, flood control, and forestry work the C. C. C. now does?

Those who freely elected to do so would take careful instruction in how to shoot and care for a rifle, how to manage a bayonet to best advantage, how to run and repair a tank and fire its assortment of guns, how to lay a big gun on a target 4 or 5 miles away, etc.

Those who elected to go on conserving land would be free to do that.

There could be two kinds of C. C. C. camps; one kind for combat troops, and the other for labor battalions.

Such a plan of free choice for the boys themselves between military and nonmilitary work in the C. C. C. would be the most democratic plan ever heard of in such a case as this. And it would give the born fighters among these boys the break they ought to have. If war should come to us, these boys would be ready to jump into action as noncoms to train the draftees and volunteers.

The main thing to bear in mind in all these defense efforts is that we need an Army of 1,000,000 mechanic-sergeants, plus 50,000 planes, and 100,000 pilots, and that these needs will not wait.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL BROWN

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

LETTER FROM DR. JOHN A. HUNNICUTT AND DAN MAGILL

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including a letter regarding national defense and preparedness which I have received from Dr. John A. Hunnicutt, chairman, and Hon. Dan Magill, secretary, of an organization of World War veterans, of Athens, Ga., as follows:

JUNE 4, 1940.

Congressman PAUL BROWN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BROWN: We welcome your support of our efforts to restrain by public opinion the growing volume of propaganda aimed at our entering the European war upon a basis that will make our future national existence dependent upon fortunate international alliances.

As our initial statement pointed out, we are wholeheartedly in favor of preparedness for defense against foreign aggression, as well as internal enemies. We believe that no cost is too great, nor any burden too large, but that our people will willingly bear them in order to safeguard our national existence. At the same time we are opposed to our Congress being stampeded by war hysteria into taking action that would gradually or precipitously put us into the war before it is evident that we must follow such a course in order to defend ourselves.

At this moment there is no evidence that we are actually endangered by a threat of invasion, although we realize that there are forces loose in the world which are potentially inimical to our welfare. In our opinion, our immediate objective should be to arm ourselves to the limit against the time when we might be actually attacked in some form or another. But while we are pursuing that objective, we should carefully, intelligently, and as accurately as permissible appraise those potentially inimical forces which might become a menace to us.

In view of the fact that our foreign policy must be made by Congress and the President, and inasmuch as their actions are controlled by public opinion, we deem it of the most vital importance that Congress and the President be allowed to form their judgment without interference from those who, because of their personal fears or because of ulterior motives, might attempt to arouse public feeling in favor of hasty and ill-considered measures. For that reason we are apprehensive over the propaganda that several of the war commentators are feeding to millions of Americans.

We are confident that our President is aware of our national position, and that his desire is to prevent our becoming involved as a belligerent in the war, not primarily because of any feeling of reluctance to aid those nations who desire to maintain peace but because he knows that once we have entered another European war as an active participant we then irrevocably become a part of the European system. When that step is taken we must be prepared forever after to make alliances and enter into combines which we think are to the interest of our national existence. We will then be unable to act with national independence and to pursue policies in regard to other nations which in the past has been our privilege, because we will then be compelled to act in accordance with the national aspirations or self-interest of those of our allies who might be in most danger from rivals. When we have thus become a part of the European system we will then have abandoned our traditional policy of opposition to foreign entanglements. On the other hand, if we should enter this war, and after it is over withdraw into ourselves, we will be leaving the European countries to fix those conditions out of which may come another war in which we will again become a belligerent because of the lack of a well-defined foreign policy. In other words, we are faced now with the grave question of having to decide not only whether we shall send American soldiers to European battlefields, but whether we shall for all time to come be compelled to follow a similar course. For it is not the lives of the young men of eligibility for this war that are hanging in the balance but the lives of millions of American boys yet in their infancy and teens and millions yet unborn. Therefore, at such a time and confronted with such a far-reaching question we feel that our President and our Congress must have the support of a sane and responsible public opinion.

We believe that the President and Congress aim at developing a foreign policy which will permit us to direct our sympathies and lend our strength to the support of those countries in the world that are most peacefully inclined and most desirous of maintaining civilized practices. We also believe that the primary desire of President and Congress is to protect the interest of the United States now and safeguard it in the future, by refraining from taking steps now that will perpetually involve us in European wars. We believe our President and our Congress are fully aware of our physical and psychological nearness to events throughout the world, and that insofar as we can we must exert such influence as we can, short of war itself, upon those events.

We realize further that, because of our complex position in the world, it is not an opportune moment to publicize a foreign policy that might weaken the influence we are capable of exerting in the world. It is unfortunate, from a standpoint of national unity, that the present state of the world prevents the President and Congress from defining our position in relation to this war and European power politics. It would be dangerous to allied morale if we should officially declare to the world that we are concerned primarily with our own defense, and to restrict the limitations of our national action, for if those limitations should fall short of what the Allies might hope from us, or what the aggressors might fear from us—and the present state of public opinion would demand that they should—our moral influence against aggression would be considerably weakened.

Because our President and our Congress cannot define the limitations of our possible action in regard to this war, there is a lack of surety and definiteness within our own country in regard to our position. And because there is this uncertainty and this lack of surety and consequent feeling of uneasiness among our own people, and since it is manifestly not expedient for our responsible leaders to reassure us by announcing the limitations of our foreign policy, we regard it as of utmost importance that all forms of propaganda which prevents us from thinking sanely should be resisted and made ineffective by an opposing public opinion.

This propaganda is coming to us in newspapers, magazines, through the radio, and in moving pictures. At the risk of being misunderstood it is the duty of those of us who believe in our President and our Congress to assist them by counteracting insofar as we can the forces that, for one reason or another, are seeking to guide their thinking and action into a path fraught with danger to us now and in the future.

It seems to us that every opportunity that arises should be seized upon to uphold our President and our Congress and all other agencies working toward preparedness, and that extremists and irresponsible elements seeking to push us into the war as participants on the battlefields of Europe should be checked. For it appears that we are now in the process of making a decision as a Nation of far more gravity than fortuitous participation in a struggle involving the momentary ambitions of one nation or a group of nations against whom our feelings have been aroused or to defend some relatively temporary economic advantage we hold in another part of the world, or to revenge some wrong committed against our nationals or interests or the nationals or interests of another country. What we do must inevitably determine whether in the future we shall have, as we do now, relative freedom of national action. That is the great question our President and Congress must decide, and in the name of our future they should and must have the cooperation of a people uninfluenced by propaganda of the kind our organization is opposing.

Very truly yours,

JOHN HUNNICUTT, Chairman.
DAN MAGILL, Secretary.

EDITORIAL FROM THE WILMINGTON (DEL.) JOURNAL-EVERY EVENING

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Journal-Every Evening, of Wilmington, Del., for June 5:

[From the Wilmington (Del.) Journal-Every Evening of June 5, 1940]

TAXES FOR DEFENSE

If present plans in Congress are carried to completion there will be few citizens of the United States who will not realize that the national defense is a costly business and that it is a responsibility which falls upon every last shoulder in the land. For once at least there is no talk of soaking merely the rich. On this occasion—surprisingly, too, because it is an election year—the aim is to spread the load in such a way that only the completely impoverished will not feel it.

This, of course, is as it should be. To each and every individual, the maintenance of our collective security is a matter of primary interest. The more that fact is impressed upon the minds of all our people, the more certain we can be that the huge sums now being raised will be wisely spent and the more surely the administration will be held to a strict accountability for the expenditures it makes.

In withholding temporarily approval of some of the revenue-raising proposals before Congress, notably the suggestion for an increase in the debt limit, the Republican leaders are not in any sense registering opposition to the national-defense program. They are simply reflecting the popular determination that this time the money of the people will be used exclusively for the purposes named and will be distributed by men whose only concern is that the country shall receive full value for its investment.

Considering the waste which marked our course in the World War and still later the extravagances of the New Deal in seeking to correct our domestic troubles, this is a wise precaution. From all appearances there are serious days ahead—days when the country will have to give freely of its resources in order to protect its people and its property.

In any scheme of national defense, financial stability is only slightly less important than are arsenals full of guns, harbors clogged with warships, and airdromes bulging with planes.

RESOLUTION BY AMERICAN FEDERATION OF TEACHERS, LOCAL 401, UNIVERSITY OF WASHINGTON

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I attach hereto a resolution of the American Federation of Teachers, University of Washington branch, at Seattle, setting forth graphically the views of that organization relative to the maintenance of American neutrality. As this resolution expresses the general sentiment entertained by many liberal and progressive groups of my State, I am placing it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. In these days of hysteria, when neighbor is inclined to be pitted against neighbor, when unscrupulous persons are encouraged to vent their spleen upon their enemies by hurling charges of subversive activities against them, we should be careful that we do not allow ourselves to become victims of ill-considered legislation.

The resolution is as follows:

THE MAINTENANCE OF AMERICAN NEUTRALITY

Whereas America's participation in the present European war would place our democratic institutions in the most serious jeopardy and engulf our people in the common destruction; and

Whereas there is evidence that the majority of the American people are opposed to our entrance into the war, and to all acts, words, or policies which might lead to such involvement; and

Whereas the membership of this body shares with the rest of the American people its sympathy for the neutral victims of the armed antagonism between powerful empires; and

Whereas past experience has shown that such a laudable sympathy for the innocent victims of war can be so played upon by war propagandists as to circumvent the pacific desires of the people and involve us in war; and

Whereas not only our public press but spokesmen for our Government have recently allowed themselves to become instruments of such a propaganda technique: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this body goes on record as urging that the press and our responsible public officials use every caution against any inflammatory or partisan words or acts that might in any way tend to lead us into war; and be it further

Resolved, That this body urges every citizen and organization of citizens to give expression to their opposition to American participation in the war and to protest all acts and speeches leading in that direction; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President and Congress of the United States and to the public press.

Passed at general membership meeting, American Federation of Teachers, Local 401, May 28, 1940, University of Washington, Seattle, Wash.

King County (Wash.) Democratic Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WARREN G. MAGNUSON

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 6, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. WARREN G. MAGNUSON, OF WASHINGTON

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address to be delivered by me in keynoting King County Democratic convention to be held in Seattle, Wash., June 8, 1940:

At the outset, may I express my deep appreciation of the honor of addressing you today. I hope the views I express will be your views. I want to be informative as to the immediate problems affecting the party. So distressing and complex are the problems of the Nation, I have some doubt in my ability to fill the bill. I keenly feel the things I am about to say, and be assured of my sincerity in trying to present them as I see them.

To assemble on the eve of a campaign is no new experience to many of you here. I see old political friends. Some who have carried the banner of democracy in this community for many years. To again see those faces and those of you new but welcome to us, with all the determination and eagerness apparent to take up the cudgels for the traditional causes of the Democratic Party is ample reward for coming 3,000 miles to address you. For I must go back immediately. Congress still has work to do.

Politics is filled with discouragements. I often wonder that you have the courage and faith to continue. You work and struggle, year in and year out, campaign after campaign, for those causes you believe right, and then circumstances beyond your control in one stroke often smash your very hopes. It is the courage to carry on that makes the faith of the Democratic Party.

It is a faith that has made our party the oldest political party in the history of the world. For over 140 years we have given continuous service to American democracy.

Someone aptly said, "With a Republican his politics is his business, but with a Democrat it is something akin to his religion." Had men and women like yourselves not carried on; had there been apathy to the American duty of being a party worker, democracy, as we know it, would not exist. It is the great party system of checks and balances, kept alive by the party worker, that is the very basis of the American system.

Oh, I have heard scoffers belittle the political worker. Say that he or she is a politician. That he or she goes to silly political meetings. That he or she is one of those political pests always trying to get me to vote for somebody or something, when I am one of those independents who doesn't care or knows nothing about politics. Why, in this day, with the crash of democracies heard on every side; when those same scoffers fear for the continuation of our American system, you should be proud to be classed as a party worker.

You are the good citizen. You have, for many years, helped keep alive a great party in a country where the party system is the very roots of a free democracy. And best of all, you have been the member—you are a member—of a party that for over 140 years has been fighting the forces of reaction, greed, and special privilege. Hold your head high!

You and the party have been and will be called names. Sponsorship of liberal ideas always subjects one to such opposition tactics, especially if the opposition is traditionally conservative.

Changes sponsored by us in the past 7 years were the needed changes. Ideas have attached to us because we are the party in power. If you had a new liberal thought, what would be the use of going to the Republican Party with it? It has never been a forum for liberal or new ideas. It never will be. It wants to go back to the "Good Old Days." Yes; the good old days of wild speculation of 1929 and the resultant depression—want, poverty, and bread lines of the early thirties. We stand to go forward!

So it has been our job for the past 7 years to temper and absorb these ideas. Such has been our duty. We have done that duty well. Out of the melting pot of America—from the common man, from the farms, the sea, from labor and from the exploited—has come the strength and fiber of this party. Not wealth nor big business. These people are all good Americans, even though they sometimes don't think like those entroned in the high places would like them to think. In time of emergency—yea, in time of war, God forbid—they become the fiber and brawn of the Nation.

What is more important—these people are ours. And out of the bosom of the Democratic Party has come the strength of the liberalism and progressivism of America.

Yes; hold your head high. You are a member of a party that has been part of the American way long before a Republican was ever heard of. Maybe it is the Republican Party that needs a new baptism of patriotism. This party does not. We have fought and built Americanism for 140 years. We know what it means.

The same issues are here. The opposition will use the same old tactics. Let me tell them right here and now that the welfare of the common man and the American way of enhancing his welfare is still the objective of this party, and we are still on the firing line. If there be a "fifth column" within our party to that objective, let him forthwith, before we get going, join some other political organization more in keeping with his views. Shame on the individual or party who says that the oldest political organization in this country has no right to continue that fight; that we have no right to continue fighting for the democracy and Americanism we helped to build. I hurl that misstatement back at them. We go forward. That is why it is good to see you here with your spurs on.

So, before this campaign begins, let's have an accounting. Republicans have been going around the country making lots of speeches. They remind me of a colored fellow who once came into my office when I was prosecuting attorney here. He said he wanted a divorce. I inquired as to his complaint. "Dat woman," he told me, "she jest talk and talk and talk, night and day. Ah's a workingman and Ah jest can't get mah rest. She's driving me crazy." I asked him what she talked about so incessantly. "Ah don't know," he said, "she don't say."

But the leaders have been going around talking. Hoover, Dewey, Vandenberg, Willkie, Taft, and the others. Now, we must assume that the leadership of a party is symbolic of the party. Let's look at that leadership.

Hoover: He still wants to be President again. I really believe he is more sincere than most of them. At least he has a record from which the American people can judge. But the American people want no more of Hooverism. The party leaders are having a heck of a time wondering what to do with him, because much to their discomfort, every time he pops up, the people are again forcibly reminded of the "good old days," "the chicken in every pot," and "prosperity around the corner"—the days when Republican policies pummelled this country into the worst depression it has ever known. You recall conditions. Some of you remember them too vividly. Bread lines, hunger, bank failures, hunger marches, foreclosures by the hundreds, unrest, and fear. Judges were torn from the bench by angry farmers over foreclosures. Mobs stormed city halls. That's pretty tough on the Republicans.

And it's even tougher to remind the voters of the leadership of the Democrats—the party that brought the country out of the tailspin. So they hush, hush Hoover. But there he is. Still running for the Presidency. He is the stepchild of the Republican National Committee. But the same old crowd who put him in are behind the scenes. The Pews, Mrs. Hanna McCormick, Weirs, the Tom Girdlers, and all the bankers. Someone once said, "All Republicans are not bankers but all bankers are Republicans."

Look at the old crowd here locally. I need not mention names. So they say to the public: "Don't judge us by those days and that leadership; we're a new crowd. We are all reformed." This is somewhat true, because we made some of them put on halos.

But it is amusing to now to hear them praise some of the New Deal reforms. And in the same breath say now that you have done a job, turn it back to us. Why, ladies and gentlemen, it's the same old engineer, the same old train crew, that wrecked the whole thing in '29. Remember what a time we had getting back on the track and running? They have just put Hollywood trick mustaches on the crowd. So when one becomes recognized, or serves as a reminder, they trot out another.

Then there is that great master mind of international and domestic problems—Mr. Dewey. He went out into Iowa last month and closed a ringing speech with this: "Any foreign farm stuffs that compete with the produce of the American farmer will be barred from the market. The current low price of hogs is due entirely to the Democratic administration and foreign pork swamping the country. When I am President we will place an embargo on foreign pork." The farmers cheered. Why not? They had visions of hogs swarming in from all borders.

An analysis of the importation of hogs will reveal the astounding fact that pork-meat imports for 6 years up to '38 were less then 1 percent of the domestic production and in that year reached the great high figure of 1½ percent. Moreover, the tables show that even in '38 when the pork exports reached that high level, the domestic price was tops—9.48 cents. And yet, the moneyed interests of New York pour finances into that kind of a campaign of misinformation.

In Maine, last month, Mr. Dewey said, "Let's have a two-ocean Navy" and 10 minutes later said, "I'm going to quit spending money and balance the Budget."

All the Republicans, and particularly this gentleman, have had a lot to say about the W. P. A. And what a terrible thing it is. You know—feeding the hungry and the unemployed. They are going to turn it all back to the cities and States when they get in. I hope the Republicans in the State administration and in the city council don't hear about this. They will all turn Democratic. But anyway they are criticizing it. It is easy to criticize reliefers. It is hard for them to fight back. They are pretty humiliated, 95 percent of them, as it is. You can pick on a fellow who makes $65 a month or less. And it is easy to find flaws in a vast job such as the W. P. A., which had to find work projects quickly to keep people from starving. Some of them are apt to be a little rough. I need not enumerate many of the good projects of the W. P. A. Dewey leads us to this by ending many a foolish diatribe claiming that the Democrats are responsible for unemployment. Everybody knows we inherited unemployment from the Republican Party as a result of the worst panic and depression this country has ever known. But out of that we had to find quickly things for these people to do. Some bad, some were too hastily gotten up, but most were good. Every community can point to schools, sewers, parks, playgrounds, and worth-while projects enhancing the value of the money spent.

It is amusing that so many of these critics accept the benefits of the things they criticize. And I have had Republican local officials in this State write me pleading for Federal grants for projects and find them the next week on Republican platforms hollering about spending money for P. W. A. and W. P. A. projects.

But Mr. Dewey should say thanks twice over for W. P. A. This is a good one. Back into 1938, before the presidential bee bit him, Mr. Dewey wrote Mr. Corrington Gill, the then Assistant Administrator of the W. P. A. I quote excerpts from the letter:

"MY DEAR MR. GILL: I am gravely concerned at the possibility of interruption of the W. P. A. project in my office. The discontinuance of this project would be nothing short of a calamity to me and the administration of justice. For the past 2 years this project has been continuously assisting in racket investigations of great importance. These successful prosecutions would not have been possible, with one exception, without the tremendous volume of accounting labor expended in each. Unless intimately connected with the office, no one could have any conception of the work done by the 25 W. P. A. accountants and the 10 staff accountants regularly attached to my office.

"By way of illustration, my office has been working for more than 2 years upon an organized monopoly in the electrical industry maintained by fraud and violence. This contractor's monopoly has, in my judgment, cost the national, State, and municipal governments, for electrical work in the city of New York, many millions of dollars in the past decade. The savings to the Federal Government alone, after the monopoly has been broken, would, in my judgment, pay for the continuance of the W. P. A. project for 10 years.

"The economic loss to the community as a result of this racket has been tremendous, and its destruction by arrests during this past week made an important contribution to the peace and security of industry and labor in New York."

After reading the letter we get an entirely new conception of some of the extraordinarily fine services rendered by the W. P. A. It appears that the work of the W. P. A., by his own words (and I'll bet he wished he hadn't written them), and the credit for breaking up these gangster rings is due largely to the fine work of these workers which the Democratic Party furnished to Mr. Dewey for 5 years. The second "thank you" should come from the resultant fact that had it not been for their intelligence and labor it would not have been possible for Mr. Dewey to get all the publicity that made him be considered as a Presidential nominee. Mr. Dewey continued to use these able people for 5 years without trying to raise their pay, kept them on W. P. A. wages, to something commensurate with their value. Gives you a rough idea what might happen to you if he were running the show. This also gives you a rough idea of the new group. They either do, or deliberately try to, misinform the people.

He is for participation in world affairs in New York and an isolationist in the Middle West. If this is the best leadership the Republicans can muster, they ought to do what a prominent Republican here in Seattle suggested a couple of weeks ago. Call off their convention.

To compare his wishy-washy foreign policy with that of the leadership now in Washington is like comparing a minnow to a king salmon.

VANDENBERG: He has been striding up and down the Senate for many years, and you can search the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and you will not find a single piece of progressive legislation that he has even introduced, let alone passed, in all these years of membership. He was a Member of the Senate during the depression days. He sat and watched the Democrats build up from the wreckage his crowd inflicted. Now, he says, give it to me. What contribution did he ever make to the problem in those times of stress? Where was he during the Hoover days with his now so-called purged ideas? And let the voters of this Nation recall that Mr. VANDENBERG's most potent activity in the United States Senate was his recent oppcsition to the administration's neutrality legislation. Let the people further recall, and that should not be difficult, that the thing that drew us, more than any other, into the last war was the sinking of our ships by Germany. Without the administration's neutrality bill that would have occurred again. Since the enactment of the bill and since the beginning of the war, not an American ship has been sunk because of the provisions of this bill. From the record it would appear that Mr. VANDENBERG, the now great Republican leader, would have it otherwise.

Well, our colleague TAFT is a nice, quiet fellow that some of the big boys trotted out in their campaign to try and prove to the American people that they are a rejuvenated crowd. He is part of that disguise. And, of course, the name "TAFT" will have quite an appeal to the old moneybag Republican group. He is good for a lot of collections to the campaign fund around Wall Street. So, they surged on him, and they are dragging him around the country trying to popularize him by photographing him with dead fish, dead ducks, and dead Republicans.

Willkie: Now, there is a fine candidate to present to the people of the Pacific Northwest. The head of the greatest private utility corporation in the United States. The Republicans, at least some of them, expect to carry our section under that leadership when the Democratic administration has brought into being in this section the most profound public-utility program the world has ever known. Why, the very basis of our Pacific Northwest liberalism has been founded upon the principle of public ownership of utilities. Oh, what a wreck that crowd the Willkie crowd of eastern utility magnates would make of Coulee and Bonneville. Surely they don't think the people of this section, who have fought so long for these projects would believe that a Willkie would mother and encourage this program. What havoc would they play with our section, which, because of this program, now enjoys the cheapest power rates in the whole world. Why, even the rank and file of Republicans in this community can't take that one.

Gannett: Then, there is that great liberal newspaper publisher of New York, Frank Gannett. You will recall he is the fellow, through his newspapers, that fought the abolition of sweatshops in the garment centers of upper New York. He is another rejuvenated Republican leader. His great fort has been crying about the terrible business conditions wrought upon the country by those awful Democrats.

Yet Mr. Gannett knows, in his disguise, that 100 of the largest corporations in this country, which he adequately represents, made more profits in 1939 than in the peak year of 1929. He knows further that the first 250 corporations, at the very time he is making all these speeches, made more in the first quarter of this year by 50 percent than a previous period last year. In his campaign of fooling the people again he hollers to high heaven that the Democratic administration has taken the profit motive out of business.

But, listen to this. The Gannett newspapers reported a net profit of $1,302,320 for 1939. A substantial increase over the previous year. But here is the real pay-off—at about the time this report was made this candidate was made public by a typical "New Deal business ruining" speech and a fellow Republican publisher heralded his debut under the caption "A candidate amid ruins." Poor fellow, he hardly knows where his next breakfast is coming from. He publishes a farm paper in the Northeast. On March 30 in an editorial in that paper he said feed prices were too high. In Nebraska, 6 days later, he told a group of farmers that farm prices for feed were too low and they weren't getting enough for their grain. I could go on with other Republican hopefuls, but what's the use? If some sincere Republican came to Congress to represent the farmer, is it any wonder he does not know where to turn with that type of leadership? Yet the Republicans in this State will ask the voters this fall to send Republicans to the House and Senate to fall in line with this type of eastern control. And further, to add to a group that have consistently, in the Congress, voted against every important development project, defenses, ship lines, and the vital things for the development of this section.

The local Republicans assembled here a few days ago. I was interested in the proceedings. I took my information from the Seattle Times. I assume it is correct. The account reads "The program adopted by the convention pledged its efforts toward the restoration of business confidence, elimination of fear, and return of free enterprise. It expressed faith in public education as an investment for public funds and expressed opposition to war." Now, there's a great platform. It is really specific as to what this party would do in meeting our problems. Then it says in a stirring plank, "We are opposed to a third term for the President and third termites must be removed from office everywhere."

But even as general and as vague and, may I say, as typical as these Republican planks are, we have done and are specifically even taking care of these things. They might as well have come and met with us. Business is making more profit than ever. It would be boresome to quote figures.

The fear they want eliminated is the fear on the part of the special-delivery crew that the Democrats will continue in power.

As to the schools, this administration has diverted more public funds to the construction of school buildings than any previous 10. Four thousand new buildings, 1,500 additions, and added fire-proofing, recreation facilities and classrooms to 28,000 more. In the State of Washington alone, since 1936 the administration has been awarded 269 such projects with a total donation of Federal funds in the amount of $3,660,221—broken down as follows: New construction, 36 projects, funds $590,295; additions, 29 new projects, funds $235,909; remodeling, 123 projects, funds $1,693,110; additions and remodeling, 78 projects, funds $1,093,347; new construction, repair, and additions, 3 new projects, funds $47,560. We have fared well.

This is an increase in said activity which the Republicans laud, of over 2000% from the prior 7 years. I have no figures on higher education but if the Republicans have any doubt about that, I suggest they take a ride and inspect the new improvements out at our own University of Washington.

All during the Republican administration, from the World War period on, school construction lapsed. A 1933 survey showed over 700,000 school children attending schools either condemned or unsanitary.

Let's go further with our Republican friends. Into the field of public health. Thousands of people, prior to 1932, with low incomes cou'd not receive hospitalization. Each year over 2,000,000 cases of illness went without medical treatment. Many people died of preventable illness. In this field we have made progress with public funds. Much more needs to be done. But the Republican administrations did notoriously nothing. We have constructed a hundred and fifty-six new hospitals, 66 additions, and remodeled 1,436. This has been coupled with great national progress in sanitation.

The Surgeon General has recently said that W. P. A. and P. W. A. sanitary work in the South alone had advanced malaria control over 20 years.

The Republicans could have just as well stayed home than to have advocated their war plan. As a matter of fact, they could really carry it out by continuing to vote for me. The advocacy of that plan has been contained in the Magnuson resolution (H. J. Res. 66), before the Congress for the past 4 years. I will discuss their foreign policy later.

Then the convention, says the Times, heard some witty remarks from their keynoter, elected delegates favoring Dewey, and went home. Amen.

Six days later one of the most prominent Republicans in this community suggested, in a Nation-wide news article, that they nominate a Democrat for the Presidency of the United States. After reading the account of this convention, I know just how that fellow feels.

I examined the rest of their deliberations carefully. Let me give you a few choice gems. They should amuse you. Here's one: "The time has come to entrust our upward spiral of social progress to practical liberals, such as the Republican Party has always provided." I am glad they admit it has been upward. For 50 years this same party turned deaf ears to these reforms. Here's another: "The methods of appropriating and expending tax money must be changed." Yes; income taxes hit the Republican leadership pretty hard. They would like to get into power again to shift it back to the housewife with a sales tax and to the homes with a property tax. Federal money, you know, comes mainly from income taxation. Then in conclusion someone suggested a rallying cry as follows: "Back to prosperity with Republican courage." Sounds familiar, doesn't it?

Why do they want to be back in power? Isn't it fair that the American people point-blank ask the Republican Party leadership what they intend to do? Is it fair to the American people that they continue to stuff you with such platitudes? And, in order to make definite political issues, let us take some of the concrete things the present administration has sponsored; let us take the cold record, and ask them some questions.

Do they favor the repeal of those portions of the Social Security law providing for unemployment insurance?

In lieu of a national system of old-age pensions, which I will speak of later, do they favor the repeal of the present matching system, paying little as it does in some States, but yet a thousand times more than ever paid under any Republican administration, upon which score their record is a complete blank.

Do they favor the repeal of the minimum wage-hour law, abolishing child labor and sweatshops?

The law the Democrats had the courage to pass, even though a great portion of its membership from the South in the Congress was opposed to it. A law which every western Republican knows helps western industry by allowing it to compete with cheap eastern and southern labor, which in some cases was being paid as low as 9 cents an hour.

Do they favor the repeal of the law restricting the marketing of fraudulent securities? The Republicans let these investment houses go hogwild. Many of you in this very audience were burned.

Do they favor the repeal of the Bonneville, Coulee, and T. V. A. agencies, which are bringing to the rest of the country the cheap electric rates that we here enjoy? I can tell you, however, about these so-called rejuvenated Republicans, that two of these projects, which gives this State the greatest future of any State in the Union, is opposed by the Republicans in the Congress year in and year out.

Do they favor the repeal of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, which saved thousands of people from being thrown into the streets here locally?

Are they against the Civilian Conservation Corps? One of the finest pieces of legislation passed by our administration, saving thousands of young men from the vicissitudes of idleness and crime.

Do they favor the repeal of Federal deposit insurance? God knows, during their times, they let enough banks fail. And, if for no other reason alone, we could ask the voters to return us to power, upon the fact that since the Democratic administration, not only can you put a dollar in the bank and know it is safe, but there have been comparatively no bank failures. Prior to this law, a thousand banks failed every year.

Are they against the rural electrification program, instituted by us, which has resulted in electrifying 1,700,000 farms with all the benefits, as compared with 744,000 before R. E. A.?

Are they against our farm-credit and farm-tenancy program?

What have they got to say about Federal Housing? The city of Seattle is now being favored with some splendid housing projects.

Are they against our laws recently passed prohibiting convict labor?

Are they against the splendid food-stamp plan, our antilynching bills, our insistence, under Democratic leadership, of railroad labor standards, extension of the civil service, our bills for the veterans? I know the veterans will recall that Hoover ran them out of Washington with gun points.

Are they against the 40-year fight, which finally culminated with a Democratic Congress, which passed the Railroad Retirement Act?

Are they against the Democratic House which passed the Anti-injunction Act of 1932, which protects labor from a discriminatory use of injunctions to break strikes?

What are they going to say to the Federal employees of the Post Office Department relative to our administration making mandatory the 40-hour workweek?

Let them tell our maritime workers whether or not they seek to repeal the Longshoremen and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act, and, if they want to get right close to home, let the Republican leadership of this State tell the people whether or not they are opposed to many of the public works projects in this community, sponsored by this administration, I refer to the new courthouse, the Ballard bridge, Lake Washington bridge, the establishment of a new ship line to the Orient from our port, after the Dollar crowd had wrecked it, the new clipper service to Alaska, the Bone-Magnuson cancer bill, and the many highways, streets, playgrounds, and other valuable projects in this district.

Now, we all, I know, are a grateful people. Even some Republicans are grateful, strange as it seems, I wonder however, in local criticism by Republican leadership of this administration, whether or not they know that for every $3,000,000 paid into the Public Treasury by this State, our own Democratic leadership has been responsible for having reallocated back in valued public-work projects $7,000,000. The actual figures are that the State of Washington, since 1933, has paid into the United States Treasury $32,000,000 and gotten back $74,000,000.

There is no need to burden you further. Merely compare this record with any 1 or any 10 Republican administrations. So I hope that this convention will go on record, not only with concrete planks for the correction of abuses remaining to be tackled, but also to go on record for the continuation, not only of the social legislation mentioned, but these other activities. But please be specific. Let's not give to the people the same banal platitudes that came out of the Republican convention.

Keep your platform liberal. We will win if we continue to set our sights toward the rank and file and the comman man. We cannot fail, as against the Republicans, because they have never shown the slightest understanding of his problem. Our problem is still the same—to continue our efforts to correct the abuse of the concentration of wealth, power, and special privilege. Specifically, may I suggest that we go on record for the furtherance of our social-security program, so as to include a definite plank for national old-age pensions. I have a personal interest in hoping this convention will endorse my Alaska project. I know further that you will tackle our State problems with equal liberal vigor.

I now would like to briefly discuss three timely and important problems confronting the party in this State.

I have been hearing some talk that labor—and when I speak of labor I refer to both the leadership and the rank-and-file workingman—has lost sight or possibly misunderstands the purposes of this administration with reference to their welfare. I still say that this administration has done more to carry out its pledge to foster the cause of the wage earner than any administration in the history of this country. That is natural, because the party itself is composed of the workingman, and he is an integral part of our organization. What we have done has not been motivated by whether they would vote for us or not, but because it was a job to do. Who has exploited labor more than the big business tycoons that are still the force behind the Republican Party? Who has called the laborer more names than these same people that are now raising the finances to get the Republican Party back into power? I need not recall to labor what was attempted by the Weirs, the Pews, the Girdlers, and others of that type, who now make up the Finance Committee of the Republican Party.

Now, I have no quarrel with the traditional policy of labor to remain independent of political parties. In that position, labor becomes a more potent force to politically accomplish their end. And if the Democratic Party ever turns from its aim to aid labor, then I say they should turn, as a unit, to another political group. I merely ask, before that decision, that labor looks at the record of progress for their rights, wages, and conditions under this administration and compare it with their fare under previous administrations, run and controlled by the same crowd that now make up this finance committee. There should be no question in the mind of labor leaders as to who, as a party, has been their friend. I know that there are some things and some personalities objectionable, but the batting average of the Democratic Party under this administration for labor, carefully examined, fairly appraised, would make the average Republican administration look like a Texas bushleaguer as against a Babe Ruth. I know one thing further that labor sticks by their friends.

Why, much of our criticism has been based upon the accusation that we have leaned too far toward labor. I don't think we have gone far enough, and I think this convention should go the further distance in their advocacy, not only in commendation for the accomplishment of labor legislation but that the party continue a strong adherence toward the continuation of these gains and labor's problems.

Let me again come close to home by way of illustration. It was amusing to me to read a plank from the Republican State platform, pledging that party to be against all antilabor initiatives. Now I am glad they took that stand, but when it comes to reward by way of political support to a party, I know that it is without great difficulty that every laboring man and every labor leader in this community knows who sponsored at last election the most vicious antilabor initiative ever proposed in this State. We all know that the power behind the scenes for that initiative was composed of the men who now support, and always have, the Republican Party in this State. And it is further without any difficulty that every worker will recall that during the last campaign, with possibly one exception, every Democratic candidate, for high or low office, publically denounced and privately worked for the defeat of this measure. The Democratic platforms and every Democratic meeting advocated this defeat. The Republican platform was then strangely silent on the subject. Republican candidates side-stepped the issue, so I say it is amusing to now see them in their desperate attempt to get votes, telling labor what they are going to do for them. Labor leaders and workers are not fooled that easily.

The workingman will recall, and his memory is not short, that the only recognizable Republican contribution to minimum hours and wages, the rights to organize and collective bargaining, was to close their eyes to the whole subject, while employers, contributing money to the Republican machine, perfected elaborate systems of industrial spies and other devices to harass the workingman. I wish everyone could have the opportunity to read the La Follette report. There would be no question after that as to how labor would vote in reference to the Republican Party.

Recent events have given rise to a definite American problem. It has currently been called a "fifth column." Let us not fool ourselves nor side-step this issue. The people of the country are entitled to know how both the Republican and Democratic Parties stand on this question. However, let us attack the problem sanely. We want no witch hunts. There should be no hysteria about it. This party is against any sabotage of our efforts to protect this Nation. I, personally, have worked too hard and too long on defense measures to see them broken down by some sneaking individual. I have a wholesome respect for an outspoken man of convictions, and, under our American system, allowing the formation of all political parties and units, that man can find a place to expound his political ideas. You remember the injustice of some of the accusations during the last World War period. And I cannot too strongly warn you, in your traditional intenseness for Americanism, that you do not forget the very precepts and underlying foundations of our democracy, the right of free speech, free assemblage, and to worship God as you please. Let me further warn those within our party, or any other party, who would abuse that privilege for espionage purposes, that it is the firm intention of this administration to deal with them quickly.

Now, let's be practical about this. We know that were these people, whether they be Communists, Fascists, or otherwise, if they were to meet in the open, form their political party, which under our American system they have a right to do, they would not in this State get a hundred votes. The problem is, therefore, that they know this too, and their plan is to bore from within. Oh, let's be frank. We probably have some in our party of this type. I know the Republicans have some Fascists in their organization, trying to bore from within. I know, further, just as sure as I am standing here, that $99\frac{99}{100}$ percent of the rank and file of this party are just as good Americans as ever walked the streets of Seattle. If the remaining percentage do not like that American way, if they have any objection to our party, we can deal with them promptly, but we cannot accuse on suspicion, and the real American way is to have facts before decision. If we have been guilty of anything, it has been a certain American tolerance, and it is easy for those of the opposition, who have been engaged in few battles for tolerance and human rights to all of a sudden arouse themselves and point a finger at someone.

Another crisis faces us. It would be useless for me to review the events of Europe. They are too vivid in your mind. The horror of war is close. The tread of Armies and the crash of gunfire is heard around the world. The task of those who would enlighten America upon its place in international affairs becomes extremely difficult. Flashing headlines render many judgments obsolete before they reach print. Every agency of enlightenment is needed. We want no lesson enforced by rows of steel. It is time for cold realism.

It is probably useless to remind our political opponents now that our refusal to accept the League of Nations might have contributed to the disaster. That our Fordney-MacCumber and Smoot-Hawley tariffs were expressions of economic nationalism which, imitated in other lands, made for poverty and disorder in wide areas of the globe. That, although we led in the Nine Power Treaty, when Japan violated it in Manchuria, the Republicans in power and America were as blameworthy as Great Britain in failing to impose an embargo. These are without argument. This is only to remind, when they criticize our foreign policy, that these played a part in the convulsions that now afflict Nanking. That these are things the Republican Party can answer for.

Turn of events in Europe has placed the problem of defense uppermost in the minds of our citizens, but this administration has not been unmindful of our defense needs. Your delegation in Congress has not been asleep as to the needs of the Pacific Northwest. It is amusing to hear critics say, "What have you Democrats been doing the past few years?"

I have served on the Naval Affairs Committee some years now, and I know what has been going on. If any Republican wants to take up that cry, let them go out to Sand Point, Bremerton, Kodiak, Sitka, and Unalaska, Anchorage, Fairbanks, McChord Field, etc. What was at these places prior to 1933? And there is more to come. Our Navy is inferior to none. We may have a two-ocean Navy. We have built gradually and soundly. There was no ship construction during the previous three administrations. We need more airplanes, and, of course, recent events have taught us that we need to mechanize the Army and change some naval tactics. It has been pointed out forcefully that now speed is needed in this emergency, and so, under the leadership of the present Democratic administration, we have sanely set to that task. We are not only going about defense but we are facing the truth and giving the people facts and passing a tax bill to pay for it. A party of courage in a campaign year.

In this job we have a great commission. First, defense shall have the right-of-way, and there are bills passed to this effect. "There shall be," says the Congress and the Chief Executive, "no war millionaires"—meaning no profiteers in our defense efforts. Senator BONE and myself have long advocated this policy in the Bone-Magnuson bill. Democracy means more to us now than ever before; that democracy shall survive; therefore let us talk more about duties and less about rights. Democrats and Republicans alike need a baptism of patriotism. No man deserves to live under this flag who won't buckle in and put his shoulder to the wheel in this crisis without a profit. I am glad to say that industrialists are rallying around.

Second, the tax to pay for it is based upon the same income-tax theory. It will be equitable. We are all going to pay our share, and God knows we are willing.

"There is no need," says this administration, "to lose the gains made by labor during the past 7 years." If the navy yards, and I helped to write this bill, are speeded up, the 40-hour week is still intact. We said they might work 48 hours, but if they did, they are to be paid time and one-half overtime for it. No need to change any labor standards until the unemployed have been absorbed, and labor is willing to stand in with us in this. Neither capital nor labor should take undue advantage of this situation—labor has not. Let us have no industrial sabotage. I sat in on hearings on this matter and they cooperated in every way—America is just as dear to them as to any of us.

If we have grown soft, events have made us realize that we now have to toughen our fiber. And there is not a tougher bunch than the rank and file of the Democratic Party.

Our job is to save America—not Europe.

We are going to build our defenses so as to insure hemispherical defense. We want no foreign "ism" to set its foot here, in Latin America, or in South America, for that matter. There is not an American within the sound of my voice who would not give to keep this hemisphere inviolate. The danger is present. Let us not be fooled. Let us tell the world that the first foreign aggressive foot to be set on the soil of North or South America will be resisted—and with all the might and power at our command. Once the world understands that, our danger is removed.

Seven years ago the Democratic Party in this State assembled in convention. It was a time of stress, peril, and fear. The country was in the throes of its greatest panic and our very institutions were threatened. The Nation cried out for leadership. The Democrats in this State believed they had found a leader to bring them out, to the happiness that was once the possession of every American. Washington was the first State in the Union to instruct a delegation, pledged to nominate the present incumbent and leader of the Democratic Party.

That choice has been one of the great accomplishments of the party in this State. That leadership, as chosen, did not fail.

Again we are to meet, and as a sovereign State, and direct another recommendation. Again the Nation stands in peril. It is a different kind of peril. Democracy in the world is being threatened. And again the Nation needs strong leadership.

I would be derelict to my own convictions and to this convention if I did not express the sincere hope that the State of Washington follow the excellent and wise procedure of 7 years ago and send to the Chicago convention another instructed delegation to insist upon the nomination for the Presidency of the United States the same leader who tackled the job so effectively for us in 1932, and who is tackling this present peril with such dispatch and saneness—the greatest humanitarian of all time—Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

A Million-Dollar Reward

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 6, 1940

ADDRESS BY DR. HENRY J. BERKOWITZ

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include an address delivered by Dr. Henry

J. Berkowitz, of Portland, Oreg., entitled "A Million-Dollar Reward." The address follows:

The news and editorial columns of the American press have during recent days carried a story which has set wagging the tongues of all the American people. Dr. Samuel Harden Church, president of Carnegie Institute of Technology, speaking for a group of Pittsburgh citizens, has offered a reward of $1,000,000 for the arrest of Adolf Hitler, in order that he be delivered to the League of Nations for trial.

The idea, from a practical point of view, is fantastic, and it could be interpreted as an unneutral act involving our entire country. I do not believe, however, that the offer was made with any hope of its ultimate accomplishment, nor was it intended to be pro-Ally propaganda. I regard it as a gesture on the part of a group of men who are terrified at the thought of this country being dragged into the war as a result of that terrible train of events set in motion by Adolf Hitler. The sum of $1,000,000 is merely a symbol of what these men believe it to be worth to have this country saved from the incalculable disaster of war. It is fruitless to argue that the capture of Hitler would not mean the end of the war. In fact, all speculation along these lines is meaningless. The whole episode brings to focus the important fact that nothing is too great for the American people to pay for any insurance policy against participation in this war. There is no other subject today that so occupies the American mind. All other subjects of conversation have become secondary. All local and national problems are dwarfed by this tremendous source of worry. Can we be saved or must we go down the awful road that leads to the same precipice upon which we tottered in 1917?

As a matter of religion, the offer of a million-dollar reward for Adolf Hitler has particular interest when interpreted as an indication of a deep desire to escape disaster. For the church and the synagogue, for rabbi and clergyman, war is the most terrible of all crises.

When war comes the preacher must walk along a path almost as narrow as a razor edge, with pitfalls on either side. If on the one hand he becomes an amateur commentator on the war, the congregation had better stay at home and listen to the radio. There are many more competent interpreters of the news than the minister in his pulpit. People do not go to church or synagogue to get a news bulletin, but to hear some rumor of God, some revelation of the eternal will in a crumbling world. It is the preacher's opportunity to take ancient teachings out of an ancient book and give them new life. "God is our refuge and our strength, and ever present help in time of trouble."

There is the other side of the razor edge, however. With a mass of human suffering which staggers the imagination, caused by the greed and rapacity of reckless men, we cannot shut our eyes to it or say we will have no dealings with it. This is the dilemma of religion in wartime. There are peculiar occupational risks in preaching when the world takes up arms. The preacher is moved by his emotions. His deep concern with great moral questions sweeps him readily into crusades. He finds himself driven by circumstances beyond his control, and he has to make choices between comparative standards of national morality.

After the last war a devastating book was published called Preachers Present Arms. That book ought to have a place on our desks beside the Bible. When we read what ministers said and did before and during the last war, and then place alongside the monstrous evils that came out of that war, for which so many preachers whooped it up mightily, we may well bow our heads and ask God's mercy. This book quotes sermons, addresses, and resolutions uttered by American ministers and rabbis during the last war. I will quote only one, an utterance of the best-known bishop in the United States, spoken some 21 years ago.

"This war is bringing the world into a fellowship and a brotherhood that before seemed only a dream. The outcome is to be a sweeping away of autocracy in all its forms and the establishment of democracy and world-wide brotherhood, including those nations at this moment fighting against us. Two thousand years ago Jesus gave to the world the message of the brotherhood of man. Today we stand face to face with its realization."

Read that last sentence today in the light of your daily papers. Could any words be more ironical? If we were to utter the same words today, what assurance would we have that they would not end in blight, desolation, and ruin?

One thing can be safely predicted, and that is when it is all over, the world will again be disillusioned as it was after 1918. We will know then as we knew 20 years ago, that it was all a sinful and terrible waste. The tragedy of children of today is not that they would suffer and die in war, but the sure prospect that they would live to repeat the embitterment and rude awakening that came when the slogans had lost their hypnotic spell and our eyes were opened to grim reality. We are just at the point now where we are beginning to forget the steps that dragged the world into the depths of September 1939. We forget the betrayal of Czechoslovakia, the desire to make peace with Germany at the expense of Russia. We forget that Lord Lothian said, "Hitler will be our buffer between Great Britain and Russia." The policy then was not the defense of democracy nor the rights of small nations. It will be years before history again dares to put its verdict upon the ineptitudes and betrayals of British and French policy. To say this does not mean that I lack sympathy with England and France in the present war. As a Jew I would be less than human if my whole heart and soul were not wrapt up in the cause of the Allies. But we must not fail to face the realities of history. I truly pray for some miracle that will permit America to remain aloof, because I know of no other means of preserving democracy and human values and resources for the service of the world after the war. But like all my fellow Americans, I am not sanguine about the future.

The more one sees and hears of what is now transpiring, it looks as though we are being forced again to take sides. America is not neutral today. The overwhelming majority of our people are heart and soul with the Allied cause. Thus, organized religion, together with all other American institutions, will be forced into that dilemma that it faced before. It is enough to make any sincere religious leader throw up his hands in despair. I am not willing to predict today what I will do or say if this country is forced into the war. I have preached peace consistently for years, but I realize now that we have been at war since 1914, and that the intervening years from 1918 to 1939, were just a breathing spell. Not one evil was remedied, not one change was wrought in human affairs. The entire political and economic struggle, together with all the moral standards of men and nations, have remained unaffected. We stand today where we stood about 1916. It was an election year then, as it is now. The American people were completely antiwar, and yet the paralysis of our reason and sanity had already set in.

Today I only can suggest to you how deep is the dilemma of religion. What are the church and the synagogue to do? Shall they close their doors and adjourn the meeting until it is all over, or shall they bless the war and make it holy, or shall they save their dignity and honor by keeping silent on the issues and trying to adopt a program that is consistent with the highest principles of religion?

In the first place it is impossible for organized religion to go out of existence in wartime. It cannot say, "We ask you to follow the law of God, but we are willing to wait until you go out and murder your brother first."

In the second place, organized religion cannot permit itself to follow the example set by Germany. There a subservient church was compelled to issue what it called "a word for proclamation from the pulpit" shortly after the war began last fall. The spiritual forces of the Reich were mobilized in support of German arms in the following terms:

"The German people is called to arms for the land of its fathers, for its freedom, and for its honor. We members of the German Church are conscious of our unity as we pray for our people and our fatherland, for the Führer, and the armed forces."

By this statement the leaders of the state's church blessed the state's banners and dedicated their Bibles and the hymn books not as guides but as sources of inspiration for those who follow the Führer. This statement by the German Church was issued while death and destruction was being rained upon the helpless Polish population in their towns and villages. God deliver the religious forces of America from a regimentation that would bring it to such a low estate.

Since the churches cannot close, and since they must not become mere echoes of a propaganda ministry, what is their place in our time? They cannot evade responsibility for taking an attitude and bearing witness in relation to the events which now hold first place in the world's attention. Silence and inaction are impossible. To say nothing and to ignore the issues by which the destiny of humanity will be determined for centuries would be like bearing false witness. I confidently believe that no matter what happens the United States will continue to be a nation of free churches and, for the most part, of free pulpits, and I therefore wish to suggest a few of the positive attitudes that can be taken at a time like this.

1. We must repent for the past errors and inadequacies of the pulpit.
2. We must defend the liberties of press, platform, and pulpit.
3. We must constantly brand war as evil.
4. Explore and expose the hidden causes of war.
5. Study the conditions of a just peace and assist in their furtherance.
6. Bring help and comfort in practical ways to the innocent victims of war-torn lands.
7. Pray without ceasing for the reestablishment of universal good will.

These are some of the principles to which the synagogue can cling without compromising its ideals or stultifying its purposes.

It is exceedingly hard for us Jews to drive out of our hearts the spirit of militancy in the face of the incomparable outrages that have been visited upon us. If ever a people might be said to have a just cause for war, it is the Jew. It hardly seems as though there is any choice left for us, but war upon our enemies with the hope of their complete annihilation. Yet no Jew, no matter how great his lust for revenge, can turn to his synagogue and ask its blessing upon the shedding of his enemies' blood. Despite everything, the religious institution and its religious leaders must struggle with might and main to hold high the banners of love and mercy, teaching men to resist hatred.

In closing, let me admit again the dread of the days we are facing, the decisions that they will require, and the terrible spiritual struggles they will create.

We are all intensely human, and while the church is a divine institution it is made up of human beings and subject to the limitations of human beings. That is why I sympathize with the gesture that was made to offer a reward for the capture of the one most responsible for this chaos. It is a last desperate effort to avert that awful multiplicity of problems—moral and spiritual and material—that war brings into every phase of human life. Would to God a way might be found to extricate ourselves from this ghastly tangle, but no matter what betides, do not look to your religion to betray its trust or to barter away its ideals for the sake of security.

Three Aces Versus the New Deal

EDITORIAL FROM THE FORT WAYNE (IND.) NEWS-SENTINEL

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following timely editorial from the Fort Wayne (Ind.) News-Sentinel of June 1, 1940:

[From the Fort Wayne (Ind.) News-Sentinel of June 1, 1940]

THREE ACES VERSUS THE NEW DEAL

The three tiptop American aces and authorities on aviation and air defense are now in publicly proclaimed agreement on the proposition that President Roosevelt's politically motivated defense program is "cockeyed."

That is quite enough to make the American people sit up, take notice, and call a halt. Not a halt on effecting actual defense, but a halt on the third-termites' partisan procession which, in Maj. Al Williams' words, is "tramping in the death march of the British admirals."

Major Williams recently toured Europe and intensively studied the airplanes and aeronautical methods and organizations of the principal powers of that Continent.

Now, in a blistering denunciation of the Roosevelt purpose to help the Allies at the expense of our own national defense and national security, he has placed himself on record somewhat more vigorously than Col. Charles A. Lindbergh and Capt. Eddie Rickenbacher, his fellow aces, but in substantial agreement with those two gentlemen.

All three of these men love their country above all other things on the face of the earth.

All three have served their country well and ably.

All three are nationally and internationally famous.

All three are recognized as unselfish, nonpartisan devotees of strong and effective national defense.

All three are indisputably experts in their field.

It means a great deal, therefore, that all three agree that the Roosevelt policy is not merely faulty but actually of such a character as to imperil the best interests of the United States.

If you were in need of a surgical operation, you would welcome the services, or at least the counsel, of the three foremost surgeons in America.

If you were in need of legal advice, you would respect the opinions of the three foremost lawyers in the country.

America is now interested in national defense, which, all parties agree, centers primarily in air defense.

America, therefore, should welcome and act upon the expert counsel of her three foremost air-defense authorities: Charlie Lindbergh, Eddie Rickenbacker, and Al Williams.

What do these men say?

Lindbergh says this:

"If we are in danger of war, it is not because European peoples have attempted to interfere with the internal affairs of America, but because certain American people have attempted to interfere with internal affairs of Europe. * * * We need not fear a foreign invasion unless the American peoples bring it on through their own quarreling and meddling with affairs abroad. Our eyes should not search beyond the horizon for problems which lie at our own feet. * * * There is no longer time for us to enter this war successfully. * * * Let us stop this hysterical chatter of calamity and invasion. * * * If we desire peace, we need only stop asking for war. No one wishes to attack us, and no one is in a position to do so. * * * The only reason that we are in danger of becoming involved in this war is because there are powerful elements in America who desire us to take part. They represent a small minority of the American people, but they control much of the machinery of influence and propaganda. They seize every opportunity to push us closer to the edge. * * * Let us turn our eyes toward our own Nation and its defense."

"Each new instance of the bloody tragedy and suffering in Europe should restrengthen us in our efforts to keep out of that war over there. * * * Even if we wanted to go to the aid of France and England—which God forbid, unless we want to end liberty and free, representative government in this country for at least a century—we have nothing to offer those countries. * * * We are now enjoying liberties and a standard of living which we certainly will never see again, and which our children will probably never see again, if certain forces now at work are allowed to mislead us in the next 6, 12, or 18 months. * * * We could never transport troops abroad in the present circumstances, even if we were foolish enough to want to. * * * So let us serve free, representative government both at home and abroad by concentrating on solving our real problems here, to protect us from the menace of foreign invasion, which, in spite of what we hear, is still, at the worst, a long way off. * * * The greed and selfishness of a few, while reprehensible, are less to be feared in leading to American entanglement and involvement in the present war than public misunderstanding, resulting from misinformation and inflammatory propaganda. * * * Nothing caused the present European war that has not caused every European war for centuries. * * * Let's keep our heads and work for a real national-defense program—a defense of our own country, not somebody else's. * * * What we need is an enlargement of the plane-producing industry, subject to ready conversion for war use—our use."

That's what Rickenbacker says.

It's what every really competent authority on national defense has been saying for weeks and months.

Now, how about the third American ace? How about Maj. Al Williams? What does Major Williams say? This:

"Our air-defense development has been retarded by politics and bureaucracy. * * * For 5 years this administration has persistently meddled in international power politics and, at the same time, failed to provide an adequate national-defense system for the country. * * * This country is not the knight errant of the human race. The blood of America belongs to America—to no man or group of men—and it must not be shed or mortgaged again in foreign wars; nor on foreign battlefields. * * * As a knight errant of the human race, some men would have the United States pose before the world, while the knight's armor, his sword, and his shield are made of tin and of obsolescent design. * * * Our aircraft production has been muddled through this administration's persistent dumping of everything to the Allies. * * * We are confronted by coiners of dangerous international phrases—coined in subversion of the safety and peace of America. Congress alone can save us, and we alone—we ordinary Americans—can save Congress by telling these representatives of ours that we are determined to mend and put our own house in order * * * and to build a defense of this country. The President wants airplanes in great numbers right now—to toss into this war. If he wants thousands of planes without waiting to build up an air force first, then production of planes for Europe is his goal—not the defense of America. * * * President Roosevelt's panicky "flight schedule" for the air invasion of America is ridiculous, worthy of Hollywood, and certainly not of the White House."

That's what Maj. Al Williams said to the National Aviation Forum, meeting in Washington under auspices of the National Aeronautical Association, and when he said it, his listeners, all experts in aviation, responded with loud, long cheers.

Congress had better note those cheers—and note that they represent the sentiments of millions in the great patriotic American rank and file—millions without any official spokesman other than their representatives in Congress.

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Brooklyn Daily Eagle of June 5:

[From the Brooklyn Daily Eagle of June 5, 1940]

A GOOD EXAMPLE

Few things have been more stimulating in the present hour of uncertainty than the example supplied by the three recognized party organizations which have put aside partisan differences to work shoulder to shoulder for the Red Cross relief drive in Brooklyn.

The Democratic, the Republican, and the American Labor Parties, acting through their representatives, agree to place their organized party machinery in motion in a fund-raising effort to alleviate, in a measure, the distress, suffering, and destruction which have engulfed millions of human beings in Europe. It is a three-in-one effort, beginning next Monday, which merits maximum success.

While the party organizations themselves evidence their usefulness in an exceptional undertaking, the cause for which their services are drafted is one which appeals strikingly to the true American spirit of generosity.

It is a solemn hope and prayer that Brooklyn's peace-loving inhabitants, now summoned to give generously toward meeting emergency abroad, may never be called upon to experience the same horror and terror afflicting those in whose name the Red Cross appeals for aid.

Hold to the Fundamentals

ADDRESS OF MARTIN A. FLEMING, CITY JUDGE OF CHATTANOOGA, TENN.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein an address delivered by the Honorable Martin A. Fleming, city judge of Chattanooga, Tenn., to the graduating class of Father Ryan High School, Nashville, Tenn., on June 6.

This excellent address contains timely and wise counsel to young people upon the fundamentals of life. Church, home, schools, and government, as forcefully pointed out by Judge Fleming, are the fundamental institutions upon which our lives must be securely fastened.

HOLD TO THE FUNDAMENTALS

We meet today to congratulate you, the members of the 1940 graduating class of Father Ryan High School, who are now completing your secondary school training, and I hasten to add, for some, your final school work. A feeling of victory is attached to this occasion for you. About 12 or 13 years ago you started to school. Out of each hundred boys and girls who started with you, I am informed by educational specialists, that about 50 finished the grammar school and about 15 are now graduating from high school, and I am told that on the average only about 2 will complete a college course.

You have made a good start for the trip before you, having shown that you have, to a large degree, courage, sacrifice, intelligence, and character, from which success comes. This, too, is a great occasion for your parents. Many of them have made sacrifices that you might complete your high-school work. They may well feel proud of you today. They are not looking backward, they are looking forward, filled with the hopes that you may continue your training, that you may use your ability to think, and that you will properly evaluate your duties as citizens—a task and obligation you are soon to assume.

My daily task is to preside over a court. I see the wrecks of humanity parade before me each day. I have an opportunity to see that the neglected child in the home is most often a menace to society. I seldom see a person in my court who has attained the secondary school level. I have concluded that the child who does not attend church and who does not have Christian teachings and the Christian controls is seriously handicapped in this great race for right thinking, right living, and Christian citizenship. Seldom do I see a person in my court who has been trained in the fundamentals of citizenship, the responsibilities of voting, the cooperation of one citizen with another, the loyalty of a citizen to his State and Nation.

These dregs of society as a rule are those who desire to get all and give nothing. They can picture mountainlike the faults of the other fellow but can never see the troubles of their own. They are practically always leeches of society and seldom are they the conscientious contributors. A noted crime expert said the other day that in order for a criminal to be successful he must start his career before he is 12, reach the height of his career by the time he is 18, and be killed by a gangster or policeman by the time he is 22 and leave an estate valued at less than $100.

I wish to speak this evening briefly on the subject, Hold to the Fundamentals. I am bold in the assertion that there is no church that believes more fundamentally than the Catholic Church that the home, the school, the church, and the government are the essential features of our society that must be preserved and handed down to posterity better improved and finer.

May I speak briefly on the home?

The home is the main institution of society. The early years of a child's life, as you know, are the most impressionable. They are the years that yield most quickly to Christian teachings and controls. They are the years when proper moorings are implanted, when the right sense of directions are given the child. I was impressed by a short story that I read a few years ago. A governor of a State had a holiday. He decided to visit the penitentiary and interview the 10 prisoners in death row. He found that they all were intoxicated at the time they committed the crimes. They were with bad companions and they all had had very very little moral and Christian training. I feel that the time to prevent crime is in the high chair and not the electric chair.

I hope that the home as a social institution will soon regain the place in society that it once occupied. It is not a point of departure, as our fellow Catholic has said. Father Flannagan, of Boys Town, has repeatedly said, "There is no such thing as a bad boy"; he has said frequently that there are neglected children, and that a different set of circumstances, a set of intelligent, Christian parents would have changed the picture entirely. Napoleon once said that the greatest need was Christian homes and parents. He was not always wrong. Again I say that if we have more Christian training in the homes, we will reduce our divorce rate in society.

There are just two kinds of people in this world—the good and the bad. The good want to do right because it is right. The bad want to do wrong because the wrong is attractive to them. I cannot reiterate too often that we need Christian teachings in the home.

Secondly, the school. The school is a great institution for the preservation of democracy. It has become a great business. I am told that there are over 30,000,000 boys and girls daily attending school, that there is a $10,000,000,000 plant housing and accommodating these young citizens, and that the annual cost of education in our Nation exceeds $3,000,000,000. I visited the largest public school in the South a few days ago. I had the good fortune to speak to their 2,500 students. Later I visited a classroom and conducted a forum discussion. I was greatly impressed by the extensiveness, the democracy, and the soundness of their teachings.

It seems to me as I read, visit, and discuss the daily problems, that the high schools are sticking to the fundamentals. Most of the teachers are native-born, conservative, and are not indoctrinated with the philosophy of free thinking. Do not misunderstand the term "free thinking." I mean as it applies to the undermining of the basic teachings. Much of the false teaching, I feel, is being done in the higher institutions. There are those who advocate the "isms"; many of whom parade under the cloak of academic freedom. There are those who preach race hatred, free love, and infidelity. I maintain that an institution that permits such teachings to go on should not be tolerated in a Christian country.

The hand, the head, and the heart must be trained if the child is to be fully educated. A person with a trained hand may make a decent living, but will he live a contributing life? A person with a trained mind may be able to understand history, mathematics, or jurisprudence, but what good would that trained mind be if he spends a big portion of his life reading history or calculating the number of years in his prison sentence? An educational institution supremely equips a boy or girl when it sends him forth capable of earning a living, with a well-trained mind and a heart that beats sympathetically for the unfortunate, who loves his fellow man and who lives a life of Christian service.

Our American people have a reverence for education. Education is expensive, but the people bear the cost willingly in the hope that finer citizenship will be the reward. I urge you young people to continue your educational training if it is at all possible. If you can't, remember the will to grow was learned by Lincoln after he attended school about 2 years, as well as it was by Woodrow Wilson, who attained the highest degrees. A school is not a place where failures can be transformed into Solomons, but it is the best place to enter the field of learning.

Thirdly, I would urge you to participate actively in government. Wars are going on in Europe. Thousands of innocent people will lose their lives. This is the time for us to keep cool, calm, and think twice before we do too much speaking. This is an excellent time for us to be deliberating the prices of democracy and the duties of citizenship. The cost of freedom and democracy has been expensive. The monuments at Bunker Hill and Lexington and Kings Mountain speak in unmistakable terms the truth of their assertion that democracy did not come free. Men like Nathan Hale and Sam Davis have immortalized the spirit of freedom. These young men regretted that they had but one life to give for the cause they loved. Men like Washington, Grant, Lee, Pershing, and thousands of others have had a conspicuous part in winning an imperishable place in this struggle for democracy.

We have not been a warlike nation since our beginning. I read an interesting statement a few days ago from a new book. It said that since the beginning of our Nation, about 163 years ago, we had participated in 6 wars lasting 23 years. In the same span of time England has taken part in 54 wars lasting 102 years, and France had taken part in 53 wars, lasting 99 years. Our main achievements have come from our peaceful activities and not our wars. The fundamentals of democracy, freedom of press, speech, and assembly are the safeguards of liberty and must be exercised if they are to be preserved. I recommend that you young people actively participate in the various phases of citizenship. Never fail to vote in any election. A voting man is a contributing man. A voting man is a respected man.

Again I say the day for you to assume the leadership for constructive civic enterprise is not far in the distance. See your tasks clearly, assume your responsibilities uncomplainingly, and do your duties as citizens gladly. When Thomas Jefferson wrote his own epitaph he did not write about the political offices that he had held, not even the Presidency. He wrote about his civic achievements.

Lastly, love your church. It seems unnecessary that I dwell on this phase of your life. I realize that the church has a big task in training the conscience of the person. I have remarked a thousand times that a person could not possibly have a conscience who could kill a man, be brought to the jail, and within an hour be asleep and perfectly forgetful of any of the experiences attendant to such an awful crime. To keep alive a conscience that acts as a stop sign to the acts of wrong, is one of the primary functions of a church. The Christian tasks of the church are too well known to all of you for me to repeat.

If you have a proper sense of the values of the fundamentals and hold fast to them, I do not fear your future. Yours is a life of joyous service, with a multitude of friends and a peace of mind that knows no equal. Again I congratulate you and your parents and wish for you life's best.

Where Did the Seven Billion Go?

EDITORIAL FROM THE CHICAGO HERALD AND AMERICAN

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, the taxpayers who have felt a sense of security because they believed their Government was preparing for national defense have a right to inquire specifically as to the use made of the $7,000,000,000 appropriated for national defense. The inquiry is even more pertinent now that the debt limit is to be increased by $4,000,000,000 and a drastic tax increase imposed upon the people for national defense. The people should be realistic enough to demand information from the administration as to whether this tax money is to be used for our national defense.

If the situation is so critical that the President should request power to order out the National Guard to defend this Nation from a "fifth column" or to quell disturbances in nearby nations, I wonder to what extent this country should strip itself of its own means of defense and stand in the presence of such an emergency with Uncle Sam's hands literally tied behind his back. I can think of nothing more disastrous than to deprive ourselves of the military implements necessary to defend ourselves from within as well as from without.

Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Herald and American, Chicago, Ill., under date of May 25, 1940:

[From the Herald and American of May 25, 1940]

WHERE DID THE SEVEN BILLION GO?

As important to the country as the appropriation of the billion and a quarter dollars that President Roosevelt has asked for the country's defense are these questions that all thoughtful Americans are asking this administration:

What has become of the $7,000,000,000 that have been appropriated for Army, sea, and air defense in the last 6 years?

What have we to show for it?

If $7,000,000,000 have left us defenseless, what will become of the new billion and a quarter that Congress is ready to appropriate?

Senator BENNETT CLARK of Missouri has already demanded information as to what had happened to these seven billions.

"Money that has been poured down a rat hole!" exclaimed the Senator.

Are we, then, to have more of this "rat hole" policy or genuine and immediate defense?

Waste would seem to be the only stable policy of this administration.

A congressional investigating committee has just reported that the administration of the W. P. A. throughout the Nation has been marked by "waste, politics, private gain, and benefits to Communists."

If there has been waste of money in a profoundly human activity of the administration, like the W. P. A., this waste policy might apply to appropriations for defense as well, and certainly we ought to have some defense after spending $7,000,000,000.

But we haven't got it!

Seven billion dollars have been spent and we are utterly unprepared.

Testifying behind closed doors, the high command recently unfolded the startling facts that we have a protective force so poorly equipped that it is actually short of uniforms and blankets and that our bombers are so outmoded that "it would be suicide to send them against modern equipment."

That's only a detail in our unpreparedness.

It is a hideous scandal.

Another $7,000,000,000 might be spent by incompetent New Deal politicians and we would still be unprepared.

We are unprepared after 6 years of bogus preparedness because we have been ruled by men apparently more concerned as to whom the public moneys went to than to what they went for.

Let us now have genuine preparedness, not merely a free distribution of the people's money by and to the politicians.

Let us investigate, from top to bottom, the W. P. A. and other Government projects.

Unquestionably, we shall find the same waste everywhere, the same political favoritism, if not corruption, that an investigating congressional committee has already found in the W. P. A.

If there has been any corruption or political chicanery in the handling of our $7,000,000,000 defense fund—that comes dangerously near to being treason in our present defenseless State.

Let us save the Nation from extravagance and political corruption.

We cannot afford to have an empty shell of preparedness.

False preparedness might destroy our Nation.

We must act promptly and vigorously to save it.

We must have visible results.

We must cut out all waste, all partisanship, all personal ambition.

Seven billion dollars for defense have disappeared.

Congress should find out where it went to.

With $7,000,000,000 spent for defense we ought to be impregnable.

But we are, instead, the most vulnerable first-class power in the world.

The American people demand an accounting—now. They demand defense, not politics.

LETTER WRITTEN BY A 16-YEAR-OLD HIGH-SCHOOL GIRL PLEADING FOR THE AID OF CONGRESS IN EXTENDING AID TO THE ALLIES

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter I received today from Margie Alice Davis, a 16-year-old high-school girl. Miss Davis implores Congress to provide immediate aid for the Allies, and I commend the expressions of this young girl for your reading.

FRANKFORT, N. Y., June 6, 1940.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN DOUGLAS: I can't understand why our Congress will not help the Allies, the countries with whom we have had such amicable relations for years and years. Why should we care if Germany likes us or not? The Germans are just vandals, going about destroying all the beauty in the world and wiping out the work of centuries with a few moments' bombing. Some people don't realize that as soon as Germany finishes up in Europe, if she can, she will be right over in this hemisphere, trespassing on our neutrality. And the time to stop Germany is now. We can't wait until she gets so powerful that we shall be beaten. Everyone is so sure that after we get our new air force we will be unconquerable, but you can never tell. The Germans say God is with them. It can't be the real God, because He must be with England and France. They probably mean the god of war.

I positively do not mean that we should send our boys over there to fight, but I do think we might cooperate in every way and send the Allies airplanes by the hundreds, tanks, guns, part of our food surplus, several warships, and other necessities. Imagine what that would do to their morale, and it wouldn't hurt us at all. Germany might not like it, but what do we care? After all, we may pretend that it would cause us a great deal of anguish to cut off diplomatic relations with her, but really it would make very little difference to the majority of the people in this country. It would make more jobs if we were to increase our production of war materials, thus making conditions much better in this country.

Please, oh, please do something, if you possibly can. I know many other people who feel as I do that Germany must be beaten for once and for all, right now. I don't see how you Congressmen can possibly think that Hitler won't try to come over here after he mops up Europe. I think that in your heart of hearts you realize the fact, and would like to help the Allies and smash Hitler. What's the use of pretending that you don't care? Everyone else in the country does, and they want the Allies to win. This letter isn't war hysteria, because I am not afraid of war, but I should be one of the first to enlist for ambulance driving or some such task.

I just feel that we should help England and France, two democratic nations such as ourselves, with all the supplies and everything else they want. You say then that this would make Germany declare war on us. What of it? I say. I guess Germany is pretty busy without coming over here right now. Please try to do something. I'm trusting in you to start the movement, Think of America before you refuse to help the Allies.

Sincerely yours,

MARGIE ALICE DAVIS.

The Duty of Congress to Remain in Session in This Crisis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER

OF INDIANA

Wednesday, June 5, 1940

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, while we legislate in this Chamber the war in Europe continues without abatement. The drive which is now being made into France by the German hordes, in which every known mechanized unit of destruction is employed, should cause all of our people to keep calm and to repel the war hysteria which seems to permeate the very atmosphere which we breathe. I am confident that the wish and the will of the people of our Nation is that we do not become involved in this European war, and I am in full accord with their praiseworthy determination that we keep out of this conflict. We need our men and boys of America that they may engage in the useful arts and trades of civil life within the borders of our country. We do not subscribe to any policy which will lead us closer to this war. Our policy should be to legislate wisely and very cautiously in this critical period and to the end that we may avoid any involvement in this foreign controversy.

Mr. Speaker, only yesterday the President of the United States, and without the sanction of the Congress, released a vast number of our United States Navy planes, and vast stores of war munitions, to the Allies for their use in this war. We have heretofore assumed a passive attitude in the role of an observing nation—and it has been the wish and will of the Congress that we remain neutral in this conflict—but the action taken by the Chief Executive in rushing all available supplies for immediate use by the Allies in this war materially changes our position; we are no longer an observing and neutral nation; we are a participating nation in this conflict. In other words, the President has entered our Nation in this war—all contrary to the wish and the will of the vast majority of the people of our country. Almost immediately a warning was issued by those who speak for the Italian Government to the effect that the United States of America must keep out of this war or suffer invasion. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, this one act on the part of the President of this Nation might be the act which would involve us in war—it might well be the sole cause of sending our men and boys into this terrible conflict, and it might be that step which would send an untold number of our kith and kin into a war which would take its toll in human life. We must exercise caution; we must proceed slowly; we must avoid participation in this European war.

Mr. Speaker, it has been proposed that certain legislation should be enacted which would extend to the President of the United States the power, in peacetime, to exercise full control over the National Guard and the Organized Reserves and that with such power to extend the further right to call those branches of our military forces into active duty and to assign them for service either within or without the borders of the United States of America, as the President might see fit. This is a most unusual request for additional power to be placed in the hands of the President. May I say that altogether too much power has already been granted to the President, and too little power remains in the Congress.

The job of determining our policies in this critical period is far too big for any one man to assume—it is a job in which the representatives of the people have the right to extend their voice and their aid. I am convinced the people desire their representatives to aid during this national emergency in their effort to keep our country out of this war; they do not entrust their destiny to any one man, and they do not entrust their destiny, and the destiny of their sons, to the President of the United States, because he appears to be leading our Nation into war, as he has led us into the greatest debt the people of this Nation have ever witnessed.

Mr. Speaker, the Members of the Congress represent the people of this Nation, and may I venture the suggestion that all of our people are vitally interested in everything which is done respecting our foreign policy; they are deeply interested in the question of calling out the National Guard and the Organized Reserve, and they have an interest in the question of where they are sent in this critical period; they are interested in everything that is done in this critical period which might tend to lead us nearer this European war. Our people want peace; they do not want war. They do not want any act committed by our military forces which might engender a hatred against us; they want every officer and every public servant to keep his feet upon the ground and to exercise clear thinking at all times in order to avoid involvement in this war. Our people want the combined thought and wisdom of their representatives in the Congress to aid in shaping the policy which our Nation should pursue in this hour of anguish and distress.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am convinced the people of our country do not want to entrust any one man with the sole authority and the sole power to determine our policies respecting the war or our involvement in it. They want the combined wisdom of the Senate and the House of Representatives on all of these highly important questions, which might well mean the loss of life to an untold number of Americans in war, the destruction of our form of government, and the end of liberty and freedom in this land we love.

Let us remain in session during this crisis, and let us legislate respecting these highly important problems which mean so much to the people of our country.

Amendments to National Labor Relations Act

EDITORIAL FROM THE WILMINGTON (DEL.) JOURNAL-EVERY EVENING

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Journal-Every Evening, of Wilmington, Del., for June 6:

[From the Wilmington (Del.) Journal-Every Evening of June 6, 1940]

LABOR LAW REVISION

In voting to take up the proposed amendments to the Wagner Act at this session the House has made a sound decision.

While the Nation is in the throes of carrying out the vast new program for national defense a solid basis for industrial peace will be needed more than ever before. We should have the smoothest-working machinery which can be devised for the prompt settlement of disputes and it should be administered by a fair-minded and unbiased board.

No one can honestly pretend that the present Board and the law as it now stands are really adequate to meet this need. The act has numerous serious flaws. The board has thoroughly discredited itself by its evident bias in the opinion of a large proportion of organized workers and employers of labor. Even if it mends its ways it will be badly handicapped at the start by its past record and the reputation it has won as a troublemaker.

There is no question of our need for industrial peace. Ships, planes, and motors cannot be built, factories erected, raw materials transported and men taught new skills with the required speed unless labor and industry lend full cooperation to the task. Costly strikes at this crucial period will threaten not merely our economic welfare but our national security.

The amendments which are before the House now were not, of course, framed with the present situation in mind. It may well be advisable in the months ahead to set up new and better machinery to handle the problem than anything that has been suggested so far. But the revisions already framed form a program which has been considered carefully and can be adopted without delay. They will put the Government in a far better position than it is under the present law and the present Board to deal with the situation.

Anti-Semitism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

ARTICLE BY DR. BARUCH BRAUNSTEIN

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I have taken the liberty to insert an article entitled "Anti-Semitism—Symptom of the Disease That Kills Great Nations." This article is interesting in the fact that the writer takes a most extraordinary view of a condition which is of little importance. He, of course, is entitled to his own viewpoint, for, after all, such rights are protected under the Constitution of the United States. Likewise, others have the same right.

This article was sent to me by Dr. S. Newman, who some time back took exception with my stand, which is based entirely upon the fundamental principles of this Republic, as set forth in the Constitution of the United States. I shall ask those who read this to study it very carefully, and I am sure that they will find a most extraordinary reasoning, which I shall discuss at some future date.

ANTI-SEMITISM—SYMPTOM OF THE DISEASE THAT KILLS GREAT NATIONS

(By Dr. Baruch Braunstein)

(The following is a speech delivered before the Institute on Contemporary Jewish Affairs, sponsored by the National Council of Jewish Women, in Washington on December 12, 1939, and published in Vital Speeches.)

The most tragic fact of Jewish history is that one-third of all the Jews of the world, numbering altogether less than 16,000,000, are either exiled or exterminated or facing exile and extermination: 600,000 in Germany, 250,000 in Austria, 400,000 in Czechoslovakia, 12,000 in Memel, three and one-half millions in Poland.

A few years ago we ridiculed Robert Nathan's prophetic insight in his remarkable little book, Road of Ages. He envisages all Jews of Europe exiled. No nation offers them hospitality. So they begin the long trek to the Gobi Desert. This is no longer a figment of the poet's imagination but a hard cruel fact. For this fate even the darkest persecutions of Jewish history has not prepared the modern Jew. In former times exiled Jews always had some place to go. When Jews were driven out of Palestine, other parts of the Roman Empire welcomed them. France welcomed the exiled English Jews in 1290. Each time France expelled her Jews in the fourteenth century they could go to Germany, Spain, and Italy. When the catastrophe befell rich and prosperous Spanish Jewry in 1492, the Empire of the Turks eagerly invited them. The Russian pogroms of the last century found America's gates open. Today, however, we witness the spectacle of millions of Jews thrust into exile without a welcoming sign from any nation. Even the intergovernmental refugee committee, grateful as we are for the lofty spirit that brought it into being, finds few havens for the exiles. They sail the seven seas in boats that are unseaworthy and find ports shut in their faces. They storm across land borders to find bayonets of the frontier guards turning them back. For these kind of tragic times modern Jews are utterly unprepared.

What has happened is this: Based on a Hegelian conception of the racestate, the leaders of the New Germany are determined to construct a raceempire (Volksgemeinschaft). This new philosophy teaches: "Wherever Germans live there is Nazi Germany." Austria, Czechoslovakia, Memel, Danzig, Poland, have now become Germany on the thesis that "Wherever Germans live there is Nazi Germany."

Nor is the process of Germanization of Europe completed. There are Germans in Switzerland. Three Belgian provinces are German, so is Alsace-Lorraine, Schleswig-Holstein is German. There are Germans in Hungary, Rumania, Yugoslavia. All this means that these places belong to Nazi Germany. Indeed, they are Nazi Germany by virtue of Germans living in their borders. This augurs ill for both the future of Europe and for the Jews still living there. Once Hitler creates the Pan German Europe (in which Germany "pans" Europe), we must reconcile ourselves to the tragedy of the present situation.

Now if I could be convinced that Hitler's ravenous appetite would be satisfied with Europe, then we would write "finis" to the history of the Jews in Europe—and fear no more. I cannot be taken in. Some call Hitler a madman. More precisely he believes himself to be a messiah, moved by a passion to convince the world that the New Germany ought to be the pattern for all the world. That as he has convinced the Germans, Czechs, Poles, et al., the Jews were their misfortune, so he passionately desires to convince the world they are the misfortune of all people everywhere. This is a genuine fear. Prof. L. B. Namier of the University of Manchester voiced it: "When the head of Louis XIV fell, all the monarchs of Europe felt their necks, and now that the blow has fallen upon German Jewry, all the Jewries of the world are wondering what will be their fate." Their fate is obvious if Hitler's role as messiah is effective.

In the service of that role all Germany is absorbed. Going out of Germany is World Service (Welt-Dienst) that feeds newspapers everywhere (whose chief American representative lives in St. Albans, W. Va.). The Congress for German Foreignism is working for Stuttgart. The Deutsche Ficht-Bund has world-wide contacts from its offices in Hamburg. After the war this bund tried to convince the world of Germany's guiltlessness in the World War. Now its greater aim is to convince the world that no matter what happens nor where—the Jews are responsible and guilty. The Dies committee has revealed the power of these organizations, of both the right and left. Should they amalgamate their power domestically as their chiefs have done on the international scene, hurt and tragedy for the Jew will be inescapable. Between the upper millstone of fascism and the lower millstone of communism the Jew will be exterminated.

In the first place, we are convinced—contemporary events prove that this thesis is correct—that when a nation embarks on a program of anti-Semitism it ends with war. That is the course of events: Anti-Semitism, anti-Catholicism, anti-Protestantism, anti-democracy, and finally comes the destruction of the peace of the world. Anti-Semitism leads to war. There is no other way out. It is the inescapable end, and events of our day prove our case.

In the second place, we must point out that we, living in democratic America, hope that America shall remain a democratic power and a great nation, and that we shall work in that direction. But no nation remains great that refuses to encourage the interpenetration, the cross-fertilization of the many peoples, races, religions, cultures that live within it. The moment a nation determines upon a policy that shuts her from the currents of new ideas, that nation is doomed.

Spain is a case in point. Spain was to medieval times what Great Britain is to our own world. She spanned the seas. The sun never set on her domains. For many centuries Moslems, Christians, and Jews worked together for Spain's glory. They produced the maps of Spain. It happened that a Jew first incorporated the travels of Marco Polo into a map. Together they created the instruments of navigation that supplied eyes to the Spanish seamen. They discovered new worlds for Spain. Spain excelled in music, literature, science. Then a frightful blight settled upon the nation. She exiled her best minds. Those among her thinkers and scientists who refused to go suffered death and extinction in prison and at the stake. Spain fell from her greatness. Not because Jews were exiled. This is said uncritically because of some Jews' conceit. Jews were only an incident in her fall. Spain fell (as every nation that duplicates her folly will fall) for she hermetically sealed herself against the progress that comes when peoples, races, religious patterns, are allowed the free process of interpenetration and cross-fertilization. Therefore, one who wants to see the sixteenth century mind goes to Spain today. In the same way that those who will want to see the twentieth century mind in the twenty-fifth century will surely go to Germany. Spain fell. Germany will fall. Any other nation will fall from her greatness that hermetically seals herself against the outside world. The Jews' exile is but the symptom of the disease that stifles a nation's greatness and kills it.

Therefore I say forthrightly that anti-Semitism is not Jews' problem alone. It is America's concern, too. Therefore I insist that when anti-Semitism appears here it ought to be called to the attention of the American people. Anti-Semitism is directed not against Jews alone. It is directed ultimately against the destruction of all greatness in any nation. In a sense the German Jews were partially responsible for the fall of the Weimar Republic in Germany. They refused to see that anti-Semitism, while first striking at them was ultimately destined to undermine the foundations of the republic. Of course, it was a heroic gesture when the Jews bore the brunt of it themselves. It was heroic insofar as they thought it was aimed at them and at them only. But today we see the picture more clearly. Anti-Semitism was the beginning. Its end came with the destruction of the republic and the beginning of war. This is the inescapable curve of contemporary history. Let us learn its lesson.

On the coasts of all warring nations sensitized instruments are built to warn of the approach of enemy aircraft. Jews are the sensitized instruments that must warn the American people of the approach of the enemy, an enemy not directed against Jews alone, but against the American people itself. If we refuse to sound the warning, we are false sentinels. We are treasonable to America.

In the third place, Jews must not yield to the threats of the anti-Semites. "Lay low. Don't be prominent. Refuse public office." These are threats of the anti-Semites. They demand that no Jew shall hold public office in America—in which, perhaps surprising to some, certain Jews agree. To my mind, when a Jew enters American public office he goes not as a Jew. No more than when a Protestant or a Catholic enters public office does he go as a Protestant or Catholic. They all enter as Americans. Jews have served America just that way. I thank God for the great public service, often at high sacrifices, given by men like Brandeis, Cardozo, Lehman, and all others who serve America in this hour of crisis.

I recall my late friend Mr. Justice Benjamin N. Cardozo telling me what happened when Mr. Hoover invited him to the United States Supreme Court. He was called to the telephone at Albany and told that the White House was telephoning. "I knew Mr. Hoover was not going to ask me about the weather here. I knew he was going to ask me the fateful question: 'If nominated, will you serve?' * * * Not an easy question. I did not want to go to Washington," Mr. Justice Cardozo said. "It meant leaving every fond memory I had. For all my memories were bound up with New York and with Columbia University, my alma mater. I hated to go to a strange city." * * * But he was asked to serve. No matter at what personal sacrifice. He placed his great legal mind at the disposal of his Nation during one of its most critical hours. It was his duty. He could not have done less.

Once before, in order to meet a crisis in Jewish history, we asked for the ghetto. Those ghettos became the foulsome prisons for Jews for 500 years. We ought to seek no moratorium on Jews in public service in America in order to forestall a temporary crisis. It is a trick of the anti-Semites. Then they will say with some justice: "When the Nation needs Jews most, they desert her." Beyond our own personal safety we place our patriotic duty to America. We shall not yield to the threats of the anti-Semites.

In the fourth place, Jews ought to profit by the mistakes of the immediate past in Germany. There some Jews believed that anti-Semitism was directed not even against them, but against other Jews there called eastern European Jews.

Some Jews in Germany tried to ride the bandwagon of reaction to personal safety. They naively believed that Hitler would be "tamed" when he came to power. Some helped him to power. Now we know that protection cannot be purchased from a racketeer. Let us learn this lesson. * * * Now we ought to know that when we ride the bandwagon of reaction we play directly into the hands of the anti-Semites, as well as into the hands of the destroyers of democracy. The exiled wealthy of Naziland know this to their great sorrow.

We owe it to ourselves and to America to make our position clear. No one can do it for us.

This is a terribly tragic time. Jews need wisdom and courage, fortified by a faith that tyranny and brutality, any more than darkness, cannot last forever. Morning comes after every dark night. Jews are not a people of a day or of a year. Their life's span is measured in centuries. In patience there is faith. Meanwhile our hands and energies are not atrophied. We are the sensitized instruments warning our Nation of the approach of the wreckers who parade at first as our enemies alone. We continue to contribute to our Nation every atom of value in our people's life, collectively and individually, refusing to bow to the threats of anti-Semites who would deny us our share in helping make and keep America great and mighty. We recognize that when any Jew is attacked, all Jews are attacked. Bitter experience has taught us. Our world is too small for any isolated attacks upon any segment of Israel. We join hands with many peoples, cultures, and groups in American life to build America strong, so that she might today serve as an exampled nation of light to a world fast growing dark. Hatred of any group in America's family of people would extinguish that light. To do less would brand us as false Americans and bad Jews. In this crisis when America can once again be a light unto the nations we will do no less than be true Americans by being good Jews.

What Lincoln Would Say Today

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 7, 1940

ARTICLE BY GEORGE E. SULLIVAN

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I have, in this request, included an article entitled "What Lincoln Would Say Today," by Mr. George E. Sullivan. This article is compiled from statements made by President Lincoln and should be very interesting to every Member of the House because it expresses the thoughts of a man whom every one must admit was a good and stanch patriot.

Two articles appear in this issue of the RECORD and they are entirely different—one from the viewpoint of President Lincoln and the writer of the article; and the other from the viewpoint of Dr. Baruch Braunstein and, I presume, Dr. S. Newman who was kind enough to send me that article with his compliments.

WHAT LINCOLN WOULD SAY TODAY

(By George E. Sullivan)

(A realistic adaptation to present-day conditions of the sound American ideas of this great martyred President, in accord with his great speeches and writings. Lincoln courageously exposed the going conspiracy in his time which had actually invaded Government circles.)

Eight score and four years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation conceived in liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal—a truly Christian concept.

Sorely handicapped was its great mission until its new birth of freedom in a Civil War, when it abolished Negro slavery with which the freedom-loving Colonies had been afflicted by the British Crown's pernicious promotion of the slave trade.

A famous Statue of Liberty was thereafter erected, and a period of progress and prosperity enjoyed unequaled in the world's history, in striking contrast to the havoc and misery uniformly produced by mercenary and war-breeding anti-Christian forces under their denial of the universal brotherhood of man.

A new test faces our Nation today. It is whether this Republic, and its salutary checks and balances, shall be discarded for a fake republic constituting a virtual dictatorship and founded upon anti-Christian deception, discrimination, and depredation, and parading as a democracy, a much-used disguise of enemies of our Republic.

An intensely organized, and financially powerful, international anti-Christian horde, seeking world conquest, has long been engaged in insidious invasion of this Nation, penetrating and polluting practically every phase of American life, and insolently demanding tolerance for its intolerance, and license to destroy freedom.

Politics, finance, economics, business, and education have all suffered terribly from its blight. Even tax-supported educational facilities have been flagrantly misused to destroy fundamental concepts of constitutional American liberty. Insolent propagandists for the horde have the temerity to claim for its members brains and culture superior to our own, obviously confusing deceit with brains and barbarism with culture.

Palpably and demonstrably, no member or supporter of this anti-Christian and anti-American horde is eligible for officeholding in our Nation, yet a truly alarming number of them now occupy vitally important official positions—executive, legislative, and judicial. Their harmony in substituting craftily devised restraints of liberty in place of true liberty, and steering our ship of state steadily toward the reefs of final bankruptcy, make it impossible not to believe that all understood one another from the beginning and are working under a common plan or draft drawn up before the first blow was struck at the foundations of our Republic.

The plan or draft is incontrovertibly of Socialist vintage—compounded largely of old deceptions with a new label or veneer. No form of collectivism is compatible with constitutional American liberty or can ever produce anything except a dictatorship, no matter what the label. Misbranding it "American" or "Christian" cannot change its essential nature. Whether national or international, and whether Jewish, non-Jewish, or anti-Jewish, it will still be inherently anti-Christian and anti-American, no matter what crackpot intellectuals, either cleric or lay, may say to the contrary. Instead of removing abuses, any collectivism multiplies and aggravates them by making cogs of human beings.

The real danger now confronting America arises from the un-American "fifth column" right in our midst. Its nefarious work has proceeded without appreciable molestation for a very long period. Officials sworn to defend this Republic have defended instead the insolent proposition advanced by the horde that the right of "free speech" includes right to advocate overthrow of our Republic by force and violence. Members and supporters of the horde holding public office appear to be immune from dismissal by the present administration. Those responsible for these conditions now announce a campaign to eliminate this un-American "fifth column." The American people have the right and duty to believe, however, that no trust should be placed in such announcement.

American patriots are now told, in quite plain terms, that they will be stigmatized as members of a "sixth column" if they expose the real identity and make-up of the anti-American and anti-Christian horde chiefly constituting the "fifth column." It is said to be un-American and un-Christian to do so, because of the resentment inevitably following such exposure and the possibility or likelihood that such resentment may develop into hatred of the ruthless horde by the American people. Hatred, of course, never cures or settles anything, and no one should incite it. However, the American people are not children to be kept in the dark about the imminent jeopardy of their Republic and their lives and liberties. It should, accordingly, be considered a high honor to be a member of such "sixth column." It should be made great and powerful, extending from coast to coast, and prepared to defend our Republic and our firesides from onslaughts of the "fifth column," from which those in high office have failed to protect us. Regardless of the particular racial or other make-up of the anti-American horde, the full facts must be made known and unflinchingly dealt with. No racial or religious cloak can possibly protect the horde, nor can any member or supporter of political world-Jewry or any world-conquest organization or group honestly claim to be a loyal American.

The international horde promotes and manipulates panics and wars. Through clever financing of both sides of a war, it obtains the confidence of each, yet cunningly contrives to reduce both to exhaustion from mutual slaughter for easy tax-over and subjugation by the minority group constituting the horde. Its manipulations preceding and during the last World War, and its efforts immediately thereafter to promote civil wars in all crippled nations, leave no room for serious doubt about this. It has recently become quite evident that our own entry into the last World War was due chiefly to machinations of this horde, which is now seeking to embroil us in the new World War.

Let me warn most solemnly against a repetition of the deceptions of 1916–17 which would put an end to this Republic. In 1916, a President, on intimate terms with leaders of this international horde, marched at the head of a "preparedness parade," and secured reelection upon the slogan "He kept us out of war." Yet early in 1917, in cooperation with a supine Congress, he succumbed to the efforts of this international horde to put us into that World War. As early as June 3, 1916, a still earlier supine Congress passed an act which undertook to authorize the President to assume astounding dictatorial powers in time of war or when war is imminent, which patently un-American act stands unrepealed even now. The present Congress has a plain duty to repeal that act, particularly as the same warmongering group to which President Wilson succumbed in 1917 appears to be in high favor with our present President, and similar propaganda methods and mediums appear to be operating at high speed.

To the mothers in this Nation, living and dead, I must direct a few words. Time and again, they have sustained the most costly sacrifice—that of their own dear sons engaged in the service of this Republic. When the sacrifice has been in the cause of freedom, as was the case of the five sons of noble Mrs. Bixby in the Civil War, the anguish of the bereavement has been somewhat assuaged by a solemn pride. But when such lives are snuffed out not in the cause of freedom, but as victims of gross betrayal and deception, as in 1917 and 1918, and when similar propaganda methods and mediums now seek to embroil us in the new World War at the behest of the same unscrupulous horde of world aggressors, no truly informed mother in America can possibly remain silent while the Congress now in session seems disposed to ape the supine Congresses of 1916 and 1917.

If America has the good sense to keep out of Europe's wars, and to keep the machinations of this anti-American and anti-Christian horde out of America, our great Republic may endure to the end of time.

If our present Congress, with the true facts now available, abdicates its constitutional duty to defend our Republic, and gives further aid to this international anti-American horde, it will surely go down in history as the "Disloyal Congress."

Every one of intelligence knows that a large standing army in a Republic constitutes the reverse of national defense and a dire threat to the Republic, particularly when enemies of the Republic have penetrated public office and may misuse such standing army to coerce, disarm, and subjugate loyal American citizens, who constitute the real bulwark of internal defense in a Republic.

Again, do not be deceived by any proposal to require general arms registration as a supposed protection against the "fifth column." Be prepared rather to consider it as an insidious move against a patriotic "sixth column." Members and supporters of the "fifth column" would without doubt spurn compliance with the requirement, which would result in producing merely a list of the loyal Americans who possess arms, and their particular location—something of inestimable value to the enemy within the gate. Any such arms registration requirement may prove to be merely a preparatory step to attempted disarmament of loyal American citizens in violation of their constitutional right to "keep and bear arms." Unless loyal Americans maintain their right to keep and bear arms, they may experience here what occurred in the early bloody days of "red" Spain, under so-called loyalists, so warmly commended by high officials of our Government as defenders of "freedom" and "democracy." Our loyal Americans should be encouraged to keep and bear arms in every American home as the finest bulwark of internal defense against long-coddled subversive forces now strongly entrenched in our midst. Those seeking to disarm loyal Americans and render them helpless are self-confessed enemies of our Republic. Really loyal officials would, instead, direct their disarmament efforts against aliens generally and all members and supporters of subversive groups.

Loyal Americans of all races and creeds, and regardless of party affiliation, should lose no time in inaugurating a national campaign to remove from public office all members and supporters of this organized international anti-American and anti-Christian horde and to return our Republic to its true functioning. It is quite obvious that many now holding public office should never again be entrusted with any kind of public responsibilities or even remain at large, and their efforts to be reelected insult the intelligence of the American people.

If political parties persist in evading the real issue upon which the future of this Republic depends, its candidate should be spurned as one would the plague. There is an obvious deficiency in honesty or intelligence or both when a going conspiracy is altogether ignored or is attacked by mere empty gestures and without dealing with the conspirators at all. Write-in ballots may yet win the day, even without a new party, in such a national emergency as this, a real national emergency to save the Republic, not a fake emergency artificially created to insure against saving the Republic. The people can demonstrate that they are the masters.

Such of the press as persist in deceptive and disloyal propaganda may soon learn a salutary lesson—namely, that a paper without subscribers cannot keep its advertisers.

With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right, let us fearlessly perform the special tasks of this generation as an example for future generations, to the end that government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth.

The Great Betrayal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES I. FADDIS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 7, 1940

ARTICLE FROM ST. PAUL PIONEER PRESS

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the St. Paul Pioneer Press of February 18, 1940:

[From the St. Paul Pioneer Press of February 18, 1940]

THE GREAT BETRAYAL—THE (UNITED STATES) POLICY AFTER THE WORLD WAR—MOST DISASTROUS IN MODERN HISTORY

(This political testament of the late James Wallace, president emeritus of Macalester College, was written shortly before his death, to give to those among whom he lived the benefit of his matured opinion on the great world events of his time. Those who agree and those who disagree with his indictment of post-war policy will be equally interested in this unique document.)

I am now in my ninety-first year, having been born March 12, 1849. Since my graduation as valedictorian of the class of 1874 of the College of Wooster, Ohio, my life has been devoted to the profession of teaching in college. My alma mater asked me to become junior professor in Greek and history.

Later I was made dean and then president of Macalester College.

I am a bit older than the Republican Party, and knew of it from its inception. Up to the Civil War I was a strong Republican and as a boy joined heartily in the campaign to elect Abraham Lincoln. In fact, until Woodrow Wilson's time I had never supported a Democratic national ticket. But at the close of the Great War in 1918 we reached a point in our history, and in the history of Europe, and of the world, which has led me to form an opinion which I wish to leave on record before my journey's end, as my mature judgment on one dominant issue. As my physical condition now indicates that the end is not far away. I state my conclusion briefly. It is:

"The policy pursued after the great war by those that became the leaders of the Republican Party, was the most treasonable toward the great cause of world peace, justice, cooperation, and the settlement of disputes around the council table, the most treasonable," I say, "and the most disastrous that can be found in modern history." This conclusion, like all mature judgments on great issues has a background of facts, and to this background I wish to call attention.

THE GREAT BETRAYAL

Americans speak with scorn of the betrayal of Czechoslovakia by Britain under the leadership of Neville Chamberlain. Shamed silence would better become us. For the great betrayal of modern times—the most infamous, the most momentous—occurred 20 years ago in Washington, not last year in Munich.

Chamberlain abandoned Czechoslovakia under threat of immediate attack by an overwhelmingly powerful air force upon his scandalously unprepared nation. But 20 years earlier, Americans betrayed their own interest in world peace, and in doing so, they betrayed Czechoslovakia and the world besides; and this infamous betrayal was under no threat to our safety, but under the leadership of men filled with personal spite and blind partisanship. Our act then led straight to the debacle of Munich, by a road clearly marked.

For three score years I was a Republican, but I must say that the policy of the Republican leaders after the great war was treason to the great cause of world peace, justice, order, and civilization. It was the most disastrous policy into which any nation has been led in all modern history; it started a train of disasters, from Manchuria through Abyssinia to Spain and back to China.

And it dragged not only our international prestige but our internal morale down to a new low. For to achieve their purpose and afterward to defend it, the assassins of the world's great attempt to climb above the barbarism of war had to poison the minds of millions of Americans—make them suspicious of Britain and France; make them timid, fearful; make them believe themselves inferior to other nations and thus afraid to cooperate with Europe lest they be outsmarted.

Americans were exhorted to have no foreign policy lest some risk be run; we must not run 1 percent of risk for 100 percent of gain. And in direct consequence of our course our annual appropriations for defense have increased $1,000,000,000 in a decade.

THE PEACE LEAGUE

The rising generation does not know and the passing generation seems to have forgotten the almost universal demand during and after the war for an international league of peace. They never knew or have forgotten how this demand climaxed a century of discussion of means of eliminating war and of establishing procedures and machinery for insuring peace.

American leaders had been devoted to conciliation and adjudication of international disputes. Lists of arbitration treaties and arbitral awards show that the United States stood second only to Great Britain and her dominions in the frequency with which international disputes were settled by verdict of neutrals. In the first Hague conference the Americans backed the Russian proposals for disarmament; in the second their strong leadership created the Court of Arbitration. Before the Great War nonaggressive policies, backed by strong peace societies in the United States, the United Kingdom, Canada, France, and certain other countries, gave their people confidence that there could be no hostilities between them.

Then came the Great War. Its colossal losses brought home to all thoughtful men that one government, or even one man, may start a war, and that any assurance of peace depends upon effective pressures upon lawless nations. The logic of events had demonstrated how all voluntary machinery for world peace breaks down if one nation believes in war as a national policy. * * *

The United States Chamber of Commerce in a great referendum voted 2 to 1 for economic and military sanctions, and by 96 percent "That this country take the initiative in forming a League of Nations." Ninety percent of the newspapers supported the program. By March of 1919, a month after the peace conference had accepted a draft of the League Covenant, 34 out of 36 State legislatures in session that year had passed resolutions of support, and 33 Governors had endorsed it. Gompers and his labor forces were for it.

PLAN SUPPORTED

Nearly all of the women's organizations, the law associations, the universities and other educational bodies, the churches lined up in support. The principles of world-wide religion, as taught particularly in the New Testament, were overwhelmingly in favor of the peace and justice for which the League of Nations stood.

Outstanding Republicans supported the League, past and future Presidents and Secretaries of State, distinguished presidents of universities. The League was supported overwhelmingly by the older and abler Republicans, those most competent in foreign affairs, who richly deserve the confidence of the rank and file.

Of the nations invited to form the League, all except one, after careful but comparatively brief consideration of the merits of its specific provisions, united in support of this new organization. Other nations applied for admission. No nation asked for a single reservation. The one exception was the United States of America. The world's strongest country, the world's greatest democracy, with already 120,000,000 people, leading in wealth and resources, and devoted to the cause of national and international peace. The world organized to frame a covenant to put cooperative pressure on aggressors. Our Republican-controlled Senate, by a margin of 2 votes, was the one barrier to the making of an effective League of Nations. As one looks back, the thing seems utterly incredible. How could it happen?

ATTACKS BEGUN

The League was openly opposed by a few violent or embittered Senators with no vision of international peace founded on justice, by some timid souls afraid of having the strongest country on earth adopt a constructive foreign policy, by a great chain of rabble-rousing newspapers notorious for their unscrupulous misrepresentations, and especially by the personal and partisan enemies of Woodrow Wilson, with their public propaganda amply financed by two Pittsburgh magnates.

Approval of the League would have exalted the Democrat Wilson, but a direct attack was too dangerous, hence the plot was to emasculate the League with reservations. No other nation insisted upon even 1 reservation; but the Republican Senators smothered it with 14 reservations. To gratify personal hatred and for partisan advantage, a skillful and fanatical minority of United States Senators betrayed the world's hopes of organized peace and of the substitution of international justice for war. To maintain party harmony and unity, many Republicans who believed in the League joined in betraying it. "They gave to party what was meant for mankind."

TREATY OF VERSAILLES

Part of the campaign was and is to vilify the Treaty of Versailles and teach the American people that Woodrow Wilson made a mess of it. The treaty is blamed for the present ills of Europe, and all its major rectifications of previous European crimes are ignored. The treaty reestablished an independent Poland a century after its ruthless dismemberment. It restored Alsace-Lorraine to France and freed Czechoslovakia from Austrian tyranny. It restored to Denmark territory seized by Prussia in 1864; it freed Finland, Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania from Russia; and so on. Only the most prejudiced and the most ignorant, or those most indifferent to human liberty, can denounce the Treaty of Versailles as being, in the main, a bad settlement. Except for the unlimited reparations—which were soon reduced and were extinct before Hitler came to power—the treaty was moderation and appeasement compared to what a victorious Germany would have demanded. For this statement there is plenty of evidence aside from the terms imposed by Germany on Russia in the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk.

Even without the United States, for a dozen years the League of Nations was a highly useful organization in keeping the peace in Europe. It promptly settled such dangerous incidents as the dispute over the Aaland Islands, the fighting on the Greek-Bulgarian border, the Italian attack on Corfu, and (as late as 1933) Persia's seizure of British oil concessions. But in 1931 the disastrous effect of America's refusal to aid a world-peace plan was made manifest. Japan seized a great area of Chinese territory, twice as densely populated as the United States. It was a deliberate and wanton aggression; Japan's guilt was obvious to the dullest wit in America.

And then what was the policy of the world's greatest nation?

President Hoover, in traitorous disregard of the principles to which he had given allegiance in 1918–20, but in accordance with the ideas which dominated the great betrayal of 1919, would commit the United States to no cooperation with other powers to safeguard the peace of the world against attack by a criminal state. The United States had 44 percent of Japan's external trade, and no economic sanctions could be effective without American participation. The President would not consent to any such effective pressure against an aggressor state.

UNITED STATES FRIENDLESS

At Munich Chamberlain crucified the Czech democracy, because he was intimidated by Germany's air power and disheartened by the thought that if war began he could not replenish his air fleet from the United States. It is indeed hard to imagine legislation more cowardly, more short-sighted, more distinctly contrary to the country's interests, more directly pointed against the world's ideals of assured peace through international cooperation than this miscalled neutrality legislation.

Hitler, Mussolini, and the Japanese have given us Americans many lessons in the effects upon the world of the absence of any effective organization for cooperative security. And all too likely another World War will be necessary to reteach Americans what they learned in the last World War and what the betrayers of 1919 succeeded in making them forget.

Not long ago a Senator observed that the United States had no friend on earth. He probably spoke what was substantially true; and who is responsible for bringing the prestige and reputation of the United States to the lowest level of its history? Who is responsible except the bigoted, craven, narrow-minded traitors who persuaded Uncle Sam to withdraw into his own shell, regardless of the world issues involved in the policies of the countries which make force the first aim of the state?

MY LAST WORD

My last word to my fellow countrymen is: Realize the responsibility and the power of this colossus among the nations. Desert the leaders who in the words of the prophet Jeremiah made us in the eyes of the world "an astonishment and a hissing." They have brought our whole civilization to the brink of another catastrophe. Again, as in 1919, it is crystal clear that there can never be tolerable security for any nation—even for this great and formerly isolated Nation—until enough of the nations firmly combine to insist that the peace shall be kept. Citizens of my beloved land, forget two decades of disastrous retreat. Remember that no part of the world can ever be a decent place in which to trade, and live, and hope while every armed nation retains the power to imperil civilization itself whenever it chooses. Let the greatest of all nations resume again the leadership which none other can supply. O my countrymen, advance firmly to the establishment of effective organization for international law and order.

Roosevelt Shows His Hand and Sends Our War Equipment to Europe—Are Our Boys Next?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS D. THILL

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 7, 1940

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, President Roosevelt shows his hand as he orders some of our war equipment and some of our best dive bombers sent to certain belligerent powers in Europe. Many characterize such action as an act of war. It certainly is unneutral.

On May 31, the President advised Congress that—

The expansion of our defense program makes it necessary that we undertake immediately the training and retraining of our people, and especially our young people, for employment in industry and in service in the Army and Navy.

How can we properly train pilots when the President disposes of our airplanes which are needed for training purposes? But the tragic part of the President's action lies in that he is making our country a participant in the wars of other nations against the will of our people.

If Hitler wins the war, will it promote friendly relations for him to know that we aided his enemies and sought to ruin him and his country with our war equipment? If the Allies lose, will they not condemn us for not having supplied men as well as arms, airplanes, and munitions? If the Allies win, will they not criticize us for having given too little and for giving only at a price? It looks as if our boys are next to be sent overseas to fight Europe's battles if the war lasts for some time.

War propagandists are urging American participation in war. It is true that much of the propagandizing is subtle, but hidden beneath the veil of smooth language lies that invitation, if not a demand, to spill American blood on foreign soil. The following news article discusses some of the latest war propaganda:

[From the Sioux Falls (S. Dak.) Daily Argus Leader]

SUBTLE PROPAGANDA

Life magazine devoted much of its space last week to a discussion of America's position in respect to the great war now being waged in Europe.

Discussing the war and the course of action that is being suggested to the United States, Henry Luce, the editor, said:

"We may never fight side by side, comrades in arms of Britain and France, but we know now that, fundamentally, their struggle is our struggle."

In the same issue of Life, Walter Lippmann, the columnist, expresses this opinion:

"Every war which involves the dominion of the seas is a world war in which America is inescapably involved. The hour has come when we face the prospect of living alone in a hemisphere of weak states in a world of gigantic conquering military states."

Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, the president of Columbia University, also participates in Life's symposium on the war. He says:

"It is usual to speak of a European war and then for many to add that such a war can be no concern of ours. But the present conflict is a world war. Governments on at least two continents are engaged in that type of assault, of arson and of murder which is euphemistically called war. The issue is between two types of civilization, two types of life, two ideals of government and social order. That conflict, if settled against us, will put the world back for generations to come."

Accompanying these articles are three distinct pictorial presentations. One describes the German military activities. Another the wholesome, comfortable, and pleasant life of France in peacetime. A third presents a similar picture of English peacetime life.

Luce, Lippmann, and Butler make no statement to the effect that we should participate directly in the war. Neither do they say that we should not.

But all of them seek to establish the impression that this is our war.

If that objective is accomplished, the next step—actual American participation—will follow. Editor Luce knows this. So do his associate commentators.

The Argus-Leader has outlined in some detail Life's presentation of this subject because it is typical of a broad campaign now being waged primarily in the East. This campaign, it seems, has as its first objective the creation of the attitude in the United States that England and France are fighting our war.

The American people are a fair people. They are willing to fight their own wars and are not inclined to hide behind 2,000 or 3,000 miles of water while somebody else does the bloody work.

So, these propagandists conclude, if we can convince the people that this is their war, American help for the Allies will be readily forthcoming.

Their campaign is subtle, to be sure, but it is not commendable. It is properly subjected to the damning indictment that it lacks candor—in other words, plain honesty.

As Luce, Butler, and Lippmann obviously believe this is our war, let them be forthright. Let them be frank. Let them say exactly what they feel our course should be.

Then this subject can be discussed as it should be, as all subjects should be argued in a democracy.

The Argus-Leader, for its part, does not share their obvious convictions. It does not believe that this is our war. If we felt that way about it, we would be insisting that our Government become associated with the Allies to the full extent of our ability in the prosecution of the war.

The American program, as we see it, should be one of intense preparation for war but of nonintervention. We should build in this country the world's greatest military machine and be ready for the worst.

Immediate Aid to the Allies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. W. STERLING COLE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 7, 1940

ADDRESS BY JAMES BRYANT CONANT

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered over Columbia Broadcasting System May 29, 1940, under the auspices of the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies, of which William Allen White is chairman:

Introduction by Mr. White—read for him by the announcer:

This organization, the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies, is Nation-wide. I, its national chairman, happen to be a Midwesterner, bred and born. Our aims are definite and limited to making public sentiment that will persuade the United States to throw its economic and moral weight on the side of the nations of western Europe that are struggling in battle for a civilized way of life. As I stated in my invitation for the formation of the committee, these nations constitute our first line of defense. It is therefore fitting that I, a Midwesterner, speaking for this Nation-wide organization, should introduce President James Bryant Conant, of Harvard University, a New Englander, who will speak for this committee.

Last September President Conant wrote to my neighbor, Governor Landon, concerning the current debate on the so-called neutrality bill. At that time he said, "I believe that if the Allies are defeated by a totalitarian power the hope of free institutions as a basis of modern civilization will be jeopardized."

He also added, "As the discussion has developed, it appears to be taken as a premise that the only matter before the country is how to keep the United States out of war. If every phrase must be chosen so as to avoid the charge of being a war monger, a blanket censorship has been cast on public debate. Should we not examine without fear the advantages and disadvantages from our own selfish point of view of every angle of foreign policy? Must we not assume that a democracy can make a rational choice on matters of war and peace? If not, war has already defeated democracy on this continent. This is to me the vital point."

Tonight Dr. Conant has the broadest liberty to speak his mind and say his say freely in the cause of liberty as it rises out of catastrophe and crisis in western Europe.

President CONANT. Mr. White has asked me to talk to you this evening about my personal views. He has asked me to tell you what I think the United States should do in the present crisis which confronts the world. I am going to try to state facts and draw conclusions as I see them.

There is no need for me to dwell on the agonizing news of the last few days. Tonight the Germans stand on the shores of the English Channel and along the Somme. Tomorrow looms before us like a menacing question mark. A total victory for German arms is now well within the range of possibility.

As a result of these developments one simple question must be considered by every citizen in the land tonight. Can we as a free nation, considering first and foremost our own best interests, tolerate the overwhelming of the Allies, the capture or destruction of the British Fleet?

Let me ask you to visualize our future as a democratic free people in a world dominated by ruthless totalitarian states. There are those who argue that Hitler's war machine, when its task is done in Europe, will be converted to an instrument of peaceful industrial activity. I do not think so. There are those who imagine that a government which has broken promise after promise, which has scorned the democratic countries and all they stand for, which mocks and laughs at free institutions as a basis for civilization—that such a government can live in a peaceful relationship with the United States. I do not think so.

To my mind, a complete Nazi victory over France and England would be, by necessity, but a prelude to Hitler's attempt to dominate the world. If Germany were triumphant, at best there would result an armed truce. This country would be feverishly endeavoring to put itself into an impregnable position based on a highly militarized society. Our way of life would be endangered for years to come. If this be so, what should we do in these desperate, tragic hours?

We must rearm at once, that much is clear. The vision rises before us of the United States suddenly left alone and unprotected in a totalitarian and destructive world. It is obvious we are unprepared to meet an emergency of this nature. It is also obvious that our first aim must be to prepare with all rapidity. England's failure to listen to Winston Churchill, warning of approaching danger, is responsible for her plight. We must not make the same mistake. We are all agreed on that.

I need stress no further the necessity for rearmament at lightning speed. There is hardly a dissenting voice on this issue.

My purpose tonight is to urge another course of action equally important. I am advocating immediate aid to the Allies. I shall mince no words. I believe the United States should take every action possible to insure the defeat of Hitler. And let us face honestly the possible implications of such a policy. The actions we propose might eventuate in war. But fear of war is no basis for a national policy. In a free state public opinion must guide the government, and a wise public opinion on matters of foreign policy can result only if there is a continuous, clear-headed, realistic discussion of all eventualities, including war.

At this moment, the entry of the United States into the war certainly does not seem necessary or wise. For the present we are not prepared to render more aid as an active belligerent than we can render as a nonbelligerent. If our actions short of war are immediate and effective, they may suffice. If, on the other hand, we continue to be confused in our thinking and dilatory in our actions, our aid may come too late. Then the possibility of war under highly unfavorable circumstances would soon confront us. Our previous fear of war might well result in the certainty of a conflict without the support of powerful nations. The pacifist would then, indeed, have dug the grave of liberalism.

What are then the actions that can be taken at once?

Let us state a few of them: First, the release to France and England of Army and Navy airplanes and other implements of war, without impairing our own security; second, repeal of the laws which prevent United States citizens from volunteering to serve in foreign armies; third, control of exports with the purpose of aiding the Allies by avoiding leaks to Germany and giving priority to France and England; fourth, the cooperation of our Maritime Commission with the Allies in every way possible under our present laws to expedite the sending of supplies and munitions. These steps, if promptly taken by our Government, would render effective aid which some experts believe might tip the scales in favor of an Allied victory. Furthermore, they would be of infinite value in strengthening the morale of the Allied nations and would serve notice to the world that our resources were now enlisted in the democratic cause.

I have purposely avoided the use of the words "moral issues." The younger generation, in particular, is highly suspicious of this phrase. Their feeling is chiefly due to a widespread misinterpretation of the reasons for America's participation in the war in 1914–18. I have avoided this issue, not because I sympathize with those who proclaim that there is no fundamental difference between the actions and aims of the democracies on the one hand and the totalitarian powers on the other. Far from it. There is to my mind all the difference between piracy and peaceful trade; all the difference between ruthless tyranny and enlightened intercourse among free men.

But I am endeavoring to confine my argument this evening to a realistic appraisal of our foreign policy. Let me make this clear. I advocate no moral crusade to distant lands. If crusading were a proper policy, we should have had more than one provocation for war in the last dozen years. I am arguing that the changed military situation in Europe actually threatens our way of life.

At this moment, today, the war is in effect veering toward our shores. The issue before the United States is, I repeat, can we live as a free, peaceful, relatively unarmed people in a world dominated by the totalitarian states? Specifically, can we look with indifference as a nation (as a nation, mind you, not as individuals) on the possible subjugation of England by a Nazi state? If your answer is "Yes," then my words are in vain. If your answer is "No," I urge you as a citizen to act.

Write or telegraph to the President of the United States, to your Congressman, and your Senators, stating your belief that this Nation must give immediate, effective aid to the Allies. Let your elected agents of government have your thoughts. Urge that Congress stay in session to consider emergency legislation as may be necessary, and speed the process of rearmament.

Above all else, let us consider the situation boldly. This is no time for defeatism or despair. The Allies may be expected to hold out if they have help from us and the promise of further help to come. The wrath of moral indignation is impotent in days like these. A struggle to the death is once again in progress on the fields of western Europe. The British Isles are making ready to stand a siege. Action is the only answer, action which may help immediately, action which will be to the Allies an earnest and encouragement of help to come. If you think it important to our national welfare that assistance be rendered immediately, if you want the struggling peoples of France and England to know where we stand, do your part to arouse public opinion. It is not too late but it is long past time to act. I urge you—let your voice be heard.

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 7, 1940

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, to those who are overzealously rushing preparations for a great era of lasting prosperity based upon the new European war, let these figures, released on Armistice Day, 1939, come to dampen their ardor.

The United States Treasury Department has added up the amounts still owed to us by the European nations as a result of the World War which ended 21 years ago. Including principal and interest, Europe is indebted to Uncle Sam in the sum of $14,497,161,340.22.

Fourteen billion dollars would be a substantial boost toward the return of our national prosperity, but no economist in his right mind expects to see any large part of the entire sum repaid in his lifetime or the lifetime of his children.

Here are the figures; let us read them and weep:

Great Britain	$5,497,069,379.48
France	4,180,628,819.88
Italy	2,024,150,441.19
Germany	1,259,870,431.25
Belgium	453,324,480.11
Russia	394,992,092.46

Czechoslovakia (now claimed from Germany)	165,762,044.80
Rumania	63,999,476.67
Yugoslavia	61,779,062.52
Greece	34,523,635.29
Austria (now claimed from Germany)	26,011,672.09

National Labor Relations Act

OF

HON. MATTHEW A. DUNN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Friday, June 7, 1940

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, my reason for being opposed to the amendments to the National Labor Relations Act is because I do not believe they are necessary. The act has not only been beneficial to the laboring people of our country but also to the employers of labor. Until the enactment of the National Labor Relations Act there was not a time in the history of our great country that the laboring people had the opportunity to express their opinion regarding their working conditions. A law which will permit the employee to bargain with his employer is not only a progressive but also a humanitarian measure. There has been less trouble between the employee and employer since the National Labor Relations Act has been established—that is one of the reasons why I am opposed to any amendments which will have the tendency of weakening the act.

Our Economic Defenses

OF
HON. ANDREW C. SCHIFFLER
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 7, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WHEELING (W. VA.) INTELLIGENCER

Mr. SCHIFFLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Wheeling Intelligencer, Wheeling, W. Va., of June 3, 1940:

[From the Wheeling (W. Va.) Intelligencer of June 3, 1940]

OUR ECONOMIC DEFENSES

The specter of German economic penetration is gradually being substituted by our leading alarmists for the threat of a Nazi invasion. We are being told now that while Hitler probably will not undertake a physical invasion of the Western Hemisphere, at least for a substantial period of time, he will bring us under economic domination when and if he conquers Europe.

Why we should have any more to fear from the economic than from the armed might of Germany, this newspaper confesses its inability to understand.

Assuming a complete German victory in Europe, and assuming further an attempt to bend American economy to the needs and purposes of the German barter system, what have we to fear? Aside from some readjustment of our trade relations with South America, so as to permit the importation to the States of a greater volume of South American goods which normally we would not need, no radical change at all would be necessary, and no real hardship would be imposed. Indeed, were it not for political considerations, were it not for the necessity or desirability of knitting the Americas more closely together, of keeping out the foreign influence, it would not even be necessary to alter our trade policy with respect to South America.

For the truth is that this is the most economically self-sufficient country on earth. And if we include the entire Western Hemisphere, were it possible to build a wall around this continent which would isolate it from the balance of the world, we could get along very comfortably, we could continue our development unchecked, we would be deprived of nothing necessary to human life and comfort, and could build up a standard of living not heretofore approached.

From a purely material standpoint, the world has nothing to offer us which we couldn't get along without. Take rubber as an example of our inherent self-sufficiency. This country has relied upon imported rubber because it is cheaper and because the arrangement has been generally satisfactory. But were the supply of imported rubber entirely shut off from this continent, we could in a short time supply all of our needs. Not only has it been demonstrated that rubber can be grown successfully in Brazil, along the whole northern coast of South America, in Central America, and as far north as the finger of Florida, but we have in actual production here in the United States four or five proven synthetic rubbers. These are more expansive than the natural rubber, but they are its equal, even superior to it in many respects.

What is true of rubber is true of virtually every other necessity. Our natural wealth is almost limitless, and we have no more than scratched the surface of its possibilities. We could get along very well producing for ourselves and consuming only our own products, were such an extreme step to become necessary.

As a matter of fact, from a purely economic standpoint, foreign trade is not and never has been of vital importance to this country, despite the great emphasis placed on it of late. Traditionally we have consumed 90 percent of what we produced. We could stretch it to a hundred percent without suffering physically.

Of course, nobody proposes that we should voluntarily do anything of the sort. Foreign trade is desirable, and should be encouraged and safeguarded so long as it does not interfere with our domestic economy. There are articles for the production of which certain peoples and certain places are particularly adapted. There are certain natural products found in limited areas only. It is a natural and mutually profitable arrangement for peoples to exchange such products. It amounts in the end to barter, by whatever name the trade may be known—cotton for tin, automobiles for coffee, wheat for tea. Moreover, and this is the more important angle, the exchange of products among peoples—short of undercutting competition—increases human contact and thus tends to promote good will.

So that the desire of the American people is to go on trading and dealing with other peoples as in the past; to treat all alike; to accept from abroad such usable merchandise as we do not produce for ourselves; to open our doors generally to the products of other countries, up to the point where they do not undermine our own output, and to sell in turn to the world such of our own production as the world may want. But if the worst comes, we can get along very well without any of this business. We are the least vulnerable people on earth.

The Preservation of Democracy

OF
HON. FRANCIS T. MALONEY
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, June 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY, OF KENTUCKY, BEFORE CONNECTICUT STATE DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able address delivered by the distinguished majority leader [Mr. BARKLEY] at the Connecticut State Democratic Convention, held at Hartford, Conn., on June 3, 1940.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I was greatly complimented by the invitation to address this convention of Connecticut Democrats, conveyed by my good friend and your distinguished senior Senator FRANK MALONEY. I was immensely pleased to be able to accept it.

My pleasure is increased because of the opportunity it affords me to witness what I understand will be the unanimous renomination of Senator MALONEY, in whose behalf I had the honor to appear on the platform in this State 6 years ago. I trust his selection as your standard bearer again this year is only a prophecy of his overwhelming reelection next November.

I deeply appreciate the generous words employed by my dear friend Homer Cummings in presenting me to this convention. There is no man in America for whom I entertain a more affectionate regard than I entertain for him. Twenty years ago, out on the fringe of the Republic in the city of San Francisco, he delivered the keynote address at the Democratic National Convention held there. In eloquence, in vision, in sincerity, in comprehensive delineation of issues, in profound appeal to the mind and heart of a nation, that address has not been excelled before or since. I am proud of his friendship. I am reassured by his presence here tonight.

These are ominous days through which we are living. They are fraught with the possibility of incalculable injury to our American way of life and to the democratic way of life wherever it has existed throughout the world.

So terrible is this truth that I feel less inclined, less in the mood to deliver a partisan address than I have felt in many a day. Because the issues that confront the American people today, the decisions which they must make tomorrow, are infinitely deeper than party labels and immeasurably more important and far-reaching than the ambitions of selfish men or selfish groups of men.

However, it seems that in the midst of the crisis which faces the world and which faces us we cannot escape a certain amount of partisan fulmination and adulation, depending on the identity of the fulminator and the adulator.

It is probably just as well that this is so. No man should, and no political party should be permitted to avoid the consequences of their exercise of authority, either in normal or abnormal times. Under our system of government the political party has been the means through which millions of men and women have expressed their opinions on the subject of government; and politics in its true sense is the science of government. Therefore, while in all emergencies and crises it is the duty of the people to subordinate their partisanship to the larger interests of the country as a whole, it is not necessary that they forego the right to examine and re-examine the records made by political organizations which have exercised power, or the records and attitudes of men who have been elevated to high responsibility through the exercise of the political rights of the people.

Throughout the Nation today millions of men and women whose primary interest is not the mere success of a political party but the preservation of American democracy in its broader and deeper significance, are surveying and will continue to survey the records of those whom they have trusted, and those who will ask for either the renewal or an original grant of that confidence.

They have the undoubted right to do this. They have the right to make all the comparisons which are available. They have the right to examine the measure of success or fruitfulness which has accompanied the administration of power by men or parties in the past, in order to judge its probabilities in the future.

In doing this, they, as well as we, should insulate themselves as far as possible from the narrow partisanship which claims all virtue for itself and denies it to all others.

In this spirit I shall discuss the record which has been made during these past 7 years under the leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

These have been unique years in the history of our country and of the world. Problems so baffling and stupendous, so intimately interwoven with our individual and collective lives, and yet so far-reaching in their effect upon our present and future outlook as a people, have arisen at every turn of the road and at every step we have taken, that the wonder is not so much that we have traveled so far and accomplished so much, but that we did not surrender to the inexorable fate which all pessimists announced had overtaken us.

We live in a world that refuses to be stationary. We live in a world that is peopled by seething billions of human souls, who, if possessed of normal souls, are striving for a better world and for a better place in that world for themselves and for their children.

In the effort to attain that goal, clashes of personal interests, of group interests, of racial interests, of national and international interests, are inevitable, and these clashes leave their scars upon the face and heart of humanity in our day, just as they have done in all the ages of man's history.

In the effort to bring some form of order out of the resulting chaos, to clear away the debris which has choked the channels of progress, and to coordinate the moral and intellectual strength of the masses whose faces were set toward the goal of their aspirations, governments have been ordained. Sometimes they have been imposed on the people by brutal and ruthless methods. Sometimes they have been set up by the peoples themselves, based upon the inalienable right of every human being who submits to authority to have a voice in its creation.

It is possible for me to speak on this occasion only in the barest outline of the record of these past 7 years carved out of the history of the United States. If in speaking of this record I appear to be somewhat partisan, I can assure you that I am not more so than those who condemn it with bitter indiscrimination and seek to destroy the faith of the American people in a great new era in order that on the wreck of that destruction they themselves may rise to power and authority.

Remembering our own repeated failures in the art of accurate appraisal, we may temper our judgments concerning any man who has failed at prophecy concerning the ability or the achievements of another. But if we are fair, which connotes the element of justice, we should be able to recognize and admit the greatness of a man on the basis of a record of undisputed achievement, even though that man be our contemporary, and even though some of those who indulge in the appraisement may differ from him on some or many proposals or positions.

So today I feel that we are justified in pausing for a brief period to pay tribute to a man who will be honored by countless generations of Americans yet unborn, and to a record made by him and those who have labored with him in behalf of the American people.

No President since or save Lincoln has faced so grave a crisis in our political life as did President Roosevelt on that gray day of March 4, 1933, when he took the oath of office as President of the United States. Because we are prone to forget dangers when they have disappeared, let me briefly recall the conditions which faced him and the country on that historic day.

During the period of depression which had then existed for more than 3 years, the industrial machinery of the Nation had been slowing down until it had practically reached a standstill. To use a quotation which is rolled as a sweet morsel under the tongues of Republican candidates for President, "The economic system had stalled on dead center."

Millions of wage earners—estimated at between thirteen and fifteen millions—dismissed by their employers because they had no work for them to do were in despair. Those who were fortunate enough to have any left were living on their savings. The markets of the world closed to our surplus products. The wheels of industry stopped revolving. The smoke no longer ascended to the heavens from the chimneys of industry. Then came the epidemic of bank failures. Slowly at first—one here, one there, one yonder—scarcely noticed by those who were vainly seeking jobs, banks had been failing throughout the country.

Then more and more of them collapsed, each weakened link dragging down still others. Suddenly the whole Nation awoke to the danger. A great wave of panic swept across the country. Men and women beat against bank doors, fought each other, and fought those who had been placed on guard, in a fruitless effort to enter those banks and withdraw their precious savings. When they were turned away they went with white faces and dazed expressions to stand in bread lines. And in those lengthening bread lines there were mutterings and ominous threats and imprecations.

In a speech in this State a few days ago at the Republican State convention, the junior Senator from Connecticut made the facetious statement that in 1932 the American people succumbed to a charming voice.

It is true that the Americans had succumbed in 1932. But it was not a charming voice to which they succumbed. For 4 long and tragic years they had gradually succumbed, not to a charming voice but to a tragic series of disasters to which those then in power contributed or were helpless to avert.

This was the picture which confronted Franklin D. Roosevelt and his new administration and the Congress of the United States when they assumed office on March 4, 1933.

There were able and honorable men who doubted the ability of Mr. Roosevelt to deal with this situation, just as there were able and honorable men who doubted the ability of Lincoln to deal with the conditions which confronted him in 1861. The manner in which he confounded these gloomy predictions is now as definite and important a part of our national history as are the acts of Lincoln.

Did he deal with the banking situation? Were we as a party remotely responsible for the banking situation which he faced? Does it lie in the mouths of those who contributed to this disastrous condition to condemn the method by which it was eliminated?

During the 4 years previous to Mr. Roosevelt's inauguration there had been more than 6,000 bank suspensions in the United States, not including 3,400 banks which could not reopen following the bank holiday.

Immediately our whole banking system was reorganized. It was placed on a sound basis. The Federal Deposit Insurance Act was passed, and a new confidence was restored to the millions of Americans who wanted to trust the banks in which they wanted to deposit their savings.

Since the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation has been in operation the number of bank failures has been reduced to 51 per year.

Will those who seek to be restored to power because they say they do not like what we have done tell the American people whether they will repeal the guaranty of bank deposits and restore the faithless conditions which made it necessary? The American people are entitled to know. What is the reply?

From 1922 to 1930 six and one-half million skilled workers had participated in the greatest construction boom the Nation had ever witnessed. But by 1933 nearly all these skilled workers had lost their employment because the boom had collapsed.

It was not possible for the Government to bring about the reemployment of all these men. In the first half of 1933 factories producing durable goods had employed only 44 percent as many men as in 1929, lumber mills about 45 percent, cement mills about 44 percent, and steel mills about 54 percent, and many of those still employed were working on shorter hours.

In order to bring about as much reemployment in these lines of industry as the Government could undertake, the Public Works Administration was created. Its objective was the building of projects that would not compete with the products of private industry but would stimulate additional purchases and thus further the employment of labor.

These Public Works projects called for more than $2,000,000,000 worth of materials. The men employed on them were not employed by the Government but by private enterprise, which was stimulated and assisted by the Government; and it is a tribute to those who have had charge of it to be able to say that it was accomplished without waste, graft, or misappropriation of any kind anywhere in the United States.

During the same period the Work Projects Administration was employing from two to three and a half million men and women who were otherwise unable to secure employment in private industry; and the results of this employment have been the erection of permanent and beneficial public improvements in almost every hamlet throughout the Nation, all of which have enhanced the standards of life and brought to these communities permanent improvements which they could never have secured without the aid of the National Government. And in addition to these physical and material values the program has taught the American people to believe, and to know, that their National Government is not some austere and remote and unapproachable entity yonder in Washington that takes no account of the welfare of the individual citizen, but that their Government is a humane government, and that it is the agent and servant of all the people, capable and willing to bring to their assistance and their rescue its experience, its knowledge, and its power.

In order that industry might be able the better to weather the storms of these 7 years, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was strengthened, and authorized to aid large and small business alike, and this agency has enabled thousands of industries and businesses of every character to survive. Will any man, regardless of political persuasion, declare that this should not have been done? Let him answer.

Seven years ago the condition of the American farmer had declined until agriculture as a whole faced bankruptcy. We all know that industry and agriculture are handmaids in our economic system. Industry depends on those engaged in agriculture to purchase its products, while agriculture likewise depends on those engaged in manufacturing and distribution of manufactures to buy and consume their farm products. There can be no such thing in America as permanent industrial or commercial prosperity without prosperity on the farms. For years political parties had promised the farmer that he would be placed on an economic basis equal to that of industry, so that the farmer by his own just share in the national income might enjoy prosperity himself and at the same time help others to prosper.

The Roosevelt administration is the first administration in the history of the Nation to make a real effort to keep this pledge. I do not claim that the task has been yet accomplished. But I do claim that the annual income of the American farmer has increased from four and a half billion dollars in 1932 to more than $8,000,000,000 in 1939; and that this increased income has gone into the purchase of the products of manufacturing plants throughout the Nation, and especially in New England, bringing additional profits to investors and additional employment to workers throughout the Nation.

New life was injected into the farm-loan system, affording additional credits to agriculture, which had completely dried up during the previous 4 years prior to 1933.

In order to cope with the plight of urban home owners, who were losing their homes through foreclosures at the rate of a thousand a day, the Home Owners' Loan Corporation was created, which, since its creation, has made loans to more than 1,000,000 home owners in the aggregate sum of more than $3,000,000,000 thus saving the home and also the mortgage holders, and what is equally important, preserving more than a million firesides and hearthstones in this Nation. Will those who condemn the record we have made in Washington tell these million home owners in the Nation that they should have been left to their own fate, driven into the streets and out of homes in which they had invested their savings, but which economic conditions for which they were not responsible rendered them unable to hold without the aid of the Government?

During this period the Civilian Conservation Corps was established, with camps all over the Nation; and during the period of their existence more than 2,500,000 young men between the ages of 18 and 25 years have found the meaning of a new relationship between them and their Government and their fellowmen. If these years of economic grief and travail had done nothing more than take these young men from idleness and hopelessness and train them in service to themselves, their families, and their Nation, the physical, moral, and spiritual gains would have been worth infinitely more than it has cost in taxes or in public debt.

Are there any in this Nation who are so bereft of vision or who are so blinded by narrow partisan considerations as not to congratulate America on this great accomplishment?

In the interest of honest business and honest investment we have enacted laws and set up agencies to protect the people from fraud and deception and manipulation in the issue and sale of securities to the American public. Surely no sane person will contend that those upon whom commerce and industry must depend for the constant infusion of investment funds to keep them going are not entitled to the fullest knowledge regarding the conditions of those corporations in which they contemplate investing their money. Surely no sane or honest person will contend that these investors are not entitled to be protected from fraud and manipulation in the sale of these securities.

In order to give the American investor the right and the opportunity to ascertain the truth about any investment before he makes it and to protect him in the enjoyment of his rights as an investor after he makes it, we have set up the Securities and Exchange Commission, not for the whimsical or capricious control of the private affairs of men and women, but for the protection of honest investment by the only power that can protect them, the Government of the United States.

Will those who condemn and criticize and who seek to rise to power on a wave of discontent which they foster tell the American people that they will withdraw this form of protection from them and restore the chaotic conditions of 1929 to 1933? The American people are entitled to know the answer. The people of New England are entitled to know the answer. The people of Connecticut are entitled to know the answer.

In an effort to afford assistance and guidance to the youth of the Nation, the Youth Administration was established, which has served American youth in a manner never before undertaken by this or any other government.

Will those who find no good in this administration tell us what they would have done or, more to the point, what they did not do for the education and encouragement of the young men and women of America?

During these 7 years we have written more just and far-reaching laws for the benefit of American labor than was ever written before by any or all previous administrations. We have given to labor the right to bargain collectively over wages, hours, and conditions of labor. Will those who seek now to cajole the American people into another era of "ragged individualism" take them into their confidence and tell them whether they propose to withdraw this right or weaken its administration? Will they explain to them why they never thought of granting to them this measure of justice when they were in control?

Will they also take us into their confidence and advise us whether they propose to break down the Fair Labor Standards Act, designed to assure to the American worker a just wage for his labor and a reasonable measure of time for rest and recreation?

It may be that the Labor Relations Act and the Wage and Hour Act need some amendment. No law is perfect, and experience here as elsewhere will point the road to wise and fair determination of any change that is needed. But when these acts to guarantee to labor the rights enjoyed by other classes of the American people are to be amended, let them be amended by the friends and not the enemies of those who hew the wood and draw the water and earn their bread in the sweat of their brow.

In addition to all these things, this administration, under the leadership of the President, has devoted time and study to the fate of the aged and the unemployed. Other Presidents and other administrations and other political parties fulminated in terms of profound sympathy for the aged and the unemployed. But they never got far enough to do anything about it. The Roosevelt administration enacted the social-security law, making the beginning of what I hope will ultimately become one of the soundest and wisest functions of government in the United States. Certainly society owes it to those who approach old age after a lifetime of service to it without a competence to guarantee a sense of security in their declining years. It owes it to those who are deprived of employment without their own fault to hold out the hope of security during periods of unemployment. And society owes it to the rising generation of boys and girls to make some effort to give them room for work and service among their fellow men.

But our opponents complain that, although the objectives of this program are laudable, we have not done it in the right way. They with a straight face announce that they could have done it better, and that they can administer these laws and these programs more wisely and more faithfully than those who are responsible for their inauguration.

They say that the cost has been too great; that because of this we are headed toward bankruptcy.

Let us take a look at the record. On the 4th of March, 1929, 4 years before Mr. Roosevelt was inaugurated, the public debt of the United States was a little more than $16,000,000,000. On the 4th of March, 1933, it was a little more than $22,000,000,000, an increase of more than $6,000,000,000. During the last 3 years of the previous administration there was a deficit in the Treasury. But this deficit, and this increase in the public debt, were and are not reflected in a single public improvement anywhere in the United States. Not a schoolhouse, or courthouse, or sewer system, or waterworks system, or playground, or street improvement, or pavement, or hospital, or additional highway system, or other form of public improvement can be found in this broad land which was established, repaired, or improved by the creation of these deficits, or this increase in the public debt. I do not complain of that. I do not state or insinuate that there was any improper expenditure of these sums represented by borrowed money. I do not think there was.

But, inasmuch as it is claimed that the Roosevelt administration has been guilty of waste and extravagance, that it has headed the Nation toward bankruptcy, let us see what the facts may be. Some of these critics complain that the program which we have carried out should never have been undertaken. Others complain that even if it should have been undertaken too much money has been expended in its consummation.

You may be interested in a partial break-down of this program in relation to dollars. Here it is in part:

Highways and streets	$4,173,000,000
Sewers, waterworks, and public utilities	1,328,000,000
Educational buildings	921,000,000
Public buildings	951,000,000
Engineering structures	269,000,000
Conservation, flood control, reclamation, rivers and harbors, T. V. A., etc	4,308,000,000
Aviation facilities	145,000,000
Parks, playgrounds, gymnasiums, and other recreation facilities	972,000,000
Public housing	364,000,000
Rural electrification	124,000,000
National defense	4,688,000,000

These figures do not include $500,000,000 appropriated by the States to match Federal road funds, and almost $2,000,000,000 supplied by State and local bodies as their portion of the Public Works Administration program, nor does it include $500,000,000 under contract for loan by the United States Housing Authority and more than $3,000,000,000 worth of construction generated with private capital by the Federal Housing Administration.

What have the people gotten for their money? Here are a few of the things they have gotten: 80,000 miles of new highways; 265,000 miles of new streets and country roads repaired; 9,600 new educational buildings; 770 new hospitals; 1,600 new courthouses; 1,500 new sewer systems; 2,400 new water systems; 282 new city electric systems; 3,400 new playgrounds and athletic fields; 380 new large bridges; 29,000 new small bridges; 4 T. V. A. dams; 220,000 miles of new rural electric lines; 1,200 new post offices; 27,700 new low-rent dwelling units completed and 58,000 under construction; and the planting of 1,750,000,000 new trees in the denuded areas of the United States.

These are some of the things which the American people have secured for the expenditure of their money. But, in addition to these physical additions to the facilities for the enjoyment of life, they have obtained enduring proof that their Government is the agent and servant of the people, and that it proposes to demonstrate here in America that democracy can be made to work and function in any emergency that confronts this great Nation.

In his fireside chat with the American people a week ago, the President gave the American people some of the details of our effort to prepare ourselves for national defense and for the preservation of the things we have been building up, and the way of life which is sacred to the American people.

This program has related itself chiefly to our domestic problems. But the domestic field does not encompass the entire situation which faces America today. We are confronted today as never before with the obligation to preserve this democratic way of life.

We have been trying to prove to the world that this is the best way of life, and that it is worth preserving.

Nations in almost every continent who have believed in that way of life have become the victims of ruthless aggression because they were not prepared to resist those who would destroy it. Cities, homes, industries, nations, civilizations have been laid waste in Europe and Asia, and other cities, homes, industries, nations, and civilizations are today threatened as they have not been threatened in all the recorded history of man. The inventive genius which has brought to mankind the means of a better life now threatens to destroy that life and the things which make it worth living.

We in America rest under a tremendous obligation today. More than a century ago James Monroe inaugurated the doctrine that bears his name; that the Americas were to be the proving grounds of a new democracy, which should be set up in the Western Hemisphere for the service and enjoyment of the peoples of this hemisphere, and also as an example for the rest of the world.

We have thus far defended, preserved, and extended it. But we cannot assume that wishing alone will continue to make it so. We cannot assume that those who have no respect for democratic governments elsewhere will respect ours in America. They respect only those whom they fear or whom they know to be able to withstand their assaults.

We want peace in America. We have drawn more closely together throughout North, South, and Central America, not because we have any designs upon our neighbors, not because we want anything they have save their friendship and their cooperation, but because we know that in unity there is strength and that the problem of protecting democracy and liberty in any part of America is the problem of protecting it in all America.

We want peace throughout the world. There is no nation on earth against which we desire to become an aggressor. We pray that civilization and applied Christianity may yet triumph and lift their bruised heads above the scream of shells and the roar of devastating planes and tanks and all the agencies of death and incredible horror.

But as we have toiled in this land to develop our free institutions, as we have fought to create a nation devoted to freedom and equality, as we have sacrificed treasure to improve the standards of life for men and women here, so shall we struggle to the limit of our capacity to preserve these things from corrosive or destructive influences within our borders no less than from any ruthless juggernaut that may assail us from without.

Therefore we shall be ready. We shall prepare. We shall arm that we may not be caught unawares like so many others have been caught in the holocaust which now sweeps over so much of the world.

In this great task there is no room for partisan rancor or selfish aggrandizement. It serves no purpose now to blame one or another man or group for not knowing years in advance what the world was coming to. From 1921 to 1932 we deluded ourselves with the belief that wars of aggression were at an end; that each nation might pursue in peace its own purposes, so long as those purposes did not infringe on the rights of others. We signed treaties of disarmament. We signed treaties of arbitration. We renounced, with all the world, war as an instrument of national policy. Navies were reduced. The world rejoiced that at last an era of peace had come upon it.

The world has learned its bitter lesson. Treaties supposed to have been sacred have been thrown into waste baskets. Territory that was supposed to be inviolate has been ravaged. Men, women, and children whose only offense was that they were human beings have been murdered and driven from their homes. Throughout the world mankind is now inquiring whether Christianity is a mockery and whether civilization can survive.

In the midst of all this we find the oceans narrowing and the world contracting. We are again realizing that we are a part of the world and that there is no assurance that the lust for power and wealth may not seek to engulf our Nation and our people in the catastrophe which has overtaken others.

In the midst of these threats we call upon our people for unity. We know that call will find a response in the hearts of all our people, regardless of race, color, nationality, or condition. We know that Jew and gentile, Catholic and Protestant, white and colored, rich and poor, native-born and foreign-born will rise to the task which faces us. The hosts of free America will protect the freedom of America under the leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt not because he was elected as a Democrat but because he is the President of the United States and the spokesman of our people. We trust him because he has guided the Nation out of the depths of a cruel despondency in our domestic affairs. We trust him to guide us in the solution of our international affairs.

As a humble participant in the events of recent years in Washington, I am proud to proclaim the accomplishments of the Roosevelt regime. I am proud to have had a part in these events. You are likewise proud of these unprecedented advances.

It is a pleasure for me to come here to the State of your senior Senator, who, so far as I can recall, has never voted against a measure for the benefit of labor, or a measure for the relief of human suffering, or a measure designed to give greater social security to those who need it. He has on many occasions lifted his eloquent voice and consecrated his fine mind and his sincere heart in support of the progressive measures which Congress has been called on to enact. We know not what the future holds for us. But we know that in the strength of our people and under the benediction of God we shall endure forever.

The Meaning of Colonel Heg's Life Today

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. ALEXANDER WILEY, OF WISCONSIN

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a talk I delivered yesterday at Heg Memorial Park in Racine County, Wis., the subject of the talk being The Meaning of Colonel Heg's Life Today.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Someone has said that no one is dead who is remembered. We meet today to do honor to a man who lives in our hearts and minds today. We meet today to do honor to the ideals this man cherished—ideals which live today in his memory just as they lived during his life. They were American ideals.

Colonel Heg lives today and everyday, just as the Norwegians who died a few short weeks ago while fighting for their homeland, live today and everyday. In these days we are knowing full well this life is not all. It is just an interlude.

No man can kill an ideal. No man can kill the eternal spirit of freedom and justice. Truth crushed to earth rises again. Justice and liberty have always survived their oppressors. Learning has survived ignorance. Science has survived darkness. Christianity has survived paganism.

Bigots and tyrants may reign for a time. The champions of right may fall, but always before the last pages of history are written, right has survived wrong.

Colonel Heg died, but his cause survived him. The sons of the Vikings died by the hundreds a few short weeks ago, but their spirit and their ideals live on.

We meet today to do honor to Colonel Heg. The story of Colonel Heg is well known even to those who are not of Scandinavian blood. Almost everyone knows the story of the man who came from a Norwegian pioneer settlement at Muskego, Wis., to lead a regiment of immigrant soldiers, recruited principally from the Badger State, but also from Illinois, Iowa, and Minnesota, for the battlefields of the South in the Civil War.

It is the heroic story of a brave soldier and a good commander who was killed in action in the battle of Chickamauga in northern Georgia on September 20, 1863. But the story is much longer than these few, barren facts would indicate. It is the story that begins in 1829 and ends in 1863.

It begins in a little village in southeastern Norway and it ends on the battlefields of Chickamauga. There is a great deal in this life story which is characteristic of the life many of our forebears knew.

To begin with, he had a boyhood in the Old World. Then he had a trans-Atlantic migration. Then there came a contact with the American westward movement. Then came a taste of frontier life in Wisconsin and later identification with a community which typified many of the significant developments among all our immigrant people.

Colonel Heg's experiences were a little more varied than those of most of our forbears, however, for they included an overland trek to the gold fields of California, and some experience in the mining camps of the West, though eventually he returned to the community on Lake Michigan where he began a career in local and State politics that resulted ultimately in his leadership of a regiment of Scandinavian immigrants in the Civil War.

In many respects the achievements of this man have made his name a symbol among Norwegian Americans of the contributions made to America by pioneer ancestors of all Norwegian Americans. While he himself made a distinct contribution to American life, the importance of his life lies primarily in the fact that his story was typical of the progress of transition and growth that marked the lives of thousands of immigrants who came to America and to Wisconsin.

Hans Christian Heg was born just 4½ years after the pathfinders of the Norwegian immigration to America sailed out of Stavanger for the New World.

It was in the spring of 1840 that Even Heg and his wife with their four children started on the long journey to far-off Wisconsin. Heg sold his property and embarked with quite considerable means in his possession.

On May 17 they left Drammen. They stopped at Göteborg (the Göteborg I sailed out from last summer after war started), Sweden, to take on a cargo of iron, and then sailed for America. They reached New York 11 weeks later; then they followed the customary route to the West. They went by river and canal to Buffalo and then by steamer on the Great Lakes to the city of Milwaukee. Heg and his party disembarked at Milwaukee, though some of the others continued the journey on to Chicago.

From Milwaukee Heg left for Muskego, which was a typical pioneer community. Hans Christian Heg was 11 years old when he came to this settlement, and he passed the remaining years of his youth in Muskego.

Young Hans Heg became known as an alert, intelligent lad. By 1845 his father had become a part owner in the newspaper known as the Northern Light. This paper became the Norwegian organ for the free-soil party and Hans Heg, who was 18 years old when the paper was established began to be an active worker for the free-soil party by 1848. That same year gold was discovered in the Sacramento Valley. Heg joined the deluge of gold hunters.

He returned to Muskego in 1851 to take over the 320-acre farm which had belonged to his father. In 1851 shortly after his return he married the daughter of a Norwegian immigrant of 1843. At 22 he was already a leader of the Norwegian settlers. Politics again interested him and as an ardent free-soiler he became increasingly interested in the new Republican Party.

Heg detested slavery and as evidence of the sincerity of his belief, he played his heroic role in the Civil War. It is interesting to speculate on what this believer in freedom would have thought of the world today.

At any rate, his principles, like those of many another Norwegian immigrant, were free to develop in an American atmosphere. Heg's ideals, like those of his Norwegian compatriots in America, evidenced a deep faith in American doctrine, in American democracy, in American equality, and in our concept of human freedom. With his fervent belief in these principles, it was only natural for Heg to enter actively into political and civic work.

By 1861 he had finished a very creditable term in a State office. By that time the slave question had reached its critical point. Lincoln called for volunteers. The Civil War began.

At that time there were about 75,000 Scandinavians in the United States. In view of the heroic battle of the Scandinavians this year, it is particularly interesting to recall that the Scandinavians in America in these war years gave their strength and their lives for American unity just as bravely and as cheerfully as they might have for their native land.

They made a good record, and they earned recognition for their loyal Americanism. Like the Germans, Irish, and other nationalities, the Scandinavians loved their new country, and they were willing to make sacrifices for it.

On August 20, 1861, a call came to Wisconsin for five additional regiments. One of these regiments was composed entirely of Germans. On September 25, 1861, a number of the State's leading Scandinavians held a meeting at the State capitol in Madison. At this meeting they formally decided to form a regiment.

Governor Randall believed in the movement, and on October 1, 1861, he issued a commission as colonel for Hans Christian Heg. Back in the autumn of 1861, a number of stirring calls were written by Colonel Heg. In view of the events of this year, it is interesting to reread some of these statements.

On October 5 Colonel Heg wrote, "That which we learned to love as free men in our own fatherland—our freedom, our government, our independence—is threatened with destruction. Is it not our duty as brave and intelligent citizens to extend our hands in defense of the cause of our country and of our homes?"

On November 16, he wrote, "Let us band together and deliver untarnished to posterity the old, honorable name of Norsemen."

By December 1861 the Fifteenth Wisconsin Regiment had been organized under the supervision of Colonel Heg and assembled at Camp Randall in Madison. By February 1862 there were about 3,000 men in the camp and several other regiments were being organized. The majority of the regiment were of Norwegian blood, but there were also some Swedes, some Danes, and a few Americans and some Germans. Those were hectic days and in the next 3 years the Fifteenth Wisconsin Regiment played a valiant part in the activities of the Union forces in northern Georgia and in Kentucky and in Tennessee. Colonel Heg, who looked something like Stonewall Jackson, stayed with his regiment continuously. Colonel Heg made a gallant record and displayed his gallantry and his bravery on more than one occasion.

The final chapter in Colonel Heg's military career was written on September 19, 1863. On that day he was exposed to the fire of the enemy from noon until sundown. It was at sundown that he received his mortal wound. After he received it he rallied his men once again and rode on for about a quarter of a mile. Loss of blood finally obliged him to give up his command. On the following morning, that is, September 20, 1863, shortly before 12 o'clock, Colonel Heg died. Wisconsin mourned his death, and one newspaper wrote, "The State has sent no braver soldier and no truer patriot to aid in this mighty struggle for national unity than Hans Christian Heg. The valorous blood of the old Viking ran in his veins united with the gentler virtues of a Christian and a gentleman."

In the December 1920 issue of the Wisconsin Magazine of History, there is an article which deals with Col. Hans Christian Heg. I would like to quote the last paragraph of that article. It reads: "Colonel Heg has often been spoken of as a Norwegian, still more often as a Norwegian-American. These are both honorable titles. It is perhaps more appropriate, however, simply to say that he was an American. His is a story of one who threw himself fully into the current of the life of the new and adopted country. Without reserve, he gave the best that he had to America. He knew the trials as well as the opportunities of pioneer life in the West. He learned to believe in and to cherish our American institutions and ideals.

A man of the West, he joined the mighty throngs that brought California into the Union. He served his community in many humble local offices. Chosen by popular election he served the people of his State in a not unimportant official capacity. Finally he gave himself without qualification to his country when its flag was in peril and leading a brigade of the American Army he died fighting for that flag.

That is the life story of Colonel Heg. That is the story which serves as an index to the character of the man. Let us briefly analyze that character. Such an analysis is valuable to us because it will enable us to apply those character traits to ourselves and to our problems today.

Let me quote from an article in the "Emigranten" written at the time he was selected as a colonel.

"Young, powerful, and attractive, honorable, unimpeachably honest, to a high degree considerate of the welfare of his subordinates, with a splendid fund of practical, sound sense, and with the increased knowledge of men and things which his work as a State official has given him, he is the best man of all the Norwegians in America whom we have to lead such an undertaking. Our countrymen can gather about him as their chief with unqualified trust."

Those qualifications are the qualifications we need in our leadership today. For lack of them, our preparedness has lagged and our national economy has "bogged down."

Elsewhere it has been said of Heg that he was a careful and critical observer, quiet and accurate in his observations. Though quiet and taciturn in his work, he was known as a jovial companion outside the service.

He was absolutely fearless, though he tempered his daring with intelligence. In these dark days it is well also for us to recall that Heg had the gift of dissipating gloom and discouragement. In its place he inspired cheer and confidence. That, too, is something which we need today.

We need also Heg's rare gift of self-possession. Even in the midst of the severe exposure of 1863, Heg's remarkable poise never deserted him.

Above all, Colonel Heg was a just, human, and merciful man. When he was a Wisconsin prison commissioner he wrote, "The penalty of the law is justly due to its transgressor, but in the midst of deserved wrath, it is Godlike to be merciful."

Probably it was this very bigness of spirit which enabled Heg to deal justly with those under him, even when they were of different temperaments and different nationalities.

In his company Norwegians brushed shoulders with Swedes, Danes, and Germans, but they were all Americans. They pulled together for the common cause. In this connection I might add that Carl Sandburg in his magnificent biography of Abraham Lincoln points out that without the hordes of Scotch, Irish, Scandinavians, Germans, and English who swelled the northern ranks, the rising war tide of the South could never have been stemmed. It was the immigrant who made the northern Civil War victories possible.

Colonel Heg was such an immigrant, and even in the gloomiest days of the Civil War he retained his simple immigrant faith in the ultimate success of right. His letters to his family abound in this faith. They abound likewise in references indicating his deep love of family and home. Here again, we find in his nature a knowledge of the abiding values which we do well to recall today.

Why do we do honor to the memory of this man? What lesson can we learn from his life—lesson that will give us direction and guidance in these days of doubt and hysteria and indecision?

Colonel Heg was a patriot. We need patriots today. A patriot is one who loves his country and the principles for which that country stands. But a patriot is also willing to make sacrifices. He made the supreme sacrifice. He wasn't even born in this country as you have seen, but he did have an idea, a great idea, about the value of this country and the great freedoms that this country possessed. I repeat his words: "Our freedom, our Government, our independence are threatened with destruction. Is it not our duty as brave and intelligent citizens to extend our hands in defense of the cause of our country and our home?"

There is a challenge for you and me in this day.

In Colonel Heg's day they had "fifth columnists," but they called them something different. I believe if Colonel Heg were living today that he would speak out militantly against those forces in our midst that seek to create division in our ranks, that seek to undermine the unity of this people. I'm going to mention some of those groups, because I think no finer commemorative service could be held on this occasion for this great soul that has gone ahead in the journey, this life that left its citadel of clay at Chicamauga. I'm sure he, if he were living, would oppose these groups the same as I believe his spirit is opposing them now. What are they?

1. That group of aliens or citizens who live in this country and who are not devoting themselves 100 percent loyally to America. Some of these folks belong to organizations which have taproots in the various capitals of Europe. These groups think more about the welfare of other nations than America. America needs, as I have said, 100-percent loyalty.

2. The second group I call the parlor pinks and the internationalists who have found it convenient to hobnob with the communistic group with headquarters in Russia. It has even been alleged that some folks high up in government have been associating with this group.

3. The third group consists of our public officials whose laxity has permitted disciples of communism, nazi-ism, and fascism, to come to America and teach their doctrines not only in various labor and social groups, but in our colleges.

4. The fourth group consists of pseudo-intellectuals who have been guilty of causing a patriotic erosion in our youth. We find many of these in our educational centers. For years they've talked America down and never talked her up, but they are always ready to live on the fat of America themselves.

5. Another group is the defeatist group. We find them everywhere. Looking at the situation, they can see no hope economically or politically for America. They see our unpreparedness, and through their defeatist attitude slow up every constructive activity. They are a factor which must be reckoned with in our present situation.

6. Another group that we must eradicate is the so-called Fascist or Nazi group—the same type that handed Germany over to Hitler—they are always damning democratic processes. They don't know it, most of them, but they have become inoculated with insidious suggestions from the "fifth columnists" who are tools of some overseas government.

7. The next group consists of Government agencies which, through scatterbrained administrators, have hamstrung business, harrassed business with unnecessary rules and regulations, have sabotaged industry, initiative, and invention.

8. The next group is the racketeer. You find him in many phases of our life; in business, in labor, and in government. The labor racketeer has done more damage to labor's cause than any other force.

9. There is another group which consists of men in all stations of life who let indifference, inaction, lethargy, smugness, and complacency dictate their course. They are the men who will not meet the issue. They put off and keep on putting off the problems they should solve today.

Yes; I believe Colonel Heg would tell us all to bring light to this situation. "Give the people light, and they will find the way." He would tell us to bring light, so that the men in these various groups would see the need of getting out of those groups and devoting themselves 100 percent to patriotic service to the Nation. He would tell us to tighten our belts and meet the problems head on.

He would recognize that we are living in a world that is decidedly different than what it was a couple of years ago. Everywhere, except in America, democratic principles are extinct. Everywhere, including America, the day of ease is gone. We are the treasure house of the world, and we have to protect our treasure, and to do that we'll be called upon to dig down as we never did before to provide a preparedness program that will insure us against the marauder and the pillager nations. We don't want that thing to happen here that has happened to nations in Europe—neutrals and combatants alike. This is our America, and if men like Colonel Heg would die for her, it is right on this day in his memory that we pledge ourselves to live and sacrifice for her.

I could go into detail and tell you what that sacrifice will mean, but I believe I've said enough. We can build ourselves anew into a strong, virile, united people through the avenue of sacrifice. I'm sure no one who hears me will fail to meet the demand of this period. With charity in our hearts, and with courage there, and with the willingness to give, if necessary, until it hurts, I'm sure America will come through and see the dawn with a brighter day.

And I likewise believe it is fitting for us to rededicate ourselves to the ideals which Heg cherished—to renew our covenant with his deathless principles. These are not just words. We must do just that or our freedoms will disappear.

However, it is not enough for us to do this. We must do more. If we fail to do more we render the sacrifices of all the Colonel Hegs of the world valueless.

If we fail in our obligation to those champions of the right who have died, they will have died in vain.

It remains for us not only to rekindle their ideals, but to keep the flame burning. That means that we must see to it that our children are taught these ideals and understand their true worth.

We do not have to teach them any politics or any creed. We need only to give them the fundamental training, so that they can make their own decisions.

Let us educate our youngsters to respect truth and honor and the sanctity of the pledged word. Let us teach our children to revere fair dealing and justice. Let us teach our youth to reverence the great spiritual values. Let us teach them not only their rights but the rights of others. Let us write into their minds the knowledge of the great freedoms and their value. Let us burn into their hearts the necessity of preserving a love of home and family and country and God.

Other lands whose doctrines we reject are not content with a mere academic education for their youth. They drill into their youth the unholy doctrines which will rule their lives.

If we teach the doctrines of right with equal diligence, our youth will be competent to make their own political and social decisions. If they are well grounded in the principles we love and believe in, they can be trusted to apply them to any situation and any age. Knowing individual honor, they will inevitably know national and international honor. Let the churches and schools of our land accept this challenge and train our children in the ethics of the Christian life. Let every teacher and clergyman catch the glory of this adventure. Then shall we have preparedness indeed.

Knowing honor and knowing ideals, it follows that the lives of our children will be living reminders that the Colonel Hegs of the world will survive their oppressors.

War Hysteria

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER T. BONE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS OF HON. BURTON K. WHEELER, OF MONTANA

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, on the evening of June 7, the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] addressed a large gathering in the city of Washington, called together to protest against the possible entrance of America into the World War now raging. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a copy of the address delivered by the Senator from Montana, whom I regard as one of the most brilliant, outstanding, and courageous men in public life.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

I am happy to have this opportunity to speak before you on this occasion. No subject is more vital than war, and no situation more serious than that which we face in this country today.

A mad hysteria grips many of our people—a hysteria produced in New York and Washington. It is time for plain speaking, and I intend to do just that.

Let me read what a distinguished American has to say about the war:

"There is no place in this fight for us. It's going to be bad enough as it is. As you love America, don't let anything that comes out of any country in the world make you believe you can make a situation one whit better by getting into the war. * * * There is no reason—economic, financial, or social—to justify the United States entering the war."

Who said this? It is the statement of our Ambassador to Great Britain, Joseph P. Kennedy, made December 12, 1939, in the Church of the Assumption in Boston, Mass.

I agreed with Mr. Kennedy when he made his statement some months ago, and, unlike some of our distinguished columnists and interventionists, I agree with him now.

A well-known writer recently referred to me as an "isolationist." What people really mean when they call you an isolationist is that you no longer consider this country a British colony—or that you are someone who doesn't want to see the youth of our country killed and maimed on the battlefields of Europe.

There are many people in this country who feel we should enter the war now. To all these I say: You personally can go. Go to Canada and join the Allied forces, or volunteer here for ambulance service abroad. The belligerents can use you in their mechanized warfare, whether you are old or young, college professor or newspaper columnist. Or send your money if you don't want to send your life. The belligerents will be glad to take either. But don't try to involve this country in the war by preaching propaganda designed to have our Government force the young men of this country to do what you are afraid to do.

Several years ago there was a play on Broadway in which two men were discussing war. Both agreed they would never, never go to war; that neither was cut out to be a soldier. A few days later the two men met and one of them was in Army uniform. "How come?" asked the other. "Oh, I heard a band," replied the newly recruited soldier.

Once again the bands are playing. Before we join the Army, let's find out what it's all about.

Those who want the United States to get into the war tell us we must do it to preserve democracy and Christianity and freedom and enlightenment. Well, will we preserve democracy and Christianity and freedom and enlightenment by going into the war?

The very first thing that happens to a democracy in wartime is the suppression of all free speech. It should be remembered that every foreign accent becomes the sound of the devil every "white collar" worker and factory hand and farmer—all faced with higher and higher costs of living—soon find themselves accused of aiding and abetting the enemy whenever they ask for a higher income.

It has been well said that the first casualty in war is truth. Well, the next is the democratic process. I would be a little more impressed with the idea that this is a war to save democracy if the people who are shouting this slogan—both here and in Europe—had done something to help democracy before the war broke out.

There is great work to be done on behalf of democracy here. What about self-respecting jobs for 10,000,000 unemployed? What about the work of eradicating poverty and disease among that large section of the people so truly described as the underprivileged one-third of our Nation? What will happen to all our great plans for reconstructing happy and useful lives for these millions of people? Will democracy be best served by building a strong, healthy, and prosperous Nation in the United States or by hiding the top-heavy debts and limping economy of depression-ridden America under a new and huge military machine, and joining this machine to that of the bankrupt politicians of Europe in the bloodiest Armageddon known to history?

We are told that Europe is on fire—that we should help put out this fire before the wind shifts and the fire reaches us. I want to do everything possible to help put out that fire. I want to do everything to help the Allies stamp out the brutal forces which seek to dominate Europe and perhaps the world. But by setting the United States on fire we will not help put out the fire in Europe.

The newspapers today are full of letters and exhortations from people who urge us to get into the war in one way or another. But note one thing—the writers are all well past war age! Where are the letters and statements from our young men whose blood will be shed?

At Yale the other day 1,400 students signed a petition urging the Government to take no steps that would put us into war. And then what happened? A leading professor—who is also the dean of one of their colleges—immediately replied that the students were "confused." Confused indeed! The exclamation of that one professor received more attention in certain newspapers than the petition of fourteen hundred young men.

Day by day we see more and more statements inciting us to join the Allies. Of course the writers don't think we ought to send troops. Not yet. Simply start off by sending planes and supplies and then the American taxpayers' money. On all sides we hear the term "all aid to the Allies short of war." Now this is a handy catch phrase. The only trouble is you can't put your shirt tail into a clothes wringer and then pull it out suddenly while the wringer keeps turning.

We have decided to supply the Allies with all the airplanes and guns they can buy and we can sell. The Attorney General of the United States has ruled that under a law of July 1919 it would not be a violation of international law for us to sell the Allies a large supply of rifles, 75 millimeter guns, and ammunition officially labeled as "obsolete" war stocks.

We are thus doing by indirection what we would not do directly, and what the Senate Foreign Relations Committee had in effect said we should not do when its members voted 19 to 2 against the Pepper resolution which sought to do this very thing.

Bearing in mind that we are presently engaged in a mad race to rearm our own country and bolster our own national defenses it may seem inconsistent to some that we should be shipping out of the country these munitions. I would have no objection but we should be careful not to take steps which could involve this country in war.

Constantly, we hear the cry—give—don't sell—the Allies planes and guns. Let us analyze this idea a moment. Perhaps I shouldn't use the word "analyze." It's very unpopular in a period when billions of dollars are requested of and appropriated by Congress in the time it takes one man to shout across a room.

It is one thing for you as an individual to give the Allies all your money and all your property but quite different for us as a government to do the same thing. When the Government takes such a step it is tantamount to a declaration of war. Many well-meaning people want the Government to do this, not realizing its implications—others want to prey upon your credulity, knowing it means war.

But why is it necessary to give the Allies anything? The British Empire alone covers one fourth of the earth's surface. It has the richest domains in the world—all sending dividends and resources home to London. England is not exhausted or poverty-stricken or anywhere near such a condition. Why then should we regard the British as objects of charity? Great Britain does not so regard itself.

Why then this premature and exaggerated propaganda to make gifts or loans to the Allies? The fact of the matter is that the warmongers in the United States recognize these are important steps that must first be taken if they are to get this country into the war.

If the United States becomes involved in another European war this country and its people will underwrite all the tragic and costly mistakes of the Allied statesmen during the 20 years since Versailles. Do the American people want to do this? Do they want to pay with their boy's lives and with their hard-earned savings the tremendous bill that will be presented? Here is what the last war cost us: 126,000 American boys killed, 234,000 American boys wounded, 360,000 total casualties.

Was it worth it? Yes; perhaps—to those who made money out of it. Who else gained by this sacrifice? The answer is too well known to need elaboration. And what was the money cost of the last war? The answer is: $45,000,000,000 in direct cost. The equivalent of $1,000 for every family in the country—rich, middle class, and poor. And after this expenditure, what? Twenty years of peace marked by the biggest speculator's boom in the history of the world and the greatest depression known to mankind.

That's what the last war cost us. Shall we do it again? Think it over. Do you want to give the life of your husband, your brother, your son, or grandson, plus $1,000 to this cause? Some who have no sons, who sit in their swivel chairs and clip coupons say, "Yes." But the workers of America—the workers and the young of the Nation who will be called upon to make the real sacrifices—say, "No."

Remember what you gave 20 years ago in a war whose slogan was a war to end all wars—a war to make the world safe for democracy. Did we end all wars? Did we make the world safe for democracy? No. And we will not destroy Hitlerism by going into this war. For what is Hitlerism but the expression of brutality and violence that breeds on economic catastrophe? Wipe out the cause of that catastrophe—the failure to build a sound and prosperous economy—and we will wipe out Hitlerism.

Let us restore employment and prosperity in the United States. Let us end the extremes of millionaires and paupers and booms and depressions. The doctor who can't cure himself cannot cure another—not to mention the entire continent of Europe.

The big question now is whether democracy can be preserved. It can if we avoid steps that are likely to involve us in war. Does that mean we should leave our country defenseless? Certainly not. Up to now I have been opposed to the building up of great armaments for three principal reasons: I didn't believe them necessary when there was no war or threat of war; I regarded vast spending for armaments as an undue burden on the people; and that once having built up big armaments there would be an increasing tendency to use them.

In view of the European situation it is necessary for us to modernize our national defense and take precautions against any eventuality. Armaments are like everything else—new inventions supersede the old devices. We cannot defend a twentieth century republic with the weapons of the nineteenth century. Therefore, I approve of the program of modernizing our defenses, but I emphatically disapprove of using the present emergency as an excuse for shaping a war machine beyond our defensive necessities in the Western Hemisphere.

Some in this audience are too young to remember the last war. Let me tell you a few things that were said then. If the Kaiser won, we were told, the United States and South America would be his next victims. The Germans would take over the British Fleet and occupy Canada.

In this war, as in the last war, the victors will be the Horsemen of the Apocalypse—Famine, Disease, and Death. Starvation and poverty will hold sway throughout Europe. If Hitler wins he will have the same problems that the Allies will have if they win—feeding hungry populations, endeavoring to prevent great revolutions from sweeping through the conquered countries. These problems will be more than sufficient to occupy Hitler or the Allies.

Let us face these realities instead of bogey stories about air bases from which giant hordes of planes will bomb New York, St. Louis, and New Orleans.

After the war the world will look to and need a strong and prosperous democratic nation, a country that can lend its resources, not toward building instruments of death, but instruments of life—homes and hospitals, laboratories and universities. Let's not make war on men; let's make it on poverty.

Vocational Training of Additional Persons for Occupation Essential to National Defense—School Administrators Say Job Can Be Done by Expanding Programs of Schools Now Operating—Federal Financial Aid Is Only Thing Necessary and Should Be Provided

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 10, 1940

LETTER FROM CARROLL R. REED

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, the following letter from leaders in the field of vocational education should be encouraging to those who like myself have wondered just what should be done to meet the need for additional trained workers in essential industries and professions. It is worth the careful consideration of every Member of Congress.

THE AMERICAN ASSOCIATION OF SCHOOL ADMINISTRATORS,
Washington, D. C., June 6, 1940.

Hon. JERRY VOORHIS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. VOORHIS: Many Members of Congress have recently requested facts concerning the contributions which the vocational schools and technical colleges are prepared to make in training workers in occupations which are essential to national defense.

The attached statement prepared by representative educational leaders and the accompanying data which we have secured from the United States Office of Education are intended to give you these facts and the assurance of united support in solving this important problem.

Respectfully yours,

CARROLL R. REED, President.

VOCATIONAL AND TECHNICAL TRAINING FOR NATIONAL DEFENSE

Our Nation faces the problem of mobilizing all facilities available for national defense. Of crucial importance now is the quick and efficient preparation of an additional supply of trained persons in those occupations essential to national defense.

The American people have already made an investment of one and a quarter billion dollars in more than 1,200 vocational and technical schools and colleges throughout the country. The program of trade and technical education which this investment makes possible is carried on by an experienced administrative organization and a staff of 35,000 skilled teachers. The facilities for defense training now provided by these schools and colleges could not be duplicated in many years.

These schools and colleges, now operating in every State in the Union, can make greater use of their present plants and equipment to turn out trained workers. If funds are made available, these institutions can expand their programs immediately through additional shifts in late afternoon and night periods and in summer sessions. By giving many of the workers intensive short courses—in some instances requiring only a few weeks—these institutions can train at least 1,250,000 workers annually, thus more than doubling their normal training capacity.

This expanded program can be put into operation immediately if Federal funds are made available. In our judgment the greatest efficiency can be secured by administering this program through the established Federal, State, and local educational agencies in close coordination with the agencies responsible for the national defense.

Signed in Washington, D. C., June 6, 1940, by: Carroll Reed, superintendent of schools, Minneapolis, Minn., president American Association of School Administrators, chairman; F. L. Bishop, University of Pittsburgh, secretary, Society for the Promotion of Engineering Education; William G. Carr, secretary, Educational Policies Commission, Washington, D. C.; D. W. Creel, assistant secretary, Association of Land-Grant Colleges and Universities, Washington, D. C.; L. H. Dennis, executive secretary, American Vocational Association, Washington, D. C.; Willard E. Givens, executive secretary, National Education Association, Washington, D. C.; B. E. Packard, commissioner of education, Augusta, Maine, secretary, National Council of Chief State School Officers; S. D. Shankland, executive secretary, American Association of School Administrators, Washington, D. C.; R. O. Small, State director of vocational education, Boston, Mass., president, American Vocational Association; A. J. Stoddard, superintendent of schools, Philadelphia, Pa., chairman, Educational Policies Commission; John J. Tigert, president, University of Florida, Gainesville, Fla., president, National Association of State Universities.

Proposed training program for national defense in schools and colleges

Facilities to be used	Number to be trained	Average length of training period	Hours of training per week	Cost	Average cost per trainee
A. Public schools:
Summer schools 1940	150,000	10 weeks	40 to 42 hours	$15,000,000	$100.00
Extra shifts during the regular school year	225,000	12 weeks	do	27,000,000	120.00
Expanded trade-extension programs for employed workers	375,000	36 weeks	4 hours	21,600,000	57.60
Total for public schools	750,000			63,600,000	84.80
B. Engineering schools	[1] 20,000	10 months	40 to 42 hours	14,000,000	466.67
C. Expansion of facilities requiring capital investment	250,000	10 to 36 weeks	From 4 to 42 hours	50,000,000	[2] 84.80

[1] This number (20,000) can be trained for 10 full months. Probably many persons to be trained in these colleges would need only 3 or 4 months of intensive training. The total number of different persons who may be trained for $14,000,000 would therefore equal approximately 30,000.

More Dollars and More Cents for the Farmer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 10, 1940

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, on March 8, 1940, President Roosevelt, addressing the farmers of the Nation, said:

That program (the reciprocal trade agreements program) has brought results—results * * * in better markets for our farm goods—results which are mathematically proved in terms of pounds and bushels and dollars and cents.

What has the New Deal trade program meant to the farmer in dollars and cents? Since 1932 the value of the farmers' foreign market has declined $7,000,000. On the other hand, the value of the American market to foreign producers has increased $230,000,000. This represents a direct loss to the farmer, in dollars and cents, of $237,000,000.

	1932	1939	Loss to farmers
Agricultural exports	$662,000,000	$655,000,000	$7,000,000
Competitive agricultural imports	296,000,000	526,000,000	230,000,000
Total			237,000,000

What has happened to our foreign markets in terms of pounds and bushels?

The decline in exports of these 15 commodities alone has resulted in the loss of markets, in pounds and bushels, for 2,887,000,000 pounds and—excluding subsidized wheat and flour exports—for 76,017,000 bushels of the goods which the farmer produces.

On the other hand, competitive imports have increased. The increase in imports of 12 commodities alone has resulted in a loss to the farmer, in pounds and bushels, of 612,199,000 pounds and 12,369,000 bushels.

Through increased foreign competition in the home market and declining markets for our goods abroad, the farmer has suffered a total loss of markets, in pounds and bushels, for 3,499,199,000 pounds and 88,386,000 bushels of the products he grows.

Is this how the New Deal sells more pounds and bushels—gets more dollars and cents for the farmer?

The Tax Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JERRY VOORHIS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 10, 1940

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, from what I have been able to learn it appears that due to limited debate it will be most difficult to obtain time to discuss the tax bill, and it also appears that due to the nature of the rule under which the bill will be considered it may be difficult to offer amendments.

For this reason, I am making my remarks now in the RECORD in order to present matters connected with the tax bill which I believe to be of the greatest importance right at this time.

INCREASE IN TAXES UNIVERSALLY APPROVED

The people of the United States are apparently almost all agreed that the cost of national-defense expenditures should be met to the very greatest possible extent by current taxation. I doubt that they realize the full extent of what this would really mean but certainly the spirit which prompts people to almost demand taxes is most heartening evidence of a marked resurgence of a fundamental patriotism and quite a different attitude toward our country from that which all too many Americans have recently held.

The general purposes of the tax bill must, therefore, command the support of all; and a Member of the House can hardly vote against the bill without placing himself in the position of not only failing to cooperate in the national-defense effort but also playing the demagogue. I shall, of course, support the bill.

There are a number of most serious questions, however, which present themselves. The first is the wisdom of increasing excise and consumption taxes, particularly at a time when the country is still badly in need of an additional flow of consumer buying power and before the defense program has had a chance to have any influence on the still serious volume of unemployment. In my judgment the effective date for excise- and consumption-tax increases should be postponed until the volume of production in the country has shown a general increase.

The changes proposed to be made in income-tax schedules are, I am convinced, right and should have been made before this. It may well be that the rates in middle and upper brackets should be increased even more than is proposed in view of the need which our Nation clearly faces. It should be observed, however, that these changes will not become effective until next year. And it must be added that since these changes include a broadening of the base and bringing many people of modest income within the income-tax group, certain other types of taxes become even more important if the burden is to be fairly distributed.

EXCESS WAR-PROFITS TAX SHOULD BE INCLUDED

For example, I am utterly unable to understand why an excess-profits tax on profits arising as a result of national-defense expenditures and war trade is not included in the bill. There is no more revolting aspect to war than the contrast between the slaughter of soldiers on the one hand and the reaping of exorbitant profits by a few favored individuals at the expense of this human carnage on the other. Furthermore, American businessmen will not expect anything else of us but that we will lay such excess-profits taxes as will prevent this situation from developing. I have received many letters from businessmen on the subject of taxation and far from opposing excess-profits taxes they express wonder why it has not been done before and why it has not taken precedence over even so logical a move as the lowering of the income-tax exemptions and the raising of the rates.

Furthermore, I find no evidence as yet that it is necessary to bribe American producers to meet the needs of their Nation with profits far in excess of normal healthy profits. I should bitterly resent such an implication if I were one of those producers.

And excess-profits tax, be it remembered, does not apply to normal profits but only to a portion of the profits made in excess of normal profits resulting from war trade.

If this Congress goes home having done nothing to prevent the growth of another crop of war millionaires such as the last war produced our people will have good reason to say to us that we have not done our duty and have failed to provide anything like equality of sacrifice as between different groups and different industries as we all alike face an uncertain future. What will you say to your farmers who have lost their foreign market as a result of the war, or to your people, some of whose necessities of life will be higher in price when they ask you why you asked them to pay—as they are willing and almost eager to do—out of their small incomes, but failed to provide against the grossest inequalities arising as a result of excess profits accruing in future to munitions and allied industries.

TEXT OF H. R. 9513—TO BE OFFERED AS AMENDMENT

I am earnestly in hopes that I will not be prevented by any parliamentary technicality from offering as an amendment to the tax bill the provisions of H. R. 9513, an excess-profits tax bill which I have had before the House in substantially its present form since the first day of the session. This measure has been drawn with greatest care, and would, I am informed by tax experts, raise upward of $500,000,000 of revenue even at present production levels. The text of this amendment follows:

SEC. 2. The Internal Revenue Code is amended by inserting after section 706 the following new subchapter:

"SUBCHAPTER E—WAR EXCESS-PROFITS TAX

"SEC. 750. Normal tax.

"If any corporation is taxable under section 1200 with respect to any year ending June 30, beginning with the year ending June 30, 1940, there shall be imposed upon its net income for the income-tax taxable year ending after the close of such year ending June 30 a war excess-profits tax equal to the sum of the following percentages of such portion of its net income for such income-tax taxable year as is in excess of its base period net income:

"Ten percent of the portion of such net income which exceeds the base period net income by 10 percent or less;

"Twenty-five percent of the portion of such net income which exceeds the base period net income by more than 10 percent but not more than 25 percent;

"Fifty percent of the portion of such net income which exceeds the base period net income by more than 25 percent but not more than 50 percent; and

"Seventy-five percent of the portion of such net income which exceeds the base period net income by more than 50 percent.

"SEC. 751. Exemption.

"The tax imposed by section 750 shall not apply to any corporation whose net income for income-tax purposes for the taxable year is $10,000 or less.

"SEC. 752. Net income.

"For the purposes of this subchapter the net income for the year with respect to which the tax under section 750 is imposed shall be the same as the net income for income-tax purposes minus the sum of—

"(a) Taxes: Federal income, war-profits, and excess-profits taxes paid or accrued during the taxable year, to the extent not allowed as a deduction by section 23, but not including the tax imposed by section 750.

"(b) Dividends received: An amount equal to the credit for dividends received provided in section 26 (b) of chapter 1.

"(c) Amortization for capital expansion: In addition to any amount allowed as a deduction by section 23, a reasonable deduction for the amortization of the cost of buildings, machinery, equipment, or other physical additions to, or improvements of, the corporation's plant or facilities, constructed, erected, or installed, on or after January 1, 1940, to the extent such cost has been actually borne by the corporation.

"(d) General credit: The amount of $10,000.

"SEC. 753. Base period net income.

"(a) General rule: The base period net income shall be an amount equal to the average amount of the corporation's annual net income for three of its income-tax taxable years ending during the calendar years 1935, 1936, 1937, and 1938, respectively, such 3 years to be selected by the corporation, or, if the corporation was not in existence during the whole of each of the calendar years 1935, 1936, 1937, and 1938, the average amount of its annual net income for the income-tax taxable years ending during such of those calendar years the whole of which it was in existence, except that in no case shall the amount of base period net income be less than 5 percent or more than 15 percent of the adjusted-capital investment in the corporation.

"(b) New corporations: If the corporation was not in existence during the whole of any one of the calendar years 1935, 1936, 1937, and 1938, the base period net income shall be an amount equal to 15 percent of the adjusted capital investment in the corporation, unless the corporation was established by merger, consolidation, or succession or similar corporate interests already in existence during any one of the years of the base period, in which case the total net income of such predecessor corporations shall be employed in computing net income of the base period.

"SEC. 754. The adjusted capital investment.

"The adjusted capital investment shall be an amount equal to the aggregate adjusted basis, as defined in section 113, of both the tangible and intangible property of the corporation to the extent that the adjusted basis can be computed as provided in section 113, plus the book value of such property the adjusted basis of which cannot be so computed, minus the fair market value of tax-exempt securities, 85 percent of the fair market value of securities of other corporations owned by the corporation, and the unpaid amount of the corporation's borrowed capital: Provided, however, That in computing the adjusted capital investment, intangible property of the corporation shall not exceed 20 percent of the total and such computation shall be made as of the last day of the preceding income-tax taxable year (or, if the corporation has no preceding income-tax taxable year, as of the date of its organization).

"SEC. 755. Other laws applicable.

"All provisions of law (including penalties) applicable in respect of the tax imposed by chapter 1 shall, insofar as not inconsistent with this subchapter, be applicable in respect to the tax imposed by section 750, except that the provisions of section 131 of that chapter shall not be applicable.

"SEC. 756. Publicity of returns.

"For provisions with respect to publicity of returns under this subchapter, see subsection (a) (2) of section 55.

NATIONAL DEBT LIMIT. HOW ABOUT MONETARY RESOURCES ALREADY IN TREASURY? WHERE IS NATIONAL CREDIT?

It is proposed in this bill, as I understand it, to increase the national debt limit by $4,000,000,000. We must, of course, take whatever methods are available to us to give the country the defense which in this tragic time it needs. But I believe it is, as a matter of fact, unnecessary to increase the public debt and that there are far better and sounder ways, in addition to taxation, of providing funds for national defense. I believe it is wrong for the Government of this great Nation to be compelled to borrow and pay interest on its own national credit—which is precisely what it does when it sells a bond to a bank for a demand deposit on the bank books. Not only do I believe this is wrong but I believe the assertion by Congress of its constitutional right and duty to originally create the money or credit of the Nation is an essential element in true national defense and a matter which must not be too long neglected. If we are to meet the totalitarian challenge, we must not only increase our military defenses but must have our people and our factories at work at full capacity. It is true, of course, that we are nowhere near a danger point as yet with regard to the debt and that we can carry, if we must, a considerably larger debt than we have now. But anyone who has looked twice at the situation and at the probable cost of the national-defense program will know that we cannot expect to sustain this whole effort by an indefinite expansion of interest-bearing public debt.

No thoughtful person will question the statement that the only reason interest-bearing Government bonds are regarded as sound is because their value is sustained by the production of wealth by the people of America and the power of the Government to tax. Then it must be recognized as equally true that United States currency or national credits—or non-interest-bearing bonds, if you prefer—will, if paid directly into circulation, be given value by the production of wealth by the people of America and the power of the Government to tax. And furthermore, the only way inflation can take place in either case is if the total amount of either interest-bearing debt or non-interest-bearing money or national credit is increased more rapidly than production of real goods and services increases.

The only difference is that in one case the interest-bearing public debt increases and in the other case it does not.

If interest-bearing bonds of the United States can constitute a base for expansion of private-bank credit—as they do—then non-interest-bearing bonds of the United States or United States currency can afford a base for an expansion of public credit. It is all a question of whether the private banks or the Government itself is to enjoy the advantage which accrues inevitably to someone every time money or credit is originally created, to be paid for and given value out of future production.

On this point I should like to quote the great English economist, David Ricardo, who in 1824, said this:

> If the view which I have taken of this subject be a correct one, it appears that the commerce of the country would not be in the least impeded by depriving the Bank of England of the power of issuing paper money, provided an amount of such money, equal to the bank circulation, was issued by government; and that the sole effect of depriving the bank of this privilege would be to transfer the profit which accrues from the interest of the money so issued from the bank to government.

Many bills have been introduced which would give to this Nation command of its own credit. I shall not go into them now except to say that the essential step is purchase by the Congress of the capital stock of the 12 central Federal Reserve banks.

And to those who believe there is some virtue still inherent in a metallic reserve, I would only point out that there is now completely idle in the Treasury some $3,500,000,000 of gold and silver and that the $18,000,000,000 Kentucky gold hoard, which now constitutes a 100-percent gold reserve behind the gold certificates and gold-certificate credits which have been given to the Federal Reserve banks could be used—if gold certificates were called in and replaced with currency backed 40 percent by gold—not only for all bank reserves presently held in gold-certificate credits, but also as backing for $27,000,000,000 of Government currency or credit, if issued against a 40-percent gold reserve. And may I point out that Federal Reserve notes today are issued against a 40-percent gold reserve.

So why increase the public debt? Either by use of the metal stocks or by exercising the unrestrained right of Congress to create the money of the Nation an increase in the public debt can be avoided.

My final point would be this. If the public debt is to be increased at all—if we are to depend upon this method for our national-defense effort—then it ought to be increased not $4,000,000,000 but some $25,000,000,000. Every Member of Congress knows that if we are to carry out the kind of national-defense program which has already been outlined and forecast in legislation, it will take at least that much money in the next 5 years.

And the only way to avoid that large an increase in public debt is to take those steps which will put all our unemployed people back to work and increase America's production of wealth to some $100,000,000,000 a year.

We must face one or the other of these two courses of action. Either we must do the things necessary to enable American producers to run their farms and factories at full production without fear that the demand for their products will fail, either we must remove the obstacles to full production including the obstacle of our outworn credit system—or else we must be prepared for an increase in our public debt far larger than anything anyone has yet had the courage to publicly discuss. It is obvious which of these courses offers by far the most certain hope for the successful defense of democracy against the totalitarian threat.

The Party of the "Fifth Column"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

Thursday, June 6, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, each of the two frequently employed terms, "fifth column" and "blackout," like "democracy," has a dual meaning for they are in reality words employed by the sponsors of the "fifth column" to mark progressive disintegration in society and destruction of Christian government.

The people who coined these words actually believe that they possess the power to blackout common sense and scund reasoning in a majority of the American people while their own "fifth column" marches on to establish a democracy, or communistic state, on the ruins of our Republic. They actually believe that they can, by the prodigious use of propaganda, fool us into this war as they swept us into the World War.

The supreme egotism of the internationalists is remarkable, for they actually believe the "fifth columnists" can continue to fool the people as they have the majority in Congress for the past 7 years. This I do not believe they can do, for the American people are beginning to recognize that the internationalists are the real leaders of the "fifth column," in spite of the fact that Congress, and particularly the Senate, is still asleep.

I realize, of course, the composition of Congress today, for many Members were elected to follow, and have hung on to, the President's coattails for 7 years. Yet, I cannot imagine anyone so stupid as to follow him over the precipice to bankruptcy, war, and internal strife.

However, the situation in Congress, and particularly in the Senate, cannot be corrected until the people express themselves, or, to represent them, elect men with strong chins and stiff spines, instead of supplicants with knee pads and nose rings.

My concern, however, is for the people in my State and for the people in other States who do not realize that we are using worthless, inflated money which will collapse under an inescapable inflation that will wreck our currency as it has wrecked the currency of other countries.

My concern is for those who do not realize that Government bonds will be repudiated when we exhaust our national credit, and that we are now moving swiftly toward national bankruptcy.

My anxiety is for those who do not realize that their savings and securities will be as worthless as the German mark that could be bought for a dollar per bushel after inflation wrecked the German monetary system.

I wonder how the people will feel when they realize that the men they elected to Congress to preserve, to protect, and defend their rights passed an act which has made beggars of us, and which will impoverish our grandchildren; an act which has made it impossible for us to protect ourselves except possibly by investing—if we have anything to invest—in real estate, or other similar permanent property; an act by which Congress gave all gold and sound standard money to the international money changers who are guiding the unseen hand of the administration; an act under which we, the people, pay for the transportation, for handling, for storing, and for protecting the gold now stored at Fort Knox, and other places, a property that does not belong to our Government, or to "We, the people," but which belongs instead to a group of private and international bankers.

This is a brief statement of the damage you and I sustained when the men we sent to Congress voted for the Gold Reserve Act, an act which President Roosevelt signed, and which the Supreme Court held constitutional. This act is not only unconstitutional, but is a most flagrant violation of Government obligation to a loyal people, and a bona fide cause for impeachment of the President and those who held this atrocious deception constitutional.

The people have the power to demand that their Representatives file impeachment charges, and that the Senate hear the charges, on the penalty of removal from office, or forceful public reprimand of Congress if it fails in its duty.

Would you say, in view of what has happened to you and to your Government, that all elected and appointed public officials who have deprived you of any part of your property and your full constitutional liberties and rights should not be removed from office? You must furnish the answer, Mr. Citizen, for you are still the power in this Nation; so use it before you lose it.

Do you realize that if every Member since the First Congress had adhered strictly to the Constitution as given to us we would today be the most prosperous and best-governed nation in the world? Do you realize what it would mean to you if Congress had passed only constitutional legislation, or if your President had vetoed all unconstitutional legislation, and if you had been protected by a Supreme Court composed of men who would, without fear or favor, have declared all legislation unconstitutional that did not conform to the most conservative or literal meaning of the Constitution of the United States?

Do you realize that had we always elected such men to office there would be scarcely any laws to be enforced, except a few criminal, nuisance, and other simple corrective measures? In other words, had each and every elective and appointive official done his duty, we would have been a nation composed of a united American people with the same freedom and liberties for each group and individual as the Constitution guaranteed to all the people when it was first ratified.

Do you realize that we, the people, and our national business and industries are crucified on a legal structure which has deprived us of at least 50 percent of the rights and liberties that we reserved to the States and to ourselves in the Constitution, and that we are now on the verge of losing our Government? This, you must bear in mind, has been accomplished not by violence but by enactment of a mass of unnecessary laws, which you should not forget is the procedure employed to bring about persecution of the people and centralized dictatorial governments.

Do you realize that all this, and much more, has happened to you and your Government because the legislative, the executive, and the judiciary departments have willfully ignored and misinterpreted the document that gives you the greatest protection—the Constitution of the United States?

Do you realize that majorities in Congress, Presidents, and Justices of the Supreme Court, who have ignored or misinterpreted the Constitution and upheld unconstitutional acts, are potential members of a "fifth column" which is responsible for the present disintegration and rapid decline of the Government and for the existence of the communistic "fifth column" which is now threatening your very life, liberty, and happiness? It is this internationalistic "fifth column" which dominates the Executive, Members of Congress, and which has crippled and nearly wrecked our courts, so that fair trial is an exception instead of the rule—a domination that has left us with a Justice Department, intelligence units, and law-enforcement officials who pillory loyal citizens and protect the Communist and his financial sponsors who are deliberately engaged in sabotage of industries and destruction of our Government. If you do not know this, take heed, for you are heading for catastrophe.

I can see no way to correct the deplorable situation which confronts us today except for the real Democrats to shed the New Deal and join with the real Republicans in reorganization of a Republican Party to operate under the Constitution of the United States. Such coalition would leave all liberals, radicals, Communists, rubber stamps, coattail riders, New

Dealers, and the rest of the "fifth columnists" with their financial sugar daddies who dominate both major parties, and other riffraff, in one un-American party, which could be labeled "The Party of the Fifth Column." I can see very little difference between these different groups, for all of them are set to liberalize the Constitution and anyone who engages in such change, except as set forth in the Constitution itself, can only be considered an enemy of the United States. This places him in the "fifth column."

It should be clear to all that were we a Nation composed of a people who believed in the fundamental principles of this Republic as set forth in the Constitution, we could be nothing but a united, patriotic people. The fact that we have had, and have now, persons among us who disparage or ignore the Constitution should be evidence in itself that our Government has been too lax in its own obligated duty to the people of this Nation, and in the enforcement of the Constitution itself. To look for a "fifth column" as the American warmongers and ballyhoo men are now doing is, if nothing else, ridiculous, because the biggest "fifth column" is the Communist Party, its fellow travelers and transmission belts. They are the most virulent enemies of the United States, and may be so accepted by the statements they make in their own press.

It should be clear, even to the dumbest new dealer, that there is only a degree of difference between a real Socialist and a Communist. As a matter of fact, the only difference is that the Communist is a specially trained Socialist. It should also be clear to the administration and to the Justice Department that the American people cannot be fooled much longer, for they realize now that the New Deal and the Russian deal are just about the same. Both of these deals are controlled by the same type of people in governmental, social, economic, and financial life.

Let us now suppose that the rehabilitated Republican Party should be fortunate enough to select a Presidential candidate who actually and sincerely believes in the fundamental principles of this Republic as it was given to us by the founders of our country. Would he be supported by the people of this Nation? My personal opinion is that he would receive the support of every loyal American citizen who has his own interests and this Nation's interests at heart. To prevent catastrophe and general collapse of the Government will require the utmost cooperation among those who have the interests of the Government at heart. It should be clear that such cooperation has not existed in the past or, as a matter of fact, for over 30 years. This deplorable state of affairs is largely due to the fact that Congress has failed to function as the leading, the regulatory, and the only branch of the Government to which people have delegated power to act for them.

The next President should, when Congress meets in the first joint session, request that he be divested of all extra-constitutional power which Congress has granted to the executive department over a number of years. He should request that all powers except those given to him in article II of the Constitution be repealed so that they may be restored to Congress, the branch of the Government from which these powers were unlawfully transferred. He should also request Congress to repeal all legislation which is in conflict with the Constitution and under which the people have been deprived of property and other rights which they reserve to the States and to themselves in the ninth and tenth amendments. He should request Congress to repeal all legislation which has launched the Government in the field of private industry, in competition with the people themselves. Many of these organizations are now operating as private corporations under the charters of the District of Columbia, the States of Delaware and Maryland, and probably other States as well. There are so many of these organizations that it is difficult to keep track of them. As a matter of fact, I believe they are even forgotten by Congress itself.

It should be clear to the Members of Congress that we have not the power under the Constitution to create such organizations, for such rights and privileges are reserved by the people to themselves so that they can establish sufficient earnings and pay for the administration of this Government in the future as they did before the New Deal unfortuniately slid into office.

The new President should suggest that Congress repeal our banking acts, for they were drafted by our enemies in order to deprive our own people of standard international secured monetary protection for their investments. The most contemptible of these acts are the Federal Reserve Act of 1913 and the Gold Reserve Act of 1934. It was the Federal Reserve Act that made the Gold Reserve Act possible, and it was the un-American majority in Congress that enacted this legislation which has deprived the people who elected them to office of their own personal property—gold.

The new President should request the State governments to assume their proper function under the Constitution of the United States. This would restore balance and permit the States representation in the Government of the United States. He should assure industries, business, and labor that they would be free to operate and enjoy the liberties and rights which they reserved to the States and to themselves in the Constitution. He should assure the industrialists and business people of this Nation that the Government has erred in its prosecution and persecution of the people who have toiled and slaved to make this Nation what it is today. If this is not done, the people no doubt will themselves step forth in the protection of their own rights in order to protect their homes and the security of this Nation.

Government investigation, regulation, and prosecution of criminals is lawful, but when the "fifth column" is allowed to operate free and under the benevolent protection of the New Deal, as it has for the past 7 years, one cannot but wonder what the final outcome will be.

The new Republican President should assure the farming industries of this Nation of the right to supply our own home markets and the American people with food. No one, I believe, will disagree with this statement, for if the Government deprives our own farm industries of their normal markets, the Government destroys farm industries and jeopardizes our national security in leaving our people dependent upon foreign production for the vital necessities that should be developed and produced in the United States.

It is my firm belief that the Government should not allow the prices on farm commodities to be set in the grain pits and the stock markets of financial centers. Farm production should be treated like other production so that farmer-businessmen may be assured of a price that will furnish them incomes comparable to the incomes of other industries. The Government should not allow the farmers of this Nation to be crucified by fanatical gamblers, nor permit the prices of commodities to be regulated by these people who have made fortunes on the farmers and on farm and food production.

The new President should ask Congress to repeal all emergency legislation, for we have never been confronted with an emergency and are not now faced with any emergency except the New Deal, which is in reality a calamity. The greatest emergency of any which confronts our people today is to get rid of the New Deal, for it is patterned upon that of Russia and is supported by the Communist Party. This should be clear, for Mr. Browder and his communistic associates have boldly proclaimed in their own books that they are heart and soul behind the New Deal leader and his party. This should be sufficient evidence to anyone of intelligence that the Communist Party and the New Deal are identical—the real destructive "fifth column" in the United States.

Troubled Days Ahead

OF
HON. EDWARD H. REES
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, June 10, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD I want to include a timely editorial that appeared in the Washington Daily News on last Saturday, June 8. I think the views expressed in this editorial are entitled to the consideration of the Members of this Congress. I just do not think it is quite fair to the people of this country for the membership of Congress to quit and go home during the present crisis. As a matter of fact, I cannot understand why the President would want Congress to adjourn. It seems to me that in view of the perplexing problems confronting our Government he should want Congress not only to remain in session but want the Members of Congress to share the responsibility of making decisions that are vital to the American people.

[From the Washington Daily News of June 8, 1940]

TROUBLED DAYS AHEAD

Certain happenings in Washington in the last few days might well contribute to public uneasiness at this crucial time.

There is, first of all, the drive of administration leaders to persuade Congress to finish its business and get out of town in 2 weeks. The proposed dead line is June 22. It is pointed out that the Republican National Convention will open at Philadelphia 2 days thereafter. That might justify a recess, but not adjournment.

The men who operate the Government's executive branch doubtless feel that they could cope more skillfully with the emergencies that arise if unhindered by the conflicting counsel and restraints of the legislative branch. And maybe they could. But that is not the democratic, representative process under which our Government is supposed to function.

In more comfortable days the President would have earned a laugh by his press-conference remark that Congress could serve no purpose by staying in session except to make speeches. But laughs have been coming hard in the last few weeks, and the future hardly offers a jocular countenance.

Even with Congress in Washington, the executive branch has been putting some policies into effect without legislative concurrence.

The surprise arrangement by which Army and Navy planes were made available to the Allies, for instance, was accomplished by dusting off an old law permitting the Government to turn planes back to the factory as a sort of down payment on new models. The factory then, also acting legally, resells the planes to the Allies.

Maybe that was the wise thing to do. The only point made here is that it was done without the knowledge or consent of Congress—and while Congress was in session. Moreover, it was done at a time when Congress, after several days' urging, had failed to give its sanction to the Pepper resolution authorizing the Government to make direct sales of weapons to the Allies. One can't help wondering what things might be done with Congress gone home.

In the weeks and months ahead the Government will have to make some difficult and vital decisions, and make them in the swirl of unpredictable events. The public will be more confident in those decisions if it knows they represent the composite judgment of all Government officials who are responsible to the people.

The President and his subordinates in the executive branch are not the only ones the people hire by the year.

The Line of Demarcation Between the Eastern and Western Hemispheres

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, June 10, 1940

LETTER FROM THE GEOGRAPHER OF THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE

Mrs ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following very interesting letter from the Geographer of the Department of State:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 8, 1940.

The Honorable EDITH NOURSE ROGERS,
House of Representatives.

MADAM: Your letter of June 4, 1940, is received in which you request a definition of the line of demarcation between the Eastern and Western Hemispheres.

There are certain types of hemispheres that are precisely defined, and there are other hemispheres which do not have specific limits. As will be explained below, the Eastern and Western Hemispheres belong to this latter category.

The Northern and Southern Hemispheres are exact concepts. The Northern Hemisphere comprises exactly one-half of the area of the earth, in which the North Pole is at the center. The Equator constitutes the exact line of demarcation between the Northern and Southern Hemispheres, since by definition the Equator is the line which is equidistant from the north and south poles of the axis of rotation of the earth.

A hemisphere in which the Capitol dome in Washington is the exact center is another precise hemisphere. The outer limit is a great circle on the earth's surface which is an oblique line passing north of the equator on one side and an equal distance south of the equator on the other. The Navy Department publishes charts of this character, one with Washington as the center and another with San Francisco as the center, showing the distances from the central points and the great-circle courses from the central point to all parts of the world. On each of these charts, which are useful in connection with radio bearings, an exact hemisphere may readily be indicated. An infinite number of such hemispheres may be defined exactly, each with a specific central point, such as the State House in Boston or the Eiffel Tower in Paris.

None of these hemispheres which are precisely defined take account of the distribution of land and water on the surface of the earth. They are simple geometrical hemispheres. When it comes to defining geographical hemispheres in which land and water distributions are involved the problem becomes essentially different. Nature's disposition of land and water areas follows, of course, no simple geometrical pattern, and there is usually no single mathematical hemisphere which exactly corresponds to any particular idea which is entertained. Moreover, nature does not provide sharp boundaries, such as man devises for property fences and national frontiers.

The geographical concept of a land hemisphere and a water hemisphere, so demarcated as to place in the first the maximum area of land surface which is above sea level and in the second the maximum area of oceans and seas, illustrates the difficulties of exact delimitation. By painstaking computation a land hemisphere may be determined, closely approximating the maximum land area. The center of the land hemisphere is in western Europe somewhere in the vicinity of Berlin. Within a radius equal to one-fourth of the earth's circumference, measured from that center, lie all of Europe, Africa, continental Asia, North America, and the greater part of South America. This geographical concept of land and water hemispheres is useful, in spite of the fact that published maps of these two hemispheres differ slightly in delimitation.

The demarcation of the Eastern and Western Hemispheres is even more difficult, because it involves both the distribution of land and water and historical considerations. The question at once arises, east or west of what? The Western Hemisphere is the New World which Columbus discovered by sailing west. By the Eastern Hemisphere we mean essentially the Old World, comprising Europe, Asia, and Africa; and by the Western Hemisphere we mean the American continents and appertaining islands. The continental areas of the Old World and the New World are very unequal, however, and the longitudinal extent of Africa and Eurasia is nearly 208°, which is 28° in excess of half the circumference of the equator. No simple pair of meridians 180° apart can therefore be selected which will place all of Africa and Asia within the same hemisphere—although by common consent they are regarded as belonging within the Eastern Hemisphere.

The necessity of precise demarcation of the Eastern and Western Hemispheres chiefly concerns cartographers rather than geographers or political scientists. Two hemispheres, exactly equal in area, are usually mapped within two circles. Map makers begin by selecting a meridian in the Atlantic Ocean somewhere between Africa and South America, which bears a simple relationship in the number of degrees of longitude east or west of the prime meridian which they prefer to use, and which serves their purpose best with reference to Greenland, Iceland, and other islands in the North Atlantic Ocean.

Within the last century the meridian of Greenwich has been increasingly used as the prime meridian in various countries, and map makers who use Greenwich as the zero meridian usually take the meridian 20° west of Greenwich at their line of demarcation in the Atlantic Ocean. In order to make a map of the Eastern or Western Hemisphere, comprising exactly one-half of the area of the earth, cartographers must therefore take the opposite meridian, namely, 160° east of Greenwich. In the Atlantic Ocean the meridian 20° west of Greenwich serves remarkably well, as it places all of Greenland, except a very small area in the northeast, within the Western Hemisphere, and the larger part of Iceland within the Eastern Hemisphere. It has the minor disadvantage of placing the Azores and the Cape Verde Islands in the Western Hemisphere, contrary to their historical association with the Old World. In the Pacific Ocean, however, the meridian 160° east of Greenwich is anomalous in that it places New Zealand in the Western Hemisphere (whereas Australia is in the Eastern Hemisphere), and that it places the eastern portion of Siberia in the Western Hemisphere.

Many map makers, however, use zero meridians other than that of Greenwich. For example, the meridian of Ferro, the westernmost of the Canary Islands, was adopted at a scientific conference in Paris in 1630, as the prime meridian. The meridian of Ferro, subsequently found to be almost 20° west of Paris, or approximately 17°40′ west of Greenwich, has been used very widely and has been employed on maps published in Germany, Austria, and Yugoslavia even within the last 20 years. French maps of the Eastern and Western Hemispheres today frequently use the meridians 20° west of Paris and 160° east of Paris as the line of demarcation between the hemispheres.

Although maps of these two hemispheres differ slightly in their limiting meridians, depending partly upon the selection of a zero meridian, they almost invariably agree in placing all of Europe and Africa and most of Asia in the Eastern Hemisphere, and all of the American continents in the Western Hemisphere.

Your interest in a line of demarcation between these two hemispheres is related, in part, if I understand correctly, to an interpretation of the policy which was enunciated by President Monroe in his message to the Congress on December 2, 1823. In that message, as you will recall, reference was made to "the American continents," to "this hemisphere" (mentioned twice), to "either continent" (North America and South America), and to "their fellow men on that side of the Atlantic." This geographical concept evidently related to the New World as distinguished from the Old World, and there appears to have been no thought at that time of laying down a pair of meridians, placed diametrically opposite each other, on one side of which one policy was to be followed and on the other side of which an entirely different policy was to be followed.

Except for purposes of making maps comprising exactly one-half of the earth's surface, it therefore seems better to regard this hemisphere in which we live, in relation to the land areas of the world, as comprising North America (including Central America and the West Indies, and also Greenland) and South America, together with all islands appertaining to the two continents. In order to include the westernmost islands of the Territory of Alaska and to embrace an area roughly approximating one-half of the earth's surface, it is necessary to include a considerable portion of the Pacific Ocean. For convenience the international date line might be regarded as a provisional western limit of this hemisphere. The vast areas of the high seas in both the Atlantic and the Pacific have no bearing upon the practical problem of delimiting the hemispheres, except as it affects the map maker. Otherwise we are concerned only with land areas—with continents and islands, large and small.

There is no dispute regarding the continents and related islands which are embraced within the Western Hemisphere. The limits of the conventional hemisphere of the map makers differ but slightly, depending largely upon the zero or prime meridian on which the map is constructed. The geographical or historical Western Hemisphere is not quite so extensive, and its limits are defined neither by Nature nor by common agreement.

Very sincerly yours,

S. W. BOGGS, Geographer.

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 10, 1940

LETTER FROM HON. AMOS PINCHOT

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following open letter from Hon. Amos Pinchot:

NEW YORK CITY, May 20, 1940.

The Honorable FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,

The White House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: In view of the fact that an effort is being made to break down, presumably with your consent, the anti-third-term tradition—that is to say, the tradition that no man shall be allowed to exercise the powers of the Presidency for more than 8 consecutive years—I am taking the liberty of writing you this letter.

For, occupied as you have been, and indeed overtaxed by the duties and responsibilities of your office, it is possible that you have not taken time to consider the probable effect of the third-term drive, not primarily on yourself or your party, but on the country and the character and direction of American political thought. For, in the last analysis, it is the people's thinking that will shape the country's future.

Abraham Lincoln, in a little-quoted passage in his first inaugural, said:

"The Chief Magistrate derives all his authority from the people * * *" who have "wisely given their public servants but little power for mischief; and have, with equal wisdom, provided for the return of that little to their hands at very short intervals."

And perhaps he would have spoken more strongly had he known that in the next three-quarters of a century the President's authority would be so enlarged—by statutes, by job and money patronage, and by an overgrown Federal bureaucracy, extending its control to State and city politics in every section—that today any man who has served two terms in the White House and wants a third can override opposition and make himself his party's candidate.

Mr. President, if you renominate yourself, for that is what it amounts to, your party will have to fight in the coming campaign on three vital and essentially related issues. They are vital and they are related because they raise the question, What are the proper limits of the authority of the President of the United States?

These issues will be (a) the immense powers you have already gained and the far greater powers you tried to secure in 1937 and 1938 through a series of bills which, if passed, would have given you the full authority of a dictator; (b) your attitude toward America's involvement in the war; and (c) your desire to break down the anti-third-term tradition and become the first American to remain in the White House for 12 years in a row.

I am not a Democrat. And I am not writing this letter out of any wish to see your administration avoid errors that might insure its defeat next fall. On the contrary, I believe it has been in too long and become too strong. And, though it did many needed and beneficial things in your first term, your second term has tragically failed as an instrument of recovery, progress, and reemployment. It has left unsolved every serious national problem. And it is evident that a change is required.

But what seems to stand out as clear and important in the situation is this: Any party that goes before the people in a Nation-wide effort to convince them that the President should be armed with the sort of powers that were provided in the bills referred to will be doing a major disservice. For it will be defending a legislative program which, had it not been defeated, would have assured a puppet Congress, a puppet Court, a puppet press, and a Government-controlled economic system to be steered, allowed to go ahead, or hauled back like a toy boat sailing in a pond at the end of a string.

Later on I will raise the question whether this country should or should not enter the European war. Obviously it is a question on which everyone is entitled to his own opinion. But at this point it may be said that, in your handling of foreign relations, you have gone far toward laying down the proposition that you, instead of Congress, should have authority to make the choice between war and peace. More than that, while you have frequently declared your preference for peace, in a more or less perfunctory manner, you have followed up such declarations by making almost every argument that might justify our entry into the war.

No political party in this democracy can afford to defend the doctrine that the President shall decide the issue of war and peace, any more than any party can go to the people on the proposition involved in your third-term drive, namely, that your presence in the White House indefinitely is indispensable. And, Mr. President, if the Democratic Party does defend these propositions—and it will have to if you are its candidate—it will be turning American thinking away from democracy, away from peace, and away from the basic ideas of life and government that have nourished and sustained our Commonwealth for a century and a half.

I. YOUR 1937 AND 1938 BILLS

Space forbids a discussion of the expansion of Presidential authority which you have actually accomplished from 1933 to the spring of 1937. This was the period in which a subservient Congress, in the name of emergency, gave you practically every power you asked for over agriculture, industry, business, foreign relations, taxation, and the spending of the public funds. And the results are sufficiently evidenced by the country's present condition.

But I would like to refer, at some length, to the powers which were embodied in the White House bills proposed by yourself and your advisers, and defeated in 1937 and 1938. For in these measures we have an authentic, unchallengeable record of your intentions on the subject of concentrating power in the President's hands. Consequently, in order to make clear, in brief form, the purpose and meaning of these measures, I have gathered together some of their more significant provisions, and have redrafted and condensed them into a single measure, using simple and untechnical language.

And here I would like to emphasize the fact that there is no provision or even implication in this condensed measure, which, for convenience, we will call the Presidential powers bill, that is not found in the bills they are condensed from. And I may add that, if you will show me any provision in my bill which, in substance, is not found in your bills, I will be glad to send you my check for $1,000, to be donated to any charity you may select.

"A bill to authorize the President to enlarge the powers of the Presidency in peace and war; to control Congress; regulate industry; censor the press and radio; guide constitutional decisions of the Supreme Court; and for other purposes.

"Title I. Reorganization of the executive branch of the Government

"SECTION 1. The President is hereby authorized (a) to change the name and functions of the office of President, or (b) to abolish that office and set up another in its place.

"SEC. 2. The President is authorized (a) to change the name and functions of the executive departments, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, the Federal Reserve Board, the National Labor Relations Board, and all other agencies and offices in the executive branch of the Government; or

"(b) to abolish them.

"SEC. 3. The President is authorized to nullify and prevent the enforcement of laws passed by Congress by abolishing any or all agencies set up by Congress to enforce its laws.

"Title II. Control of industry

"SECTION 1. The President, acting through a Board of five persons, appointed by and responsible to himself, is authorized to establish a standard minimum wage not to exceed $1,200 a year—except as hereinafter provided, and a workweek of whatever hours the Board may decide to be fair.

"SEC. 2. (a) The President's Board may at any time set aside the standard wage and fair workweek established in accordance with section 1, for any industry, class of industries, or individual concern, and fix whatever wages and hours it may see fit.

"(b) The President's Board may thereafter change hours and wages as often as it may see fit.

"(c) The President's Board may require any employer to establish, in addition to fair wages and hours, whatever other labor conditions it may see fit.

"SEC. 3. The President's Board may cancel agreements between employers and employees arrived at through collective bargaining, if and when it decides that the facilities for collective bargaining are ineffective.

"SEC. 4. Violation of any provision of this section shall be punishable by a fine not to exceed $500, or imprisonment for not more than 6 months, or both. Each employment of a person in violation of this title shall be considered a separate offense. (Example: A publisher or broadcaster employing 1,000 person in violation of this act would be punishable by a fine not to exceed $500,000, or imprisonment not to exceed 500 years, or both.)

"Title III. Control of the press and radio

"SECTION 1. The provisions in title II, giving the President authority to change wages, hours, and other labor conditions, at discretion, shall apply to the newspaper and radio industries, to the end that the President shall be empowered to discriminate against or discipline any newspaper or broadcasting company whose policies do not coincide with those of his administration.

"SEC. 2. Anyone who publishes and transports across State lines, or through the mails, any material known by such publisher to be false, shall, upon conviction, be barred from the use of the mails for 6 months, and shall be fined not less than $1,000, and imprisoned for not more than 2 years.

"SEC. 3. The question whether such material was false and whether the publisher knew it to be so shall be decided by an appropriate authority.

"Title IV. Government contracts

"SECTION 1. The President, acting through the Secretary of Labor, is hereby authorized to blacklist, at his discretion, and render ineligible for Government contracts for a period of 3 years, any contractor whom the National Labor Relations Board shall report (but need not prove) to have engaged in an unfair labor practice.

"Title V. War powers of the President

"SECTION 1. Upon a declaration of war by the United States against any nation, large or small, the President is hereby authorized:

"(a) to fix, by proclamation, and to adjust, and readjust, at any time, upward or downward, at his discretion, the maximum price at which any article or product or any property or right or interest in property may be bought, sold, leased, or contracted for, whether such articles, products, property, etc., shall relate to war or not.

"(b) to fix, by proclamation, and to adjust, and readjust, upward or downward, at discretion, the maximum wage, compensation, or contract price of all labor and services, whether such labor and services shall relate to war or not.

"SEC. 2. By virtue of the authority granted to the President in the foregoing section, to fix and change at will, and without limit, the maximum prices and compensations for articles, products, and services (which includes the price of newspapers, periodicals, print paper, etc., and the compensation for advertising, entertainment, and other services) the President is empowered to censor the publishing and broadcasting industries, and, if need be, to make unprofitable any newspaper or broadcasting company which refuses to follow the instructions of the White House.

"Title VI. Reorganization of the Supreme Court

"Whereas certain provisions of this or other acts of Congress, enlarging the President's powers over Congress, business, agriculture, and other phases of American life, might be held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States, the President is hereby authorized to add to that Court six new Justices of his own choosing."

I repeat that, incredible as it may seem, each and every power in the foregoing bill is taken from actual bills sponsored by yourself or your advisers in the period referred to. And the fact that they did not shock the country, even more than was the case, was mainly due to two circumstances. In the first place, the bills were introduced at intervals, so that their force and meaning was never fully grasped by the people; in the second place, they were radically altered by congressional committees before they were given publicity.

For example, the power provided in the condensed bill to change the name and functions of the Presidency, or abolish that office and set up another in its place, is found in the typewritten White House draft of the reorganization bill dated February 16, 1937, in titles I and V, and also in the revised draft of February 22, but not in the drafts debated on the floor of Congress. Both of the original drafts were made after consultation with you by means chosen and paid by you for the purpose.

Likewise the highly coercive power to change and rechange, without limitation, wages, hours, and other labor conditions in the publishing, broadcasting, and other industries, was given you in the original Black-Connery bill, introduced by Senator Hugo L. Black, now Supreme Court Justice, on May 24, 1937. And the same is true of the other powers granted you in the condensed bill. Talk about economic royalists! These bills would have established an economic, plus a political, royalism such as was never before contemplated in a free country.

Also it should be noted that the bulk of these bills made their appearance under misleading declarations of purpose. The court-packing bill was offered to the country as a more or less routine measure designed to lighten the labors of Federal justices. The Black-Connery bill, which would have set up an executive dictatorship over capital and labor, was introduced as a mere wages-and-hours measure. As I remember, you referred to it as a bill "to put a few dollars in a poor devil's pay envelope at the end of the week."

The reorganization bill sailed under the colors of an efficiency measure, and was preceded by a message from the White House stating categorically that it would not increase the President's power. While the war-powers bill was printed under the reassuring caption, "A bill to prevent profiteering in time of war and to equalize the burdens of war and thus provide for the national defense, and promote peace."

Mr. President, your lost battalion of bills was a political and economic monstrosity. It was a reduction to legislative form of a dream of unrestrained executive ambition, a dream which, unfortunately, was more than a dream, and which still persists, as shown by the unceasing efforts of your administration to strip Congress of its constitutional functions, and vest in the Executive more and more power over the economic and political organization of the country. It is evident that, had these bills been enacted, they would have put this country on the path, not of creeping socialism, but of galloping collectivism and dictatorship. And it seems equally evident that they were drafted by men who, having lost interest in the American way of doing things, were going on the principle that the only good democracy is dead democracy, and that the Constitution is a fine thing to praise, but a better thing to maim or destroy.

II. FOREIGN RELATIONS

So much for the issue that would be raised, should you seek a third term, by your program of 1937 and 1938, and your continuing desire to acquire authority at the expense of the legislative and judicial branches of the Government. Now let us turn, for a moment, to foreign relations. For here again it would seem that no party would be justified in asking the American electorate to accept certain propositions which you have laid down.

In the opinion of experts of good standing, the worst thing that could happen to England and France would be for the United States to become physically involved in the war. For this would necessarily divert our natural and industrial resources from the Allies. Our entry would mean that our productive energy would be required to strengthen our sadly lacking and obsolete Military Establishment. The job of suddenly putting this country on a war footing would be an enormous one. The Allies do not need manpower. They need all the planes and various other kinds of equipment we can furnish, and more.

Unfortunately, though the New Deal has seen the European war coming since 1937, it has been as impractical and inefficient in military matters as in the matter of recovery. It has spent 7 billions. It has talked a great deal about modernizing our system of defense, just as it has talked about balancing the budget, restoring employment and farm incomes, and carrying on a large housing program. But it has done exceedingly little. And now, at the end of 8 years, with war sweeping the world, we have no Army to speak of, a very small air force, inadequate coast defenses, practically no antiaircraft guns, and a paralyzing public debt which will make adequate military preparations possible only at the cost of a serious sacrifice in the standard of living.

For 7 years, under your leadership and that of the Brain Trust, your administration has been carrying on an economic war against depression. And the results have not been gratifying. For there has been little coordination or effective administration, less foresight and consistent planning, and no steady application of horse sense. And the question arises: Under the same kind of leadership could a military war be effectively waged? No, Mr. President, if we want to help the Allies—and 9 Americans out of 10 do—common sense demands that this country shall stay at peace; that it shall keep its shirt on and not be rushed across the ocean into ill-considered adventures in Europe or Asia, where we cannot fight effectively in any case.

And yet, you have moved steadily to a position far beyond that authorized by Congress and approved by the American people—namely, that of aiding the Allies by making our industrial output available to them. Indeed, your administration has advanced to a point where, with one foot in the war and the other in the air, it should be comparatively easy for it to throw this country irrevocably into the conflict.

A little over a year ago, your personal representative in Paris made an address, in the presence of high French officials, which, if less than a promise, was more than a hint that America would fight for France, should war occur. Less than 2 months later, you yourself publicly recorded your belief that, in case of war, America's "physical involvement" would become a "virtual certainty."

In the recently published American White Paper—which must be taken as authorized since you have publicly recommended it, and it was compiled with the help of at least one member of your official family, and with access to official files—it is stated that, in conversations with the Attorney General and the Secretary and Under-Secretary of State, you have taken the stand that, while you will not send an expeditionary force across the ocean, you might be willing to send our Navy and air forces.

A week ago, in your speech before the Eighth American Scientific Congress, you again expressed an intention to keep the country at peace. Nevertheless, almost in the same breath, you all but declared war on Germany. And dramatically, in an appeal to fear, you restated the arguments for armed intervention. Last Monday, Secretary Hull, in an address of mysterious meaning, before the American Society of International Law, seemed to say, but did not quite say, that we ought to intervene in an effort "to keep alive in the world the principle of order under law."

What do such statements mean, Mr. President? Why this mystery? Why this facility in never quite saying it? I have been convinced for a long time that you sincerely believe that this country ought to enter the war, and that, if you are reelected, you will move rapidly in that direction. But, in any case, your statements indicate a misconception of the scope and functions of the Presidency and, one may add, an overlooking of the fact that the decision between war and peace must, under our Constitution, be made not by yourself but by Congress, in the light of future circumstances, if and when the occasion arises.

In short, your position seems prematurely taken and more prematurely spoken, and inconsistent with your expressed resolve to prevent a black-out of peace. And, what is more, it comes near to laying down the proposition that, when the people elect a President, they give, in advance, to a single individual, a mandate to commit 130,000,000 people to war, and all that war means.

Again, an analysis of the utterances of various administration leaders—Secretary Ickes, Senator Pittman, Under Secretary Welles, et cetera—since the third term drive began in 1937, reveals an intemperate and inflammatory quality better suited to create international friction and hatred, and a war psychology in our country, than to keep America in such a relation to Europe that, conceivably, it might act as a mediator to bring the present unspeakable disaster to a close.

One does not question the sincerity of these and others among your advisers. In fact, it is their sincerity that makes them dangerous. But it is possible that their judgment may have been influenced by the consideration that only through an expectancy of war or war itself can the feeling against the third term be overcome, and they themselves be assured the opportunity to continue their usefulness to the country in an official capacity.

Nothing can exceed the horror with which public opinion in the United States regards the savage and inhuman course of Adolf Hitler and his government. Yet what is to be gained by continually shaking one's fist at him across the Atlantic Ocean, or by the endless stream of threats and invective that flows eastward out of Washington? Certainly it has had no tendency either to help the Allies or to check or embarrass Hitler? In Germany it has probably strengthened Hitler's hold on his people. In America it has undoubtedly excited the public, clouded its judgment, and increased the likelihood of our being drawn into war.

Despite the so-called American liberals who have found pleasure and profit in running down the United States, we have a great country. On the whole, it is a generous and enlightened country and a tolerant one. It has made mistakes and will make others, plenty of them. But in the long account it has developed a higher degree of freedom and opportunity than has been found in other nations. And this should not be sacrificed in a rash and barren excursion into a war which would help no one, a war for which we are unprepared, a war that might destroy millions of our young people and at the same time tear down what we have built in seven generations of effort.

The American people, Mr. President, have done a good deal for themselves in 150 years, which, after all, is but a tick of time in the world's history. Likewise, they have done a good deal for humanity. And the possibilities of the future are larger and finer than the accomplishments of the past. And of one thing they may be certain in this time of uncertainty. They should continue on the path of peace and democracy which they have followed, faithfully, in the main, and kneel at their own and no other altars.

Sincerely yours,

AMOS PINCHOT.

War Propaganda—Citizenship Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RUSH D. HOLT

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESSES BY HON. RUSH D. HOLT, OF WEST VIRGINIA

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two addresses delivered by me, as well as a series of articles entitled "Twenty-five Years Ago." One of the addresses was delivered by me at the second annual Citizenship Day celebration in New York City. This meeting was sponsored by the New York Journal-American.

It is with much pleasure that I note the growth of the movement to celebrate Citizenship Day, and I personally consider it a privilege to have spoken to this meeting in New York in 1939, as well as 1940.

I shall furnish the articles for printing in the RECORD at a later date.

There being no objection, the addresses were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. RUSH D. HOLT ON JUNE 1, 1940

No one likes to be a sucker, but it is far worse to be a sucker after one has been told how he is to be fooled.

We were told how we were to be propagandized for our participation in war and the blueprint is being followed.

There is no need for pussyfooting in this crisis. Patriotism calls for plain talk. There is a drive to take us into the European war. The original moves were secret, but now it is too plain to hide. I have been told that the propaganda directors are surprised at the rapid change in sentiment. However, I am not one who believes there has been such a change of sentiment as the papers, lecturers, Government officials, and radio commentators indicate. I know there has been some change, but as yet the great majority of the American people are not willing to get into this war. The situation is that some of the timid have gotten brave. They will allow themselves to be quoted in the newspapers. Some speakers who desire our participation, even though they have not as yet gone far enough to say so openly, were the same individuals who were quietly talking in the clubrooms and to their friends about how the isolation sentiment was breaking down. They did so on the quiet before, but now they are doing so from the lecture platforms and before luncheon clubs. Government officials have shaded their words to a more active intervention in the conflict. They are playing safe by wanting to get into this war only part of the way.

These are the same individuals who asked for the amending of the neutrality law in order that we would remain neutral, or that is what they said. Some of us said then that they were not interested in amending the bill to be neutral, but that it was a guise to get part way in. Now, they want to get a little further. Tomorrow they will want a declaration of war.

With all of this organized move, the cause of peace is not lost. If the people of this country will remain calm and not be swept off their feet, we will stay out. The great danger in this battle for peace is that those who want to stay out are not organized, while those who are pressing for our entrance are not only organized but organized well. Those who want to stay out are not financed, but those who want to get us in are not only financed but financed well. Certain newspapers are active for intervention in the war. Did you ever check the background, the former employment, the record of some of these well-known "impartial" commentators? It will not only be interesting but startling.

What did I mean when I said, "We were told we were to be propagandized"? Let me explain.

I shall quote from an English authority, Sidney Rogerson, who wrote a book on this subject, not for American consumption but as a part of a series for England.

Let me quote: "Our main plank (of propaganda) will be the old democratic one." Now, just think a moment of the speeches you have heard about this war, think of the articles you have read and you will immediately see the main plank was just that. Recall how the king, a monarch, talks about democracy as his speech comes to American homes by way of radio? Remember how the sirs, lords, dukes, and others appeal for us to help democracy?

Let me quote again: "We shall as before send over our leading literary lights and other men with names well known in the United States to put our point of view over the dinner table." Recall the visit of Duff Cooper, his lectures at good-sized fees over the country, and how he assured us that he was not interested in getting us in. Today he is directing the ministry of propaganda. His visit to our country was good experience for him as to the propaganda to be used. Others, such as Anthony Eden, the King and Queen, to cite a couple, are easily remembered. The English Embassy has held such a party, and as a Washington newspaper states, and I quote, "Subscribers for last evening's benefit were carefully chosen before being invited to pay their $10," and so they were. Leaders in our public life were there to get a good dose of war propaganda, sugar-coated with tea and music.

Again quoting from the propaganda plan: "We should exploit the views and experiences of American nationals who might be serving in our forces or those of our Allies. We should make much of them, decorate them, single them out for mention in dispatches, and in the press, and use their stories as propaganda material to their own people."

May I recall for you the amount of space given to the service of Nicholas Roosevelt who advocates our more active intervention? Others could be mentioned, but time does not permit.

Remember the stories of Anne Morgan, the sister of the international J. Pierpont Morgan, who made millions out of the last war? Recall her stories of atrocities?

This is the same Miss Morgan who came to Washington and held a dinner at a most fashionable Washington hotel, serving a French peasant menu. A society column said, and I quote: "A wave of enthusiasm to help fighting democracies in general, and France in particular, rippled through the crowded room. * * * Many in the gathering recalled in whispered comments that similar meetings were the order of the day in the last war when Miss Morgan's Committee of Civilians for the French Wounded was working at top speed, and afterward, when her Committee for Devastated France began its work."

You see that Miss Morgan, and again I note she is the sister of the banker, J. Pierpont Morgan, who made millions out of the last war, is not new at the game of drumming up war spirit; and may I add to those not familiar with the Washington scene, the use of social activities for propaganda is one of the most effective ways of getting what the propagandists call "the proper people"?

I quote again on the blueprint of our being made suckers, newsreel men "should be the first to be allowed to 'shoot' pictures of air raids in order that a proper volume of pictorial horror will be available in one of the few great countries where atrocity propaganda will still be operative."

We have been saturated with this type of pictures. People will gasp when they see the pictures and say, "Isn't it terrible?" No one questions how terrible, but we should think clear through to know that our entrance into the war shall give us the experience of realizing that our own sons, husbands, and friends would be in just such a terrible scene, if they get swept from their sound, common judgment of staying out of this war.

Speaking of propaganda in the last war, may I quote from a noted authority:

"The great success of British propaganda in the United States should not be attributed to a professional group of propagandists but to native American volunteer propagandists. Once these natives had acquired the 'correct' frame of mind, they were enlisted for the 'duration of the war'."

Again the same course is being pursued. We are seeing American societies, under all types of titles, moving for our more active participation. They are not advocating sending the boys over, not yet. On this "not yet" depends the life of your son. May I quote from a well-known playwright who has become a propagandist for our participation, a playwright whose background is worth investigating. He said: "We must go to the Allies' aid with all the power that we can command. We cannot send an army 'now'." His only qualification of sending an army was that it would not be sent now, but the future would mean—and his statement definitely indicates that it would mean—sending the boys later.

Just think this proposition through. They advocate sending our planes, our guns, our material (even though they say we are not prepared ourselves and that we could not defend ourselves), to the battlefields for the cause. If the material will not win the war is it not only expected but natural to suppose that we would be enough interested in the cause to send the boys if they are needed, if the material wouldn't be enough to win. Just common sense will prove to anyone that if we take this step, it will not be long before the boys are sent to man the planes and the guns. Don't be fooled, America.

In the last war, it has been stated, and I quote: "It was in the group known as intellectuals that the best body of propagandists were enlisted." Sir Edward Grey sent certain Englishmen over, and I quote, "to meet people, particularly those connected with the universities." Again that course is being used, and many of our college and university presidents and professors are native volunteer propagandists for our entrance in the war. They will advocate sending students to their death while they remain as "brain trusters" to tell us how to win the war.

I do not have the time to continue to give references on this propaganda drive, but if you write me at Washington, D. C., I shall send you more material on this subject.

Do not think of this war as something far away. Just get in mind and keep it there, that we are closer to war today than we were in 1916. Certain Government officials, yes, very high Government officials, who are saying we are not close to war are lulling you into false security. Your boy will be called, to have his head blown off on the battlefield or maybe just a leg or an arm, to have his lungs filled with poison gas to cough the rest of his life, or maybe he will come home to you a shell-shocked wreck, if we continue the same drive to war that our country has experienced in the last 6 months. America cries out for the administration to solve the problems of our own country such as unemployment, yet these are neglected while all of the time is given to the international schemes of those who have failed in our own problems. I am not pro-German, nor pro-English, nor pro-anything except pro-American. I believe in a strong national defense but I am tired of this hypocrisy of preaching peace while taking us into the war. I call for my country to awaken to the danger of those who call for peace while their actions mean war.

Our young men want to live to make our country a better place for future generations—through peace.

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. RUSH D. HOLT ON CITIZENSHIP DAY, JUNE 2, 1940

Last year it was my sincere pleasure to speak to the young people of New York at the first celebration of Citizenship Day. At that time, Sanford Stanton, Messmore Kendall, and I discussed the possibility of a day being designated in this country for that purpose. The growth of the program has been even more rapid than we expected. I welcome you as citizens.

The enthusiasm and vigor of youth are important. Your fresh outlook on issues is a contribution. When you achieve citizenship, you become a partner in the biggest and most important business in the world, that is, the Government of the United States of America. You have become a stockholder in a mutual society. It gives you privileges and calls upon you to exercise your rights. We have great problems to solve in America today. We need men to solve them. We need men,

"Men, whom the lust of office does not kill,
Men, whom the spoils of office cannot buy,
Men who possess opinions and a will,
Men who have honor, men who will not lie."

The youth of this country have a challenge. Never in the history of this Nation was there a greater need of exercising the right of citizenship than today. Even the great challenge of 1861–65 does not compare with the challenge America faces today, a challenge of failing to solve our own problems here and the danger of involving ourselves in war to solve other people's problems abroad. Either or both will be fatal to democracy, as we know it.

We have a great Government. It is not perfect, but it is the best in the entire world. Because it is not perfect should not discourage us. It gives us a task to complete, the task of making it better.

The outlook for youth today is not bright, but that does not mean that we will be quitters and fail to exert all of our efforts to make it better. It was not a bright future for those who came to this country when it was first founded, but they took off their coats, got to work, and established the foundations for our great Government. You may say they had new frontiers. They did have, but we have new lands to explore, lands of science, lands of education, lands of tomorrow's future. America is not through.

And to the older citizens let me say the youth of this country love their country, but we do not want war. We know war is not the way of helping our country. We have educated ourselves to build, not destroy. We have educated ourselves to make this a better world in which to live, not a world of war in which to die. We are interested in democracy, far more than some who are now proclaiming themselves to be the champions of democracy by asking for our intervention. We know liberty will be the sufferer if we go to war. We want to save democracy, save it right here where it exists.

I realize that the "isms" of other foreign countries may have an appeal to some of the younger people who face unemployment, but that beautiful mirage painted for you will disappear as you see those "isms" in action. Ask the American who has lived over there what gladness filled his heart, what caused that lump in his throat, when the boat steamed up to the Statue of Liberty, with her torch to welcome the world to America's great liberty.

When anyone tells you that you should become a Communist, a Nazi, or a member of such foreign organizations, ask that individual what liberties you would have in those countries that you do not have in this country. Ask him if you would be guaranteed the right of free speech, the right of free press, the right to worship God as your conscience dictates. Ask him, if you would be arrested, you would be guaranteed a right of trial by jury. When he tells you that you would be guaranteed a job, ask him if it is a job in the factories, in the offices, in the fields, or a job in the trenches.

The great difference between many governments and that of the United States is that our Government was built on the theory that the government is the servant of the people. Today many governments are built on the theory that the people are the servants of the government. I regret that we have some officials who share such an opinion as the latter.

Americans are free men. They will not and cannot tolerate being slaves or servants to any group, be it government, be it a class, or servants to a party. No country in the world has more liberties than we have, and the great Constitution gave them to us. Our forefathers protected them, handed them down to us. We have a duty to hand them down to our children. These rights and liberties must be guarded by every good American citizen.

When the world is seeing foundation stones being torn away, it is no time to tolerate under the name of emergency the destruction of the foundation stones, the sound traditions, of our own country. America needs men who recognize that this Government is a government of law, not men; that no man is indispensable.

The great document, the Constitution, has in its amendments, the Bill of Rights, composed of the first ten amendments. You may remember them from the study of civics. Even if you do not, they are yours. They have made your life a better one. They are your protection when you need them. What are some of those amendments? The right of free speech, the right of free press; the right to worship God as your conscience dictates; the right to peaceably assemble; the right to petition the Government for a redress of grievances; the right of people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures; the right to be tried by a jury and the preservation of life, liberty, and property of an individual. These and many others are given to you by the Constitution. They are given to you regardless of your race, religion, or position. Too many persons believe in free speech for those who advocate things they believe in but not for those who oppose them. Free speech means free speech to all or free speech to none. When you set yourself up to determine what should or should not be free speech, you are striking at a fundamental right of your fellow man. What if he did the same and felt that you should be deprived of your right? Again the spirit of being a regular fellow must prevail. Don't do unto others what you would not have them do unto you. We must all say that we shall protect the rights of others as though they were our own. We shall not take privileges we refuse our fellow men. The tragedy is that too many Americans do not realize how great our liberties are. We have them every day, and we overlook their existence to protect us in need. We may never be arrested, but if we are, we want our constitutional right to be tried by a jury. We may never want to speak at a public meeting, but if we do, we want our constitutional right protected. If someone tries to deprive us of our life, liberty, or property, we want to be able to have the constitutional right to protect ourselves. Don't think of democracy only as abstract government. Think of it as something in your everyday life. It contributes to your happiness throughout the day.

Because we love democracy, we must exert our influence to save it. The way to save it is to save it where it exists—right here. Majority rule is wonderful, but that majority must never be tyrannical. The greatness of America is the protection of minorities.

All youth like sports. In sports the underdog is protected. A good sport is not one who would take advantage of his associates because he has the power to do so. Our duty is first to our own country. The minute we enter war—and let us hope that day never occurs—these liberties we have will be curtailed and stopped. The first casualty of war is liberty. Everything is controlled in war today. Your radio program will be regulated by Government, your newspaper will be hampered by Government. What you eat, how long you work, and your everyday life will be controlled by war regulations. Do not be deceived that war is a nice thing, a place for adventure, a chance for medals. Ask the soldier who has seen and felt front-line trench duty and you will hear what war is. You will see fellows with their heads torn off, fellows coughing out their lungs, trying to escape the terrible poison gas, blind fellows, crippled fellows. No; war is not fun. Furthermore, if you go to war and happen to come back safe and sound, although the odds are against you, remember that you are coming back to start paying for the war in which you fought. You, who were not born when the last World War started, are suffering today from the results of it. Some of the roots of this depression go back to that war. Youth pays the terrible penalty of war not only in their sacrifices in the trenches but in the demoralization that follows.

America's hope is peace. America's liberty calls for us to remain at peace, not because we fail to see a challenge to liberty but because we desire to protect liberty in the greatest democracy on earth—right here in the United States.

Twenty-fifth Anniversary of Ordination of Msgr. Thomas A. Sharkey

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH, OF NEW YORK

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an able address delivered by the Honorable EUGENE J. KEOGH, Member of the House of Representatives from New York, at the Columbus Club in Brooklyn, N. Y., on May 30 1940. The address was delivered at a dinner celebrating the twenty-fifth anniversary of the ordination of Msgr. Thomas A. Sharkey, pastor of St. Martin of Tours Church in Brooklyn.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Reverend toastmaster, Very Reverend Monsignor Sharkey, reverend clergy, honored guests, and friends of our guest of honor, it is with a deep sense of responsibility that I rise to address this marvelous gathering of parishioners of St. Martin of Tours and friends of our distinguished pastor. I know that there is in the hearts and minds of all of you more appropriate and more beautiful thoughts that each would like personally to convey to our jubilarian—all of which makes me the more conscious of my responsibilities.

Such occasions as this are not frequent and, indeed, I cannot recall a similar outpouring of the people of St. Martin's. We who have been permanent parishioners of only this parish are, therefore, without precedent for this gathering and it puts us who assume to speak for you in quite the same position as was the young priest who was singing—or trying to sing—his first high mass in the church where his uncle, a venerable monsignor, was pastor. The uncle was proudly sitting in the sanctuary as the young man labored along in his best monotone—until he reached the preface. Having been given the key by the organist, the young priest had no alternative but to select his own and to struggle on until he reached a point where his voice could go no higher or lower, in fact, was lost. The organist gave the key again, the young man started, and the same thing happened again and several times. The situation became very tense, and something had to be done. The monsignor arose, walked to the center of the altar, raised his hand to the organist, faced the congregation, reassured the young priest and said "Give the boy a chance. He is only a beginner." It is probably very fortunate for you and very comforting to me that I do not have to sing.

On Monday, February 16, 1891, the New York Times consisted of but 8 pages. Cleveland was President. The free coinage of silver was the issue of the day. Nat C. Goodwin was appearing in the play The Nominee. Ayer's Sarsaparilla was prominently advertised, as was Royal Baking Powder. The Grace Presbyterian Church at Stuyvesant and Jefferson Avenues was opened. The A. O. H. in Kings County was nearing a settlement of differences that started in 1884. A lawyer occupied the pulpit in a South Third Street church. The Bushwick Democratic Club obtained the site on Bushwick Avenue and Hart Street for a pretentious clubhouse. The Reverend Dr. C. R. Blackhall, of Philadelphia, in discussing parochial schools before the Baltimore Baptist clergy said, "The Catholic parochial school is antagonistic to the institutions of the country and ought not to be tolerated."

But more important to us tonight, on that day February 16, 1891, in Brooklyn, Thomas was born of Joseph and Ann Sharkey.

He lived the life of a normal, healthy American boy and, as if destined to be the answer to Dr. Blackhall's remarks, he studied in parochial schools, at St. John's Preparatory School and College, and entered St. John's Seminary, displaying throughout a marked brilliance in studies.

On Saturday, May 29, 1915, the New York Times consisted of 20 pages. Chancelor von Bethmann-Hollweg said, "Germany will fight till assured 'no enemy, alone or combined, will again fight her.'"

Sharp notes were being exchanged over the sinking of the Lusitania on May 7.

"Joe the Greaser" and "Dopey Benny" confessed to a gang killing.

Mexico is in civil war with Pancho Villa and Carranza the leaders.

Students hold numerous peace meetings. Only 10 men and 11 women are on the list for school teacher. Lewisohn Stadium at C. C. N. Y. is dedicated.

But far more important to us tonight, on that day in Brooklyn, eight young men, Reverends Edward Glankowski, Joseph Shreider, James McConnell, Jeremiah King, Stephen Cottone, William Buckley, and Thomas A. Sharkey were ordained to the holy priesthood by Rt. Rev. Bishop Charles E. McDonnell in a 5-hour ceremony at the Church of St. John the Baptist.

Immediately thereafter Father Sharkey entered upon his chosen work—serving with distinction in three parishes—serving with a holy zeal—a helpful attitude and a sympathetic nature—endearing himself to all his people and culminating this phase of his life in a most creditable discharge of the complex and important post of rector of the Diocesan Institute of Philosophy at Huntington—supervising the constructing of the seminary, the assembling of the faculty and the organizing of the course of studies—until—

On Saturday, May 2, 1931, when the New York Times consisted of 40 pages, when the Empire State Tower—the tallest in the world—was opened by President Hoover, when business was hopeful of an upturn, when the Brooklyn Dodgers were in seventh place and Twenty Grand won the Wood Memorial, and when Ireland gave land to 70,000 farmers—ending a 50-year fight against absentee landlords, there took place an event—far more important to us than these—Pope Pius XI, in recognition of noble service appointed Father Sharkey a Papal chamberlain with the title of Very Reverend Monsignor; and on Wednesday, May 6, 1931, when the New York Times had increased to 52 pages, and told that Catholic charities in New York raised $1,157,000, the Pope emerged from the Vatican for but the third time to dedicate a new College for the Propagation of the Faith, and 10 of the most prominent priests of the Brooklyn diocese, including Monsignors Hoar, Metzger, and Flynn, there took place an event—most important to us—affecting most intimately the spiritual lives and well-being of the people of St. Martin of Tours—for the Very Rev. Msgr. Thomas A. Sharkey was appointed pastor of our church.

He followed in a line of noblemen of God—Fathers Donohue and Lynch and Monsignors Reilley and Flynn.

He came to us, and he came among friends. He has, with his staff of able assistants—and we are justifiably proud of Fathers Caton, McKelvey and Diviney—served us with distinction and zeal.

The years of his pastorate have been difficult, fraught with the problems besetting the world and its people, priests and laity.

His sincere application to the work of his office, his deep appreciation for the beautiful, and his philosophy of life have added to the comfort and happiness of his flock. They are all here tonight, in body or in spirit, to pay tribute to a priest of God. A tribute so well earned by a life of good—well lived.

And to you, Monsignor Sharkey, they felicitate with you tonight and join with me in expressing their and my abiding loyalty, faith, and devotion—praying to God that there will be for you many more years of health and service in the vineyard of the Lord and particularly at St. Martin of Tours—this tribute is deserved—you have honored us.

America's First Line of Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DAVID I. WALSH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY AT NAVAL ACADEMY GRADUATION EXERCISES

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the inspiring address of the Honorable Charles Edison, Secretary of the Navy, at the graduation exercises of the United States Naval Academy June 6.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Admiral Brown, members of the graduating class, and friends, as Admiral Brown has indicated, at few times in our Nation's history has the attention of the American people been more focused on a Naval Academy graduating class and their brothers in service than today. The unhappy series of events of this year has belatedly awakened our citizens to a keen and active interest in our Nation's defense. Shipyards are working at full speed on 66 new naval vessels, plane factories are speeding up construction of war planes, gun and powder factories are working at full capacity to provide fighting equipment for ships and planes. We are determined that, if needed, our first line of defense will not fail. In the words of our Commander in Chief, the President, "The fleet must be ready."

For 4 years, and in some cases 5, the Naval Academy staff has guided you and helped you to fit yourselves to take your places in that fleet. You have worked hard, for the task has not been light. Nor are the duties which lie ahead easy, if well done. You are entering one of the most competitive of all professions, but one worthy of your mettle. You will find able guidance and willing help, but it will not be forced upon you. For those who seek it, it will be given gladly by those who have gone before you. Not all of you will have the same assignments, but, like the fleet, each of you must be ready. I am confident that you will be. The Nation expects you to be.

While at the Academy you have lived in an atmosphere of naval tradition. The walks on which you have daily trod bear the names of gallant naval officers of other years. The buildings in which you have worked bear the names of others who have made their contributions to the proudest of naval traditions.

Memorial Hall, in which you took your oath to defend our Nation against all enemies, is a veritable shrine of those traditions. The chapel in which you have worshiped contains the mortal remains of that untitled knight of the sea, John Paul Jones, whose letters and reports advise: "It is not enough that an officer of the Navy should be a capable mariner. He must be that, of course, but a great deal more. He should be, as well, a gentleman of liberal education, refined manners, punctilious courtesy, and the nicest sense of personal honor. In relation to those under his command he should be the soul of tact, patience, justice, firmness, and charity."

Some of these attributes you now have. Others you must needs cultivate. But all the sterling qualities enumerated above might, in the Nation's hour of need, avail little, if you have not those other manly qualities of which President Theodore Roosevelt spoke when he said: "Every officer in our Navy should feel in each fiber of his being an eager desire to emulate the energy, the professional capacity, the indomitable determination, and dauntless scorn of death which marked John Paul Jones above all his fellows."

Many of the heroes whose names and deeds make brilliant the tapestry of our naval tradition have displayed personal courage of the highest order in the heat of battle. Others have distinguished themselves by the daring of plans for a venture made in the solitude of their cabins. But, whether it was Farragut ordering his ships full speed ahead amidst the exploding torpedoes of Mobile Bay or Dewey calmly making his resolve to enter Manila Bay, the fundamental quality which made possible glorious victory was willingness to assume responsibility for the act by which victory was won.

I commend to you this officer-like quality. I urge you to develop it in your daily performance of duty in order that you, at the crucial moment, will not be timid. The officer who shrinks from responsibility in small things will never be worthy of responsibility for great things.

You will doubtless make mistakes. Be not discouraged by them. It has been said that it is no disgrace to be ignorant, but it is unpardonable to remain so, if by ignorance a life may be sacrificed, a ship lost, or a potential victory turned to defeat.

You have the tools with which to work. You may feel that your studies are over and for a short time shrink from further study. But all education is a continuing process, and those who would succeed as naval officers will early resume the study of their profession. You will find pleasure as well as profit in exploring those avenues of naval history, science, strategy, and tactics which your busy schedule at the academy has limited.

Our ships of today are vastly improved over those of a few years ago.

Our training methods and the general battle efficiency of the fleet have reached an all-time high in excellence. In both there is still progress to be made. I feel certain that among you there are those who will contribute materially to that progress. Use your imagination and the tools of your academy training to give to the service your share of progress. It may be your contribution which tips the balance of victory.

I congratulate you not only on your graduation but also on your entry into that great fraternity of the sea, the United States Navy.

I congratulate your mothers and fathers on havings sons who could measure up to the rigid requirements for a commission in our Navy. I congratulate the American people on having such fine young officers added to the fleet which stands incessant guard on our ocean frontiers.

If every graduate of every institution of learning in the Nation went forth with the same brand of Americanism as yours, our security within would be certain. For security within as well as from without, the Nation must have more than the tangible elements of strength represented by ships and planes.

It must have that intangible strength as well, strength which comes from the primary virtues, from adherence to the faith of our fathers, from the keeping of that faith with our God. The liberties we enjoy in this most blessed of nations are not only a priceless heritage, they are a sacred trust. I have every confidence that each of you will always be worthy of that trust.

Perfectly Legal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL HINSHAW

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 10, 1940

ARTICLE BY GEN. HUGH S. JOHNSON

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Washington Daily News for today:

[From the Washington Daily News of June 10, 1940]

PERFECTLY LEGAL—ONE MAN'S OPINION

(By Hugh S. Johnson)

The impression is being given that the sale of airplanes, cannon, and small arms to the Allies is, as Senator PITTMAN called it, perfectly legal. Ever since The Hague convention of 1907, the United States Neutrality Act and the British Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870, it is illegal for a nation not at war to furnish any belligerent with troops, ships, munitions of war, money, or with commodities of direct or indirect use in war. A private individual can do it at his own risk. So we "sell" them to an individual—or do we?

Press reports have said that the Attorney General's office has approved this as legal at international law. What the Solicitor

General really said was that it is lawful to sell surplus war materials to an individual or corporation. He couldn't have honestly said that it is lawful for our Government to furnish its military equipment to a belligerent. If you can sell an airplane, you can sell a battleship—or a regiment.

What is this clever little scheme? It is, explains Senator PITTMAN, like trading in an old auto to a manufacturer for credit on some future purchase of a new one. Then, says Senator PITTMAN, "we don't know what the manufacturers will do with the stuff we trade in, and it's none of our business."

What do you think of that for frankness and honesty by a mouthpiece of our great and honorable Government? We know exactly what the manufacturers will do with the stuff. We procured them to do it, make it our business, and are a party to the deal. In other words, that statement is false and this action is a subterfuge to conceal something which, under our own law and international law, is an act of war.

Congress had under advisement the sale of this material in this way. A committee of the Senate overwhelmingly rejected it as a violation of international law and an act of war. It is the duty of Congress alone to authorize war. This is no action short of war. It is war. In defiance of the Congress and the Constitution, the President, by a slick trick has circumvented the war-making power and arrogated to the Executive a right to commit this country to an act of war.

It will be interesting to see what will happen to the Senator's auto trade-in theory when it comes to shipping our "surplus" 75-mm cannon. We did not buy them from any American company. We bought them from France. Is France now going to furnish us any trade-in cannons? They are not surplus in any true sense. They are the only reserve artillery we have. General Marshall testified that, instead of getting the new 101-mm guns we need, our General Staff had decided to recondition these old 75's because the new guns would cost too much and take too long to get. The fact is that under present methods they would take years to get.

Much the same thing is true of our reserve supply of rifles. We will get new semiautomatic rifles only 2 years hence, and then only for a fraction of the force we should need in war. We are not making any other shoulder rifles. What we are getting ready to send abroad is a necessity for home defense. The Navy planes are not even reported by the Navy as obsolete. They are "temporarily in excess of requirements" because the reserve pilots for them "have been ordered to Pensacola."

What is being done is an act of panic and imprudence, but skip that for the moment. The truly dangerous significance of this act is the Presidential usurpation of congressional war powers. He is frothing to get Congress to go home. He secured a recess to present debate on this. If he dares do this with Congress in session, what can we expect when Congress is gone?

If it is the will of this country to commit this act of war, let's do it. But let's do it without any small cheating, and let's do it as the Constitution intends, as an act of the direct representatives of the American people, who alone are charged with this responsibility.

National Defense and Foreign Policies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG OF MICHIGAN

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, last evening I made an address over the radio on the subject of national defense and foreign policies. In order that there may be no misunderstanding about my viewpoint and my purpose, I ask the address be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Fellow Americans, we are all prayerfully thinking these days about our foreign policies and our national defense: About peace and war. In respect to these things we confront a condition, not a theory, in the presence of volcanic European events. We must deal with it frankly for the sake of every human and material value we hold dear.

We are no longer "neutrals" except technically. We are now more accurately described as "nonbelligerents." A "nonbelligerent" is a nonfighting ally. By overwhelming national sentiment, and by administration policy, we are "nonbelligerents" on the side of France and England and Norway and Denmark and Finland and Poland and Czechoslovakia.

The transition inexorably began with the repeal of the arms embargo. It rushed ahead on the impulse of our deep sense of outrage and horror when one innocent, continental nation after another succumbed to the ruthless blood lust of Nazi and communistic conquest. It has matured in every ghastly bulletin from the shambles of Europe and in every program which the administration has serially developed. It has both sound and unsound stimulations. It is sometimes fed by an unreasoning anxiety that America herself is in imminent danger of extermination if the Allies lose. On the other hand, it more solidly flows from the clear conception that America is safer if the Allies win; and it has real substance in the necessities which might confront us, under the Monroe Doctrine, if the Allies do lose.

There is no use in longer arguing the merits of this transition. It is here. We are no longer "neutrals." We are "nonbelligerents" on the allied side. The rational thing for all Americans is to face these unavoidable facts—clearly and cool-headedly—on the basis of these irretraceable developments. The only practical question today is: Where now, and what next?

The problems of a nonbelligerent, which still hopefully says it has no intention of becoming a belligerent, are far more delicate and dangerous than the problems of a neutral, because it is a difficult and perilous role to be half in and half out of this war. Therefore, there is greater need than ever for care and prudence in charting our course, lest inflammatory exhortation, on the one hand, and impulsive emotions, on the other, shall force us unwittingly to the final step which makes a full-fledged belligerent out of us, despite the universal assurance and demand that we shall stop short of this final plunge.

Let us try, then, to examine a few basic considerations.

First. There is no such thing as literal isolation in this foreshortened world as a result of recent events at home and abroad. Recent events have been no more destructive of isolation than of many another "preblitzkrieg" conception. The simple truth is that we face new world facts. We may still be nationalists as distinguished from internationalists. We may still be noninterventionists. We may still be insulationists. I am personally all of these things. But we cannot be isolationists.

Second. The problems of the United States are simplified if the Allies win. One very practical example will suffice. All of these Allies have American possessions. Their disposition, in the event of Allied defeat, may become an immediate challenge to our Monroe Doctrine. If this war should come to the Western Hemisphere in challenge to the Monroe Doctrine (which, for this purpose, includes Canada), we shall become belligerents overnight. I have voted within the week—with a unanimous Senate Foreign Relations Committee—that no possessions in this New World may be transferred to a non-American power. It is straight notice that we consider it our business to stop conquest in the Western Hemisphere. We have said the same thing for 100 years. It is our business. There is but one belligerent to whom it could ultimately apply. At this point we would fight. But I beg of you, my fellow countrymen, to remember that we must have something to fight with, and we must have it here and not in Europe.

Now these two paragraphs describe tangible reasons—entirely aside from our abhorrence of Mr. Hitler's demonstration during the last 6 months of contempt for international good faith, and for the humanities we cherish, and for the democracy we love—these two paragraphs describe tangible reasons why the United States has a definite stake in Allied victory. But before we measure the extent of this stake, and what we should do about it, let's examine a few other basic considerations for the sake of ultimately arriving at the right answer for America, against whom, remember, no nation has committed one single act of war.

First. America is not automatically lost if the Allies lose. Our interests are not that inseverable. If they are inseverable we ought to go to war tomorrow with everything we possess and any other course would be cowardly suicide. But 99 percent of our most earnest interventionists insist they would stop short of actual war participation. Therefore, it must be that we generally agree Allied fate and ours are not necessarily one and the same. We want and we intend that America shall survive no matter who wins in Europe. We intend to survive in the post-war world whatever it may be. I am frank to express my own view that an exhausted Nazi conqueror is not calculated soon to ask for more war when once he lapses into armistice. But I do not suggest that we rely upon this thesis. I suggest simply that our prospectus must contemplate our ability to survive regardless of who wins in Europe.

Second. Though "isolation" is out, "insulation" still remains. The two oceans are still, relatively, our priceless friends despite alarming time tables which fabulously magnify our hazards. But the oceans alone are not enough. We must arm against all eventualities. As swiftly as possible we must build an impregnable national defense. Not for war in Europe—God forbid! But against war if it ever comes to our own homeland or any of its essential outposts. We can allow nothing to interfere with this objective, and we dare not subordinate this objective to any other consideration, no matter how nobly meditated or persuasively urged. We must prepare conclusively to defend ourselves and New World democracy under the Monroe Doctrine. That is our responsibility. It also is our greatest promise of final influence in behalf of those nations with which we sympathize when the ultimate world readjustments come.

Now, when we lay this second set of fundamentals alongside of the first set of fundamentals, our proper course—as "non-belligerents"—begins to take clear pattern. Since our foreign policy has traded "neutrality" for "help-the-Allies-non-belligerence," we should render this help to the utmost of our capacities within our obligations under treaties and international law—but always limited by two additional restrictions. These limitations, always insistently proclaimed by the authors of our new policy themselves, are that we shall not under any circumstances actually enter this war abroad, and we shall not impair the essential nucleus of our own presently meager defenses for the sake of arming others.

Our paramount requirement is that we shall constantly remember the limitations as well as the premise. It is too tragically easy for the transition from neutrality to non-belligerence to maintain a frenzied tempo which races on and over the precipice, despite sincerest motives to the contrary. A parachutist has some difficulty in deciding not to be a parachutist after the parachute starts to descend. So, I repeat, this new role of non-belligerent—a sort of twilight zone between war and peace—puts the duty of a greatly intensified vigilance upon us to see to it that while we help the Allies, we do not hurt America while assuming that we help America.

Now, let's examine a few more fundamentals in the light of these conclusions.

First. If we go to war—or if we drift into war—we shall substantially lose all of our own liberties overnight in a regimentation which will curse us with all the plagues of dictatorship; and, even in our ultimate victory, we should sit amid the ashes of our own bankruptcy and disintegration. I have seen the case stated no better than in an editorial sentence in the Detroit News: "We do not believe anything to be gained for America and American democracy by helping the Allies, can compare with what would be lost by involvement in this war." Here let me add one statement of fact, not argumentatively, but to make the record complete. If, as a result of what may be construed as direct intervention by our Government, if Germany should declare war on us, we should be at war regardless of our own purpose to the contrary. This is not to be feared, if it be our own deliberate purpose, but it is not to be ignored in considering the status we propose to occupy.

It almost seems silly to even mention international law at the moment of its complete disappearance from Europe. I do so only that we may have fully in mind the implications of what we shall do. Article VI of The Hague Convention binds us to an acceptance of the following doctrine:

"The supply, in any manner, directly or indirectly, by a neutral power (which is what we legally are presumed to be, to a belligerent power, of warships, ammunition, or war materials of any kind whatever is forbidden."

This does not apply to our commercial trade. It would apply to our Government. I do not characterize the President's recent order respecting the trade-in of Army and Navy supplies. The case is not entirely clear. I simply state the facts, because the American people are entitled to all of the facts when peace or war is the issue. Personally, I shall not vote to go to war indirectly unless I am willing to vote to go to war directly, and this I shall not do unless the war comes to our own homeland or to its essential outposts or to our national interest.

Second. We are not prepared to go to war, even if we would, and—though we help the Allies to the utmost best we can within the law—we dare not hamper or impair the new beginnings of a real hemispherical defense for our own United States on any theory that we can in some safe fashion defend ourselves by proxy on alien battlefields. There is no final substitute for the self-contained American defense of America.

Let's pursue this latter theme a little further. The President gave us this advice a few days ago: "Let us not be calamity howlers and discount our own strength." Well and good. But here is parallel advice: "Let us not be wishful thinkers and pretend to a strength we do not possess." This latter folly ought to require no emphasis in the light of current European history. Indeed, the President himself has not hesitated to strip our unpreparedness naked to the world. We should fool none but ourselves if we pursued any other course. We confront a condition not a theory.

Aside from an excellent one-ocean Navy (which is now distantly concentrated in the Pacific Ocean) we are unprepared, in any real sense, to go to war or to approach it. Just a few typical examples. Assistant Secretary of War Johnson said this week that full delivery of the new Garand rifles to the National Guard will not be completed until June 1941, and that tanks and field pieces for an army of 1,000,000 men will not be in hand until January 1, 1942. Our new battleship program will not be completed until 1944. We do not have 50 fighting planes competent for equal combat in the technique disclosed by contemporary war. So it goes.

We are not only unprepared for war, but we are unprepared to do much more, beyond what is already being done, to "help the Allies"—until our own production is vastly multiplied—if we cling faithfully to the limitations heretofore set down. They do not need credits for perhaps another 2 years. They are already getting practically everything, within these limitations, which is available and for which transportation is available. Until we step up our own production, there is little more we could contribute except the very things which we need ourselves in the development of our own defense against our own eventualities. In this latter field we could only divide and dissipate our own strength in return for having made an indecisive contribution to those with whom we sympathize.

We cannot afford to dissipate our own strength if there is any such contingent menace ahead as we are constantly warned by the sponsors of our new status. We cannot have a chip on each shoulder and both arms in a sling.

So this brings us to another fundamental. Our paramount duty is the swiftest possible development of a completely adequate defense for our own homeland and its essential outposts; and our chance to substantially expand our "Help the Allies" program is largely contingent upon what we do to put our great industrial facilities into defense production on an effective scale to serve both objectives.

Although we have spent many billions on the Army and the Navy in the last 6 years—and always with the assurance that each appropriation would produce adequate preparedness—we have not remotely obtained anything like adequate preparedness. This does not intend undue criticism—because the whole technique of war has changed in the last 6 months beyond reasonable anticipation. But this new technique is about 95 percent a matter of industrial mass production. The Army and the Navy and particularly the Treasury Department cannot cope with it. They are no more trained to cope with it than they are to step into a great motor plant and run it. The old procurement methods won't do. They are too much a failure. We have paid penalty enough for them. We confront a condition, not a theory.

This is a job for a civilian procurement administrator—the best mass-production expert available in the land. The President recognizes this need by setting up a civilian advisory board. It contains the best mass-production expert in America. We do not yet know to what extent he will be given freedom of action and authority.

I express the hope that it may be complete. In whatever degree we cling to the old methods and procedures we shall cling to the old wastes and disappointments. Nothing short of supreme efficiency and expedition will do. I still wish we might see last October's report of the President's own War Resources Committee, which undoubtedly canvassed this problem in realistic fashion and undoubtedly pointed the way to essential reform. I still fail to understand why this key report should have been hermetically sealed against inspection by any Member of the Congress. That is an unhappy mystery which I cannot fathom. But this we know: The task of preparedness is not too difficult if private industry, at long last, gets the right-of-way. As a neutral we could afford the luxury of a little dalliance. But as a nonbelligerent we can afford nothing short of swift and certain results to produce a defense fully equal to the responsibilities for which we propose to prepare. Making appropriations is not enough. We tried that before. The important thing is how efficiently these appropriations are expended. And thus we see our own necessities take clear form, and our chance to help the Allies is in this same mold.

Now, let's pass on to some other phases of the grim problem which we confront.

In facing our new vicissitudes we could serve our preparations no more realistically than to write a new commercial and political treaty with Japan, if reasonably possible, which would stabilize our relations in the Far East, where we most emphatically confront a condition and not a theory. A pacified Pacific could be almost equivalent to half a navy in our scheme of defense. Still more important, a demonstration at the moment that two great world powers can agree in peace and friendship would be a beacon of hope in a world of gloom. The abrogation of the old Jap-American Treaty of 1911 has cleared the track for a new agreement unless statesmanship is bankrupt at one end of the line or the other. That was the purpose of the abrogation, as expressly stated in the preamble of my own resolution on this score last July and in my constantly reiterated subsequent appeals.

There is another phase right here at home which can no longer be smugly ignored and which has a direct bearing upon any decisions which may take us closer to the theater of war. Financially, we are as unprepared as we are in the physical field. Next March we shall have reached our $45,000,000,000 debt limit. Yet our tenth annual and consecutive operating deficit for this next year will be in excess of $3,000,000,000, without taking any account of these latest gigantic defense expenditures. The new taxes originally proposed, though heavy and burdensome, will only pay 20 percent of next year's operating deficit, with no account of these latest defense proposals. A crisis is obvious. There is no use blinking it. We are at the end of the road of deficit spending. We are at the bottom of the barrel. We confront a condition, not a theory.

A sound public credit is the first line of national defense. There is but one way we can fortify that line. It is the cruel, hard way of paying and paying and paying. There is no such thing as inexpensive war or inexpensive preparation for war or inexpensive deficit spending. Even without war, our problem is utterly serious. With war, it would be appalling. The "neutral" has become a "nonbelligerent"; but the "nonbelligerent" must frankly weigh all of these considerations before needlessly hastening by a single hour that ghastly moment when we go to the war or when the war comes to us.

This Congress should not adjourn until it realistically attacks unpreparedness on the fiscal as well as the military front. As a matter of fact, it should not adjourn at all so long as there is any emergency which calls for its cooperation, because no delegation of its constitutional powers and responsibilities to the Executive can adequately substitute for its own constitutional voice. We are still a peoples' democracy.

Congress should horizontally reduce every other appropriation, except for fixed charges, by at least 10 percent for the next fiscal year. It should reduce all Federal salaries above $3,000 by 10 percent. It should assess new taxes to pay our new bills. We cannot eat our cake and keep it too. So let's confront this condition honestly and courageously, no matter how disagreeable the task. The administration's initially proposed little tax bill was not much more than a mustard plaster on a cancer.

There is still another phase at home—the treachery of the Trojan horse—the technique of the "fifth column." We are more susceptible to it than any other land because of our zeals for civil liberties. These zeals must be kept courageously alive. On the other hand, there is nothing in the Bill of Rights which requires Columbia to nurse a viper in her bosom. Those who are not for us are against us; and the quicker we draw this line, the safer we shall be. No party which advocates the overthrow of our Government by force has a right upon our ballots; and no subversive activities—aimed at our destruction from within—have a right to survive when we are closing ranks to protect the Republic. Here, again, we confront a condition, not a theory: and, unfortunately, we confront it within the very ranks of Government itself.

Now let me recapitulate. We want a national defense which will meet every emergency—and Congress, without regard to party, is voting almost unanimously for all the President asks in this respect. We want a foreign policy which, while frankly and helpfully recognizing our obvious allied interest under present conditions, does not needlessly intensify this emergency nor create new ones.

The American people, myself emphatically included, want the Allies to win. Most of us are ready wholeheartedly to help—but it is vital that this help stay within the essential limitations I have described. But, above all else, the American people insistently demand that we keep out of war itself abroad: and they are eternally right in this demand. We have ceased to be "neutrals." That is water over the dam. We are "nonbelligerents"—and we must not drop the "non," unless the war comes to our homeland or its essential outposts. We must not critically impair our own essential defenses to make indecisive contribution to the defense of others. We must prepare to survive in the post-war world, whatever it may be.

We want complete and adequate defense. We want effective expenditure of our prodigal defense appropriations. We want to get what we are paying for. Then, for the sake of our own indispensable solvency, we must prepare to meet the bills. There is no need for hysteria. Hysteria defeats reason. We can do no better than to recall the sturdy words of President Roosevelt when, in 1933, he was in the midst of an earlier crisis. "The only thing we have to fear is fear itself—nameless, unreasoning, unjustified terror which paralyses" our judgments. It was good advice then. It is good advice now. We are entitled to deepest apprehensions and we are justified in preparing for a maximum emergency; but America can survive in tomorrow's world—whatever that world may be—if we think things through and if we consult American necessity at every turn of the hard road. There is need for cool, deliberate judgments. There is need for unity of action after full, free, and untrammeled discussion. There is need to protect our democracy against attack from ambush and against its own disintegration. There is no need for us to go overseas and join this war abroad; and there is no justification for any policies which would threaten this calamity. The place for us finally to "save democracy" is right here at home.

Reconstruction of Finland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESSES BY PRESIDENT KALLIO, OF FINLAND

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, in the turbulent and seething war-mad Europe, we can but admire the people of the Republic of Finland, who are turning their attention with vigor to the paths of peace, after a compulsory peace following the short but bloody war with the Soviet war machine. The Finns preserved their independence and their freedom, they preserved their institutions and their government.

Led by their president, Mr. Kyosti Kallio, they are facing resolutely the tasks that will bring order out of the war conditions. The inspirational leadership of this little republic is evident in the addresses of President Kallio, which I desire to extend into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Two addresses, one on the occasion of the signing of the treaty of peace on March 14, 1940, and the other on the occasion of the resignation of the government on March 27, 1940. I ask it be printed in the Appendix to the RECORD.

There being no objection, the addresses were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPPECH BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC OF FINLAND, MARCH 14, 1940

Citizens, you heard yesterday over the wireless and read today in your newspapers the peace terms, on the basis of which we shall now have to build up our future.

We have experienced, to our astonishment, the revival in the Soviet Union of the interests of Peter the Great. We see, repeated once again, the striving which our history has known so often, to cut off a great part of the province of Viipuri, and of its liberty-loving population, from the nation to which, on racial, historical, and geographical grounds, it rightly belongs. These national ties, however, are so strong that we shall jointly endure and seek to alleviate the hard fate which has befallen both the citizens affected and the nation as a whole. And we must be capable of doing so, for the Finnish people and independent Finland with all our national rights are still left to us from the war, with the exception of the areas mentioned. Their loss is our deplorable misfortune, but history will place to our credit account our tenacious struggle for our right, a moral victory the value of which we cannot at present estimate.

The losses caused by war are in many respects hard to bear, but we trust that those civilized nations which recognize the fundamental principles on which our defensive struggle was based, will make it their duty to support us in the work of reconstruction.

Yet highly valuable as the help of foreign nations has already been to us so far, it is essential that we should trust in our own powers. A living sense of national unity has been our strength in the clash of battle at the front and behind the front. And it will be our most trustworthy source of strength also in the future.

The nation may rest assured that the Government's purpose has been to prevent by the conclusion of peace the continued destruction of the vital energies of the Finnish people in the unequal struggle with a great power which we have had to carry on alone.

Comparing the heroic defense our people have maintained and the peace terms, we are overwhelmed with grief at the mutilation of our country. Yet our brain tells us that we must concentrate all our forces in a unanimous work of reconstruction as we go forward to meet our future. And there are possibilities enough for us to build up our own future, for the Finnish nation has been preserved, our state machinery is unimpaired, and Finnish national feeling and honor remain, purified and more conscious than ever of their future tasks.

Our army, with all its equipment, is still in being to protect our existence, and the joint struggle has drawn us closer together, enabling us to feel more clearly than before our unity of fate with those on whom the horrors of war have fallen with the greatest severity.

We do honor to the thousands who have fallen in the defense of what was most sacred to us.

As for the army, I thank, as its most visible symbol, its foremost man, Field Marshal Mannerheim, who, with amazing skill and energy, has successfully, in his capacity of commander in chief, conducted our defense. I know that I am interpreting the feelings of the entire nation in saying that this war has brought Field Marshal Mannerheim closer than ever to the hearts of the people.

I join with all my heart in the recognition and the thanks expressed by the field marshal in his order of the day to the officers and men of the army and the Lottas for their self-sacrificing work and untiring labors.

The population behind the front similarly deserves recognition of its devoted work.

We must, however, remember that great and lasting responsibilities remain to be borne by the Nation, for the dependents of the fallen, the war invalids and other victims of the war, the population of the ceded areas and their livelihood remain our lasting concern. In this respect the work done by ex-President Hoover has been of extreme value already while the war was proceeding.

I express my thanks to the Swedish nation for the great sacrifices it has made on our behalf. My thanks are also for the arms and equipment which Sweden and the western powers in particular have generously given us.

The repulse of the enemy was beyond the power of the Finnish Army alone. It was impossible for us to obtain foreign aid on any considerable scale after the governments of Sweden and Norway had refused to allow the passage of allied troops through their territory.

I dare, nevertheless, to hope that the essentiality of a northern defensive alliance has become evident during this war also to our neighbors.

In the course of a short but stern war the Finnish has gained rich experiences, which point the way to it in the future.

I hope with all my heart that the spirit of unity which has upheld us in our trials will grow in firmness, for on it depends the prosperity and future of the nation.

Let us remember that our fate is in our own hands. Let us show by our actions that Finland and the Finnish people are capable also, in the present circumstances, of fulfilling their historic duty as the outpost of western civilization.

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC OF FINLAND TO THE RESIGNING GOVERNMENT: MARCH 27, 1940

On the grounds you have brought forward I have accepted your resignations from membership in the Government, although the cooperation between us and also with the House of Representatives has been good and founded on complete confidence.

The period of 4 months during which you have borne the responsibility of government, has been fatefully burdensome both for you and the nation as a whole. You did not think of yourselves and your personal comfort when, on the second day of the war, you consented to accept the responsibility for the government of the nation although you knew that this peace-loving country was not adequately prepared for war and that the aggressor had resorted from the first moment to the use of all the instruments of modern warfare.

In our great trial we found our firmest support in a people united and determined to defend itself, which fought heroically for its country with the inadequate arms at its disposal. And at this moment of leave-taking I can establish with pleasure that you, as members of the Government, did your utmost to secure a supply of munitions, with the result that the defensive capacity of our army is quite different from what it was at the outbreak of the war.

And with the same determination and courage, with which you fulfilled your duties during the war, you embarked, when the opportunity came, on negotiations for peace, to preserve the vital forces of our small nation from destruction. In regard to the immoderate peace terms there can be no two opinions among the nation, yet the people and its parliament have understood that even an onerous peace is preferable to years of sanguinary war in the face of great odds with all the terrible destruction and unforeseen consequences that would entail.

Our country, it is true, is mutilated, a matter which we mourn, but the Finnish people, alive to our duty, our independence, and our heroic army, these still exist. These are the foundation stones on which we shall continue to build up our future.

On my own behalf and on behalf of the nation I thank you for having steered, with incomparable skill and energy, the destinies of our country in its hour of suffering. And on my own behalf I thank all of you for your good and confidential cooperation, and hope that those resigning members of the Government, too, who are not members of the new Government I have just appointed will, though in other circumstances, lend their knowledge and experience for that constructive work on which all of us must now embark for the good of our country. I wish especially to thank the prime minister for immediately forming, at my request, a new Government, and consenting to continue with you the work of reconstruction to which with warm hearts and firm hands we must devote our energies.

National Defense

OF

HON. PRENTISS M. BROWN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

DISCUSSION BY SENATORS BONE, BROWN, LEE, AND WILEY

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a discussion by the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. LEE], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], and myself on the subject of national defense.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Announcer MCCORMICK. This is the American Forum of the Air.

Listeners from coast to coast are invited to hear the American Forum of the Air.

We bring you another program presented by WOL in cooperation with WOR and emanating from the Willard Room of the Hotel Willard, in Washington, D. C.

Information as to how you may receive a copy of tonight's proceedings wil be given at the conclusion of the broadcast. Tonight the American Forum of the Air wil be presented in two parts. First you will hear prepared presentations from each of the four participants. This will be followed by extemporaneous discussion.

Questions anent tonight's subject are invited from the audience here present and likewise from listeners throughout the country.

You may send a telegram to the American Forum of the Air, Washington, D. C., and an attempt will be made to answer it while this broadcast is in progress.

The American Forum of the Air is arranged and directed by Theodore Granik, pioneer in educational radio discussion and newspaper columnist, who will preside as chairman.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Mr. McCormick.

With a horror-stricken world watching a war-torn Europe, with its devastating destruction of hundreds of thousands of human beings in a fury described by eye-witnesses as a "hell on earth," America looks to its own defenses.

Warning that a possibility exists that all continents might become involved in "world-wide war," President Roosevelt on Friday asked Congress to adopt an additional program to secure America's defense.

Leaders in both Houses of Congress indicated swift adoption of the President's program, which would bring the total bill for American rearmament defense to some $5,000,000,000.

But while Congress has been in considerable agreement on the question of spending the moneys for defense purposes, the problem of raising it appears to be the subject of much dispute. The administration plan would increase practically all existing taxes by approximately 10 percent, and increase the national debt limit $3,000,000,000. Concurrent with the tax discussions, an economy bloc is demanding that cuts in other Government expenditures should accompany increases for national defense. Another group suggests that the tax base should be broadened, to add some 2,000,000 persons to those now paying income tax.

Receiving considerable attention are the bills by Senator BONE, of Washington, providing for a war-profits tax, and by Senator LEE, of Oklahoma, providing for a plan to draft capital in time of war. The Bone bill, in which a group of Senators had joined for introduction and consideration, has among its stated purposes "to tax the profits out of war by steeply graduated income and other taxes" in order to provide for effective national defense and to discourage war profiteering.

As reported out by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, the Lee bill is designed "to promote peace and national defense through equal distribution of the burdens of war by drafting the use of money according to the ability to lend to the Government."

The bill provides that whenever Congress shall declare that war or the imminence of war has created an emergency, which, in the judgment of the President is sufficiently serious to necessitate the drafting of manpower, the President is authorized to have taken a census of the net wealth of the Nation; the said wealth of each individual shall then be subject to the borrowing power of the United States.

With Congress weighing these and other proposals and methods of financing national defense—and war if it should come—the American Forum of the Air presents a discussion on the subject tonight.

We are privileged to have as our speakers Senator HOMER T. BONE, of the State of Washington; Senator PRENTISS M. BROWN, of Michigan; Senator JOSH LEE, of Oklahoma; and Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, of Wisconsin.

Following short prepared statements, they will engage in an informal, round-table, extemporaneous panel discussion.

During the second half hour of the program, our guests attending this broadcast are invited to submit questions from the floor to the participants. And again, in response to many requests for listening audience participation, we extend an invitation to our listeners-in throughout the country, who are unable to come to Washington to witness this broadcast, to join in the program by telegram only. We cannot take them by telephone. Kindly wire to the American Forum of the Air, care of the Willard Hotel, Washington, D. C. We will submit the questions to the participants in order of receipt.

And now, as our opening speaker, Senator BONE:

ADDRESS BY SENATOR HOMER T. BONE

Senator BONE. The whole picture of warfare has completely changed in the last few years. Any nation that expects to win a modern war is compelled to mobilize the entire population. It is compelled to bring within the orbit of warfare not only human beings who do the fighting and the making of war munitions, but also to lay hands upon the assets of the people to pay the frightful cost.

It cost about 75 cents to kill a man in Caesar's time. This cost rose to about $3,000 per man during the Napoleonic wars; then to $5,000 in our American Civil War; and then to $21,000 per man in the World War. Estimates of cost of the present war indicate that it may cost the warring countries not less than $50,000 for each man killed. When you consider a war on a large scale, these figures add up to total bankruptcy for all of mankind. Engaging in war now means straining every financial as well as physical resource.

Methods of taxation such as we employed in the World War would be utterly futile. World War tax levels fell far short of meeting the requirements of that war. Unless we tax to the utmost limit to pay for any new war as we fight it, we would pile up a mountain of debt that would utterly crush the generations that follow. It would go far beyond that. The financial impact of such a debt would destroy our system of government. The Nation could never pay such a bill. The staggering addition to our pension obligations after such a new war would in itself present an unanswerable problem.

There is one cold, hard fact about war. If your boy is drafted, this Government will not draft 50 percent of him. It will draft 100 percent of him. If it took your son from a $5,000-a-year job, it would not guarantee him any part of his prewar earnings. He would receive the wage of a soldier in the ranks, although he would be compelled to give up 100 percent of his capital, which is a sound mind and a good body.

We have a constitutional provision which says that a man may not be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. When we draft your boy's body, that is called by some folks "due process of law," but the great minds in the legal world decided that this language does not mean what it says and that you cannot likewise draft property without paying just compensation for it.

Confronting the harsh fact that you cannot draft property like you can draft a boy, there remains only one way to make property bear somewhere near the same burden that the drafted soldier boy has to carry. There are no constitutional barriers to taxing income from property, and this offers one satisfactory way of making property subject to a mild form of draft. Certainly if the boy is compelled to give up months of time and probably his life or his health, the man who remains at home ought to be content to give up a substantial share of his net taxable income to fight the war and to pay for it, as far as possible, while it is being fought. That is why some of us in the Senate and in the House of Representatives introduced certain war-tax legislation. This legislation has been savagely denounced by some folks who think it is all right to draft 100 percent of your boy and shoot him to death, but object to a capture of a substantial part of the net profits of men during a bloody war.

S. 1885, now pending in the Senate, with companion bills in the House, would accomplish this purpose. If this sort of legislation had been in force during the World War, the taxes collected under the bill from net profits would have paid for the war when it was finished and peace was declared. It would not have collected enough money to also make the huge loans to European nations which were never repaid.

This bill does not change the present tax system, but merely increases the tax levels to a point where no human being could possibly profit out of war. It would not go into effect until war was declared, and would automatically go off the statute books on a declaration of peace. It is a pure and simple war-time tax measure.

When we entered the war in 1917 a petition signed by leading economists in 48 of the greatest American universities was presented to Congress urging that precisely this kind of legislation be adopted. Two hundred and fifty economists of every description in these great universities signed this statement. Among them we find H. G. Moulton, then of the University of Chicago; Thomas Nixon Carver; Albert Bushnell, Hart; and the ultraconservative O. M. W. Sprague, of Harvard University. Among the Yale University faculty members appears the name of Irving Fisher. It is of interest to note that Prof. Raymond Moley also signed the petition.

The Veterans of Foreign Wars not only endorse the tax program in S. 1885, but made a Nation-wide campaign for its adoption. Fifty Senators asked for its consideration.

It is sufficient to say that the bill allows all the normal exemptions and deductions now allowed in the regular revenue laws.

One thing you can be dead certain about, and that is that if this bill becomes law no one would make any profit out of war. That scares a lot of fellows who still hug to their breasts the illusion that this or any other nation can plunge into one of these modern total wars and emerge with its system intact. Unless both our parties are utterly hypocritical and lied to the people in their platforms, they will have to do the very thing this program calls for. If we do not mobilize the income of the country and draft it to pay for a war as we are fighting it, the only alternative is to add billions to the already swollen debt, in which event we might as well prepare to bury the American economic system, for it would surely be doomed. Financing a war now by going into debt would lead to a runaway inflation, which in itself would be sufficient to smash the capitalist system. Giving up the major part of the profits and net income of stay-at-home Americans during a war would be a comparatively slight contribution to preserve America and keep it as safe as possible and as solvent as possible in this mad world of ours. It would be merely the application of common horse sense and good social insurance. One need only contemplate the cost of preparing for war to realize what the cost of actual warfare might be.

It is charged, and with a great measure of truth, that our political parties write utterly meaningless platforms. I call attention to the fact that the Democratic Party solemnly assured the country that in the event of war in which the manpower of the Nation is drafted, all of the resources of the country should likewise be drafted. If the party did not mean what it said in that declaration, it was guilty of an outrageous fraud on those who trust the party.

Not to be outdone, the Republican Party upon two or three occasions likewise demanded that the Nation should draft for its defense not only its citizens but also every resource which might possibly contribute to success. As late as 1936 the Democratic Party in its platform pledged the country to take the profits out of war.

The Republican Party is guilty of fakery and fraud unless it, too, makes good on this solemn pledge. We would have no hesitancy down here in Washington in laying rough hands on the body of your boy and drafting him, but some of us get pretty lily-fingered when it comes to property. It is time for the American people to compel these two political parties of theirs to be men and not mice and to deal with the subject of war taxation and war profits exactly as they have promised to do.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Senator BONE. And now we present Senator PRENTISS M. BROWN, of Michigan.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR PRENTISS M. BROWN

Senator BROWN. Time prevents any discussion of the question of whether or not large expenditures for defense are necessary. I spoke over the National Broadcasting System last Tuesday night upon that subject, and my conclusion was that while I think there is very little likelihood of the invasion of the United States by Hitler even if he is successful in his war against the French and English, yet we cannot afford to take any chance and must spend the money necessary to defeat any aggressor in the world.

Thus I have been converted from one who has spent military money grudgingly and reluctantly into one who feels that the time has come when we must arm ourselves against the most relentless and conscienceless aggressor of modern times.

The question tonight is, How can it be financed? That happens to be the question now before the Finance Committee of the Senate, of which I am a member. First, let me say that I do not think the job of getting up an adequate tax bill can be done hastily. I do not think it can adequately be done unless Congress does one of two things: Either remains in session for several months, or recesses with instructions to the Government experts and subcommittees to proceed with hearings and report a bill back to Congress in the early fall. I think the latter method is better.

Even without the defense program, our tax structure was badly in need of revision. We cannot pay the defense bill by a flat increase in taxes. We cannot pay it with one supertax. We must keep in mind tax justice. We must not dry up the sources of investment capital which is sorely needed to carry on a defense program. The tax bill must be carefully drawn with the advice of the Government's experts, with the advice of business, finance, labor, and the consumer. All are vitally interested. It may be that we can do something temporarily within the next few weeks, but I feel that a full and adequate tax bill should be undertaken.

Our national income for the past 3 years has averaged about sixty-eight billion. Our taxpayers have paid annually, exclusive of social-security taxes, just under five billion. You can see that about 7 percent of the national income is paid in Federal taxes. No one knows what the extraordinary expenses of defense will be. The present requests of the President approximate $2,000,000,000. These, of course, are round figures.

There is a general idea that these extraordinary defense expenditures should be spread over a 5-year period. To meet them there are three methods that have been suggested: (1) to tax; (2) to borrow; (3) to issue paper money. I reject the latter entirely as utterly illogical and against the interests of the wage-earning and salaried classes. The increase in money simply raises prices, and it is a long and difficult battle to raise wages to meet them. This leaves us taxation and borrowing. It is probable that we cannot prepare a tax bill early enough to avoid increasing the debt limit. Reluctantly I will vote to increase it. The main burden of defense should be borne by tax increases. The time has come when we cannot continue to raise approximately five billion in taxes and spend something over eight billion, as we have done for the past 3 years. This gap must be closed. Regardless of other considerations, the time has come when we must not only shoulder the defense bill but we must bring our receipts and expenditures into closer balance.

The estimates of tax receipts for 1940 are $4,800,000,000. The estimates of expenditures before the defense program was announced was approximately nine billion—in other words, an expenditure of twice our receipts. The expenditures for 1940 will now probably approximate $10,000,000,000. We cannot finance defense without using many different means of taxation. To my mind the following occur: (a) A 10-percent increase in income taxes with consideration given to some readjustments; (b) some additional excise taxes, particularly on whisky and beer; (c) possibly an increase in tax on cigarettes; (d) a tax on governmental bonds; (e) a tax on war profits; (f) a manufacturers-sales tax.

I do not favor the La Follette plan of broadening the base. The return from taxpayers who have incomes below the present exemptions is inconsequential. The main argument for it is that it will make more citizens tax-conscious and more interested in economy in government. I cannot go into a full discussion of that subject within the few minutes allotted me. The experience of my own State with the sales tax is such that I favor the enactment of a national manufacturers' sales tax. It has been estimated that a 2-percent tax of this character, with exemption of food and clothing, would bring in approximately $800,000,000. It is true that such a tax to an extent is somewhat more of a burden upon those in the lower-income groups, and I would couple such a tax not only with the exemption as to food and clothing, but also with a rejection of any idea of applying the income tax below the present $2,500 and $1,000 exemptions.

In addition to these taxes, I am firmly of the opinion that the greatest effort should be made to lay aside some of the present expenditures. If the defense program results in considerable industrial expansion, as it will, we should be able to get along without some of our present public-works programs. I applaud the President in his veto of the river and harbor bill. I think that a careful survey would reveal other expenditures of this sort that should temporarily cease. I wish we could make an average reduction of 10 percent in expenditures. I am frank to say, however, that I do not believe this can be done by a simple application of a percentage figure to all expenditures—there must be some selection—but nevertheless, we should strive mightily to cut expenditures other than defense to the extent of five hundred million to one billion dollars.

In short, I do not believe that the national defense can be financed by any financial hocus-pocus, by any one tax. It must be financed by a tightening of our other expenditures and a careful, deliberate, scientific, well-considered revision of our entire tax structure.

My fellow countrymen, we may as well face the facts. There will be no material reduction in our annual expenditures, even when the defense problem is met. Many so-called emergency expenditures have become and will remain permanent. The total of Federal taxes necessary to meet our annual needs as far as we can now see them approximates $9,000,000,000 and will, conservatively speaking, for some years. This is about twice our annual tax receipts for the past 3 years. This is about 12 percent of our national income. There is no relief in sight. The only answer to our problem despite hoped-for economy, despite hoped-for passing of the war threat, is an annual tax bill of about twice what it has been in the past. Let us face the facts. Let us meet the challenge by paying the bill. Let us remember that no other great nation is blessed as are we.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Senator BROWN. We present as our third speaker Senator JOSH LEE, of Oklahoma.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR JOSH LEE

Senator LEE. For more than 20 years the soldiers who fought in the World War have been asking Congress for legislation that would draft capital as well as men in case of another war. Senate bill 1650 is my answer to that demand. So far as I can learn, there has been no other effort in 20 years to translate that idea into the language of a statute.

There are those who favor a proposition as long as it is in general terms, but when it is reduced to the specific language of a bill, they hide behind the convenient excuse of saying, "I favor the principle, but I do not like this particular bill," when as a matter of fact they do not favor the fundamental principle.

Therefore, ladies and gentlemen, I propose to discuss only the fundamental principles involved in the proposition of drafting capital in case of war.

It is true that the bill itself provides the detailed machinery for applying such a proposition, but I am not concerned with those particular details. I am concerned only with the fundamental principles involved in mobilizing financial resources for war purposes.

Any satisfactory plan must, above everything else, be capable of providing adequate finances as they are needed.

As I see it, there are three fundamental propositions which confront us:

First, should a system of financing war permit profiteering and guarantee exemption of profits from taxation? If you answer this in the negative, you must then answer the question, How could the Government sell enough bonds to finance a major war if the profit incentive and tax-exemption privileges are removed? This brings us to the second proposition:

Should the purchase of bonds be voluntary or mandatory? If you say voluntary, you must then answer the question, What guarantee have we that each individual would buy his fair share of bonds if, for example, they bore only 1-percent interest and were not exempt from taxation?

This brings us to the third proposition:

Should the amount of bonds which each individual purchases be determined by the individual or should it be determined by a schedule based upon his ability to lend which would apply to all alike in the same class?

Before any proposition can be considered fairly, it must be considered in the light of the alternative. Therefore, in considering my proposal for a system of forced loans according to ability to lend, we must consider the alternative, which is the voluntary method used during the World War.

Defects of voluntary system

In order to refresh your memory, let me call attention to some of the defects of this method.

First, I indict the voluntary method of financing war because it guarantees profiteering.

Normally, Government bonds bear 2-percent interest or less, but during the World War we paid from 3½ percent to as high as 4¾-percent interest on the war bonds.

In other words, if war should come again and we should use the same system of financing which we used before, the Treasury Department would, in effect, issue the following invitation: "Come on, boys, and profiteer again. We will double your interest rates and guarantee you exemption from taxation."

When America entered the war, the soldiers gave up civilian jobs at $7 a day and took their places in the Army at a dollar a day and a chance to die. This sacrifice was willingly made, but it shocked our patriotism when we came home and learned that 22,000 millionaires had been made out of a war that cost our buddies in blood and money.

Second, I indict the voluntary method of financing war because it is inequitable.

There was no uniform system by which each person's ability to lend was judged. The amount in many cases was left to the arbitrary guesswork of the Liberty Loan committees.

It would be just as practical to have a system of voluntary taxation, leaving to each individual whether or not he would pay taxes, and also how much he would pay.

The amount of bonds each individual bought was determined not by a fair and just schedule, but by pressure, patriotism, or profit, none of which are fair yardsticks for determining the ability to lend.

Third. I indict the voluntary method of financing war because it breaks down when it is most needed.

During a war the most important objective is to win the war.

In spite of the fact that the United States was not in the World War very long, yet our voluntary system of financing was breaking down. I know we are told that the bond issues were oversubscribed, which statement is correct but very misleading.

These issues were oversubscribed, but not altogether from a voluntary standpoint. In every nook and corner of the United States we had high-pressure committees going into people's places of business, going to their homes, going to public meetings in order to sell their quota of bonds.

We had strong-arm committees and kangaroo courts threatening and intimidating people to force them to buy what was said to be their quota.

The Government spent a total of $45,878,000 in order to sell those bonds.

Millions of colorful billboards were plastered all over the United States. Heartbreaking scenes appeared everywhere, pleading with you to buy bonds.

Several trainloads of captured war paraphernalia made tours all over the United States in order to dramatize that campaign. Boy Scouts, 4-minute speakers, beautiful girls, torchlight parades, and bonfires were all used to create enthusiasm in order to sell those bonds.

Wounded and disabled soldiers returned from the front and made tours through the country pleading with people to buy bonds.

In other words, after staging the most gigantic selling campaign in the history of the world, we were able to oversubscribe the Liberty Loans.

Now, let us look at the amount of oversubscription, because I believe those figures will tell their own story. The first Liberty Loan was oversubscribed 52 percent and that last one was oversubscribed only 16⅔ percent.

In other words, with all of the pressure and emotional appeal which the genius of America could create, the oversubscription slumped from 52 percent to 16⅔ percent.

Each successive bond issue was more difficult to sell than the preceding one, as indicated by the cost of advertising, which doubled with each successive bond issue.

But that is only half the story Now let us look at the rising interest rates which it was necessary for the Government to pay in order to coax enough money out of hiding to continue the war.

The first issue bore 3½ percent, the next 4 percent, the next 4¼ percent, and the last 4¾ percent; and if the war had continued long enough, judging from history, we would have reached the point where the Government could not have borrowed money at any rate of interest. Then we would have turned to the printing presses and destroyed ourselves, all for the lack of an efficient system for reaching the wealth which is in this country.

Here is America, with an estimated wealth of $350,000,000,000, and yet we had to fight two wars, one abroad and one at home, in order to raise $21,000,000,000 with which to pay for the guns the soldiers carried.

Ladies and gentlemen, we should have a smooth-working, efficient system which would raise money as it is needed, according to each person's ability to lend. This system should be based upon the backlog of the actual wealth which exists in the United States. It should not be necessary for the Government to stage a campaign of ballyhoo in order to finance war. We should have a system backed by the force of law by which we could borrow the credit represented by the actual wealth in America and translate that credit into cash. The plan which I propose would do just that.

Financial resources have been referred to as the sinews of war. At least, we know that two things are necessary to win a war. They are men and money. If we are able to supply the one but not the other, we are still defenseless.

During the darkest days of the Civil War, Abraham Lincoln went to New York to raise more money to feed and clothe and arm the soldiers. He saw that the bankers were holding out for better terms. He stood up with the fire flashing from his eyes. He said: "I can draft a widow's only son. I can take her only means of support from between the plow handles and place him at the front of the battle where his life will not last 6 minutes. But I cannot lay my hands on enough money to pay for the food he eats before he is shot."

It was true in the Civil War; it was true in the World War; and unless we do something about it now, it would be true in case of another war.

Now, therefore, I recommend as a substitute for our loose-jointed, haphazard voluntary method of financing war a plan which would bring about three major changes in our present method:

First, the purchase of the bonds would be mandatory instead of voluntary;

Second, the amount purchased would be determined according to ability to lend instead of pressure, patriotism, or profits; and

Third, there would be no profits, but each one would bear his proportionate share of the cost of financing the war.

Chairmamn GRANIK. Thank you, Senator LEE. And now as our concluding speaker, in the first half of tonight's forum, we present Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, of Wisconsin.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR ALEXANDER WILEY

Senator WILEY. Congress and the people of this country are awake to the fact that the days of American ease are vanishing. This Nation must equip itself so it can meet any emergency. Let us be realistic. That means taxation. We can't borrow forever. The bill for defense preparations must be paid. This is no time for political evasion. This is a time for realistically meeting the issue.

Any tax that is imposed should be based primarily upon the ability to pay. That's the basic philosophy of the income tax. One of the first things we have to consider is the matter of adjusting the income-tax rate. I believe there are three feasible suggestions which are now being considered by Washington officials:

1. The first suggestion which has been made is to broaden the base so that the income tax starts on single folks having over $500 income and on married folks having over $1,000 income.

2. The second suggestion is an income tax of 5 percent on all incomes over $500, payable at the source, just the way the social-security tax is collected.

3. The third suggestion is an additional 5-percent tax on all incomes without exemptions. This could be collected, or part of it could, in the same manner that the social-security tax is collected. It has been estimated that this tax would produce approximately $2,000,000,000. It would apply both to individuals and unincorporated business income.

The extra tax on corporate income should be such as the Treasury should determine to be sound and equitable.

In considering these tax proposals we must realize that our first job is to get preparedness. Our preparedness must not be obstructed by absence of financial resources.

The problem is bigger than simply raising the money. We have to see what effect a tax has on production, accumulation of capital, utilization of capital, savings, etc. It, therefore, appears, as I see it, that we'll probably have to have a combination of increased taxation and borrowing, because increased taxation won't start coming in until some time in the future.

Another reason why we shall need this combination is that to finance military construction it will require enormous sums of money, and if it is to be raised solely by taxation we may put a burden on industry which may be a destructive burden and interfere with our getting military preparedness as quickly as possible. That's our first objective.

I agree with those who say that the time is not far distant when we shall have to analyze our whole tax problem. There may have to be a restatement of that problem in terms such as we have never known them before. However, this is no reason why we should go off half-cocked on this measure.

There is no time now to revamp the whole system of taxation; therefore, we will have to put a tax through known as a defense tax or a preparedness tax.

I know that with our tremendous assets and our particularly large amount of idle money, we would have no trouble to finance a loaning program (and that's what some folks want to do—just borrow), but up ahead there is a day of reckoning, and we may as well face the issue squarely now and raise part of the load by direct taxation.

Closely allied to this tax program is the idea that the people must get 100 percent value in their preparedness program. By so doing, by saving excess costs, we will cut down the cost of preparedness. We want to find men who know how to cut costs for the Nation instead of increasing costs.

The ancient Greeks at Thermopylae swore to transmit to their children the freedom of Greece unimpaired. We have to choose now between leaving our children an America unimpaired, fully equipped to meet any emergency, but with an increased debt; or an America with less debt and possibly without her freedoms. This day demands that we choose what course we will pursue.

This taxation problem has many angles to it. If we were to attempt to finance the program by taxation, it would throw the burden on our standard of living and would delay the process of the absorption of the unemployed. By borrowing part of the costs, the burden wou'd be thrown on capital rather than on the standard of living. As the program progresses and conditions change we might raise more of the money by taxation, especially if the unemployed were absorbed.

Special taxes, called sometimes excise taxes and luxury taxes or war taxes, should be considered by experts and applied so that the tax would release commodities and types of labor and types of equipment for the program.

There is no need to get hysterical about the situation. This preparedness program should have a desirable effect in diminishing unemployment relief. In other words, a good deal of W. P. A. he'p could be turned into preparedness use. Likewise C. C. C. and many of the men released from the Public Works program ought to be absorbed in the defense program.

There is no fear or hysteria here in relation to this preparedness program, and with spiritual guidance and direction, we are going to keep out of this war.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Senator WILEY. And this concludes part I of tonight's American Forum of the Air.

And now, as part II of the American Forum of the Air, we present an informal panel discussion on "Methods of Financing National Defense—and War If It Should Come."

During this portion of the program, our guests attending this broadcast are invited to submit questions from the floor to the participants. We also extend an invitation to our listeners-in throughout the country, who are unable to come to Washington to witness this broadcast, to join in the program by telegram only. We cannot take them by telephone. Kindly wire to the American Forum of the Air, care of the Willard Hotel, Washington, D. C. We will submit the questions to the participants in order of receipt. Senator BONE will open the discussion.

Senator BONE. Well, I think it is probably only fair to those present and to the radio audience to make one thing very clear. This discussion has taken this sort of a slant. Senator LEE and myself have been discussing pure wartime taxation; that is, forms of taxation that would be imposed by legislation in the country in the event of and during a war. Our brethren, Senator BROWN and Senator WILEY, have been discussing forms of taxation that would and should be applied now to meet the present-day needs of military and naval expansion. I think we are all in agreement on that, are we not? So that there is no point of difference here.

Senator LEE and I were merely discussing what we thought ought to be done to finance a war which may or may not be imminent—God knows I wouldn't suggest that it is imminent, because I think there is enough ill-grounded fear in the country of our immediate participation.

Mr. LEE. May I chip in there, Senator BONE, to say that I agree on that that Senator BONE has discussed, an excess-profits tax. I am a coauthor of that and an enthusiastic supporter. I have discussed a wartime loan proposition that would be in the form of a forced loan. You cannot finance a war as you fight it. No nation has ever been able to. England was able to pay only 36 percent with the steep tax she had before.

Senator BONE's measure would raise revenue to help retire the bonds that would be purchased under the bill which I advocate.

Mr. BROWN. In my judgment, the main question before the American people at the present time is this: Shall we immediately prepare to defend ourselves? The methods of financing are not so important at the present time as is the fact that we must be doing that job. I believe that the American people are ready to undertake a much heavier tax burden than they have undertaken in the past. No one could say that war ever brings with it any good thing, but in this particular case a realization has been brought to the American people of the necessity of meeting their financial obligations. We have too long been going on without undertaking the full burden of our present needs.

Chairman GRANIK. Mr. WILEY, would you care to say something?

Mr. WILEY. I don't want to get into any altercation or discussion with my associates here in relation to the merits of their bills. In fact, I joined with some of my brethren to bring the bills into the open because I think the subject of taxation is one that every unborn child is interested in, together with us who are living in this day and generation.

The thing that I do agree with, after examining the bill—and I say frankly about the bill introduced by Mr. LEE, which was disapproved by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy on the ground that the plan to force the loan is not conducive to peace and not in the interest of national defense—that I rather think that I agree fully with those conclusions. I cannot see how the bill would promote peace or national defense. The language of one of the alleged objectives is, to wit, drafting the amount of money according to the ability of the individual to lend, but an examination of the language of the bill doesn't bear out, to me, that that result will follow.

Mr. LEE. Do you think we should borrow money on a voluntary basis?

Mr. WILEY. I want to conclude this statement here.

There are a good many other objectives. Among them I don't think the bill is feasible or workable. For instance, when you talk about going out and taking an inventory of the assets and then base that inventory value as something that the Government should compel a loan on, every one of us knows that the values we have today, if a war comes or if something else happens, generally go out the window tomorrow, with the result that any inventory in the first place is not something that is stable.

Mr. LEE. The bank requires it before it makes a loan to you, doesn't it?

Mr. WILEY. I am saying what the fact is in that connection.

Secondly, I believe the operation of the same would have a tendency to paralyze the economic life of the Nation. And war itself has the power to paralyze, without the Government itself making a contribution, the economic life of the Nation. In other words, values from which you derive income are largely the result of the increase in the economic flow. Just like you add economic life to a current: It gets rapid, it produces.

Now, for instance, yesterday this information was handed to me. It has been estimated that if we have an income in this country—and it will be about $70,000,000,000 in 1940, and out of that we will get income taxes of $2,500,000,000. Now my theory is that if you would put that two billion into operation, instead of a $70,000,000,000 income you probably would have a $140,000,000,000 income, and you would be losing correspondingly the money that you would want in taxes.

Chairman GRANIK. Senator BONE?

Mr. BONE. One thing that I think every realistic thinker in the country must face now is the fact that the cost of preparing for war has risen in recent years. I am quite glad that my brother, PRENTISS BROWN, is the one that has to figure out the ways and means of raising the money. But I have served for a great many years on the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate, and I want to point out to all of you folks here and out on the air that when I came down to the Senate a certain type of warship cost us $3,000,000. Today that ship is costing $9,000,000. The last battleship we built cost $27,800,000. That same type of battleship today will cost not less than perhaps $80,000,000—from twenty-seven and a half million dollars or thereabouts to eighty millions. If you think you are not going to be taken to the cleaners you want to change your mind. I served for two and a half years on the Munitions Committee, and I know how rough those boys got.

Chairman GRANIK. Senator BROWN, did you have a word?

Mr. BROWN. I would just like to call the attention of the audience to the fact that $45,000,000,000 in round figures that we have on it—and that is the people's indebtedness—$17,000,000,000 of it is the unpaid debt of the World War of 1914–18. So I thoroughly agree with what Senator WILEY says, and what I think is the program of the President, and that is to finance this defense measure now, because we must keep in mind that we are not in war. Like Senator BONE, I think the chances of our getting in are very slight. But we must bear the burden during the time that the program goes on.

Mr. LEE. Senator BROWN, do you think that you can raise enough money by taxes to meet the present demands for national defense?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, I think we can.

Mr. LEE. Three billion dollars?

Mr. BROWN. A great many people feel that we could do the job without raising the debt limit, and we can't borrow any more money without Congress raising that debt limit.

Chairman GRANIK. I see a question from the floor.

Mr. WHATLEY. Mr. Chairman, in regard to Senator BONE's statement of increasing the cost of steel, cement, battleships, cotton, may I ask Senator BONE whether it is his opinion, in view of the admitted necessity of both financing defense and conserving the purchasing power of all the people, America in this instance can afford the luxury of highly speculative profits, which are essentially speculative rather than having a rational place in a productive economy. I refer particularly to steel, cement, particularly to cotton, and other such basic commodities which are substantially affected by competition and foreign trade and by dictatorial economists, and the obvious need of reducing the spread between the price the farmer gets and the price the consumer in the world market pays, even if it involves nationalizing to some degree the distribution of such commodities.

Mr. BONE. That question is rather too involved for me to answer it offhand. I can't see any justification for a three-time spread in the cost of preparedness. I have felt, and very sincerely, that we are only getting about 50 cents on the dollar in defense for every dollar of the taxpayers' money we are spending. They were getting 60 cents on the dollar. We should be wise enough and smart enough to get 100 percent of the dollar. I know that labor is not getting three times as much as it did a few years ago, I know that steel is not getting three times as much. I know these costs find no justification whatever in the mind of any thinking person.

The point is that we are entitled to have 100 cents in national defense for every dollar we take out of you. I think that calls for the most rigid and sweeping investigation, and if there is no other way to get accurate results in the way of information, if there is no other way to protect America, then we ought to nationalize the munitions business and build our own ships, and build our own instruments of war.

Chairman GRANIK. There is another question from the floor.

Mr. JACKSON. Does anyone know Secretary Morgenthau's solution for raising the revenue?

Mr. BROWN. I have no authority to speak for Secretary Morgenthau. I do know the estimates that were presented to the Finance Committee which cover the present Doughton bill, introduced in the House of Representatives. Without particularizing, the plan is this: To up income taxes by adding 10 percent to the amount that would be paid by each taxpayer, the amount of the tax, next March, to up certain excise taxes, whisky, brew, and cigarettes, which it was hoped would raise about $400,000,000, and income tax, $200,000,000. There were no other particular proposals in the estimates that were presented to the Finance Committee. I do not want you to take that as being complete at all. That would raise roughly $600,000,000, of which $200,000,000 would be raised between now and January 1, and the balance thereafter.

Chairman GRANIK. Here is a telegram:

"Please ask JOSH LEE if most effective defense step would not be to aid Allies? Would this not be cheapest means to safeguard America?

"ARTHUR MARKEL.

"WASHINGTON, D. C."

Mr. LEE. That might be. However, that involves another question. It certainly gives us concern when we think of what might happen if the Allied fleet should fall into the hands of the Nazis. It might mean the abandoning of the Monroe Doctrine and building a wall around the United States, and spending every cent we could raise and scrape for national defense, living under a cloud of fear the rest of our lives.

Chairman GRANIK. Another question from the floor.

Question. What is your collective opinion of a national lottery to raise capital?

Mr. BROWN. I personally reject that scheme and any other plan of that kind which is not based upon justice in taxation. Taxation is a means of distributing wealth, a means of leveling to a certain extent, speaking economically, and I believe that it is vital to use it in that way. Of course, its main purpose is to raise money, but I have never brought my mind to the place where I could conceive of our Government entering into the gambling business to raise its funds.

Chairman GRANIK. Do you have a comment, Senator LEE?

Mr. LEE. Mr. Granik, money can come from only two sources, either income or savings. Our national income of, say, $62,000,000,000 is not sufficient to finance a war of any major consequence. Therefore, if we finance a war we would have to do it by borrowing upon some of the savings. And then with reference to what Senator WILEY said concerning my bill, so far as his criticism was concerned I would just ask him back, what about the old voluntary system of raising money? Wouldn't it have all of the defects that he points out, and more?

Mr. WILEY. If I am to answer that question, I would say that there is a vast difference between our reaching again into a situation where we say to Government, "You can go right in now and build up another bureaucratic crowd," which this bill calls for, because you have got appraisers in every township in the country, and they shall come in and say how much you are worth, and then after that the bill provides that you are going to be assessed so much that you have got to loan to the Government. Well, if you haven't the money, then there is a provision in the bill that you can arrange with the Government to borrow it from the Government and pay 6 percent. But the Government need only give you bonds that would bear 1 percent, or not anything at all.

Mr. LEE. Then you favor paying high rates of interest in order to sell the bonds during the war, and allow profiteering?

Mr. WILEY. I certainly don't favor profiteering.

Mr. LEE. How can you get it sold if you don't make it mandatory?

Mr. WILEY. Well, that is a matter which I think the American people, once they are aroused to the stakes that are in the game, will come through with nicely.

Mr. LEE. It cost us $84,000,000 to arouse them, and all the volunteer work we could do before, and some bought who couldn't hold them. They gave them up, and the bonds wound up in the hands of the banks with a profit to them and a loss to the little fellow.

Mr. WILEY. Yes; I have heard that argument, and I have also heard that if you are going to get an income in a nation, you can't strangle the source of that income. Let me show you. It has been estimated by the Treasury this year that we have an income of $70,000,000,000, as I said, and that will produce under present income taxes $2,500,000,000. But if our income should go up to $90,000,000,000 during a period—and that is what we are shooting for, more business—then under the present scale we would get income taxes of $5,700,000,000. Now what we are after is income so that the income itself will cut the load of carrying the preparedness program. In other words, we don't want to just borrow. If we keep on borrowing, we are just going to have obligations for our children and grandchildren to pay.

Now by using our heads we realize that sometimes too many checks operate to check the flow of the stream; the same thing applies in the economic flow in our Government.

Mr. BONE. You are almost going to have to meet wartime conditions here if we follow the program laid out for us now. I think we are all well aware of the implications of this suggestion of 50,000 airplanes. It takes a crew of 30 men to take care of one airplane. If we have 50,000 planes, that means 1,500,000 men in the standing Army to handle the airplane program alone. And they want 750,000 in the Regular Establishment. That means two and a quarter million men under arms in the United States, and if you folks have any idea what that costs you had better revise your estimates. The cost would be staggering, and that is a peacetime program.

Chairman GRANIK. We have another question from the audience.

Mr. MILTON HOFFMAN. I would like to ask this question from the floor. If a number of men wish to live in a house, some of them owning the materials to build the house and others being capable of doing the construction work on the house, isn't it just that all of them contribute of that which is needed to build that house? And we have the wherewithal in the United States to build our defense, we have the material and the labor. It should be required of both the owners of the material and the owners of labor to contribute in proportion toward the building of an adequate defense of the United States.

Mr. BONE. I agree with that; but even if we do that, the problem is how to solve the tax problem.

Mr. WILEY. That is it.

Mr. BROWN. We do that by the kind of taxation that I have tried to advocate tonight, that is taxation with justice, a just tax, and it is going to take the Finance Committee, the Ways and Means Committee, the entire Congress, a good deal of time to work out a fair and just tax, but the result of it is to bring about the result that is desired by the gentleman who just asked this question.

Mr. LEE. But even after you have got your stiff tax program, I still insist if you fight a major war you are going to have to borrow. If you borrow, then when you ask people to lend are you going to put it on a voluntary basis or on a mandatory basis if they buy. And if they buy those bonds on a voluntary basis, are you going to leave it to them how much they buy? Then will not the richest, who by training are more accustomed to resisting a patriotic and emotional appeal, buy less, or else will they not be motivated by pressure, honor, patriotism, or any of those fair yardsticks of determining the amount of money which each one should lend? And are you going to use the profit incentive or are you going to use a system to find out the financial ability of each person to lend?

Mr. BROWN. Senator Lee, I agree with you that if we get into war, it is going to be necessary to borrow. For the defense program it may be necessary to borrow a little, but by no means would it be necessary to resort, in my judgment, to the extreme measure provided in your bill. But if we go into war, then it may be necessary to do something along the lines you suggest, and I am very happy that you have suggested that bill to Congress for consideration if that unfortunate time ever comes.

Mr. BONE. Let me suggest to my brethren that the best estimates we were able to obtain at the Treasury indicate that under the measure S. 1885, sponsored by the Veterans of Foreign Wars, signed, I believe, by all of the gentlemen at this table, if you were having the Senate consider it, it would have raised from the income that we enjoyed in the year 1928 some nearly $10,000,000,000 out of private income. That will give you some idea of the amount of money that could be obtained.

Mr. WILEY. I think we are all agreed that in case of war not only life but the property of the nation is dedicated to the defense of the nation. Our disagreement comes in relation to the mechanical device that will bring about the most constructive results.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, gentlemen. You have been listening to the American Forum of the Air presenting a discussion on "Methods of Financing National Defense—and War if it Should Come."

And now for a final word from Mr. McCormick.

Announcer MCCORMICK. Thus we conclude another broadcast in this season's series of the American Forum of the Air.

This program emanated from the Willard Room of the Hotel Willard, in Washington, and was a presentation of WOL, in cooperation with WOR.

Free Institutions and the War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WARREN R. AUSTIN

OF VERMONT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE BILL OF RIGHTS REVIEW

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by Granville Clark, dated May 16, 1940, and entitled "Free Institutions and the War," published in the Bill of Rights Review, summer 1940 number.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Bill of Rights Review—summer 1940 number]

FREE INSTITUTIONS AND THE WAR

Is there a clear and direct relation between the outcome of this war and the maintenance of free institutions as we know them in the United States? Is it really important from the standpoint of safeguarding our civil rights—which constitute so vital a part of free institutions—that the Allies shall not be defeated? If so, how important is it? What do we mean by an Allied "defeat" or a "serious defeat"? What would be the effects on us, the people of the country, and upon our children and grandchildren? If we deem it vitally important for us that the Allies shall not be seriously defeated, what shall we do about it? If we conclude to do nothing and let events take their course, what will be the position of the United States if Hitler wins?

These are the crucial questions now confronting the American people. They have been smothered and brushed aside and evaded. But now, under the pressure of events, they return inexorably for an answer; and at last they must now be faced up to with all the knowledge and clarity of mind we can command.

We affirm that the people of this country should have and do have a vital concern that Germany shall not decisively win this war. We affirm that this conclusion rests on solid reasons. We affirm that to ignore them would evidence a lack of reasonable intelligence unworthy of the American people. If this conclusion be sound, the further issue arises as to what we can and should do to prevent the result or, alternatively, to meet the contingency of a Hitler victory.

We discuss these points briefly. We do so because in our view all other public questions, from the standpoint of their effect on American values and the lives of all of us and our descendants, sink into insignificance before them.

Why is it important or vital to us that the Allies shall not be defeated? We cannot discuss that question until we know whereof we speak when we mention "defeat." If we mean only that after a prolonged struggle neither side can impose its will on the other, and that a "negotiated peace" is concluded, that is one thing which would be serious enough for us and the world. But if we mean an Allied defeat of the same character and scope as that suffered by Germany in 1918, it is a situation the implications of which have been clearly envisaged by only a small fraction of our people. It is of this latter contingency that we speak.

It is difficult to visualize what a serious defeat of the Allied Powers, in the sense mentioned, would really mean. It is hard because the consequences for the whole world would plainly be so vast and for the United States so grave that, human nature being what it is, we tend to shrink even from contemplating them. But that does not mean that it is wise or prudent any longer to hide our heads in the sand.

Will anyone be so naive as to suppose that, if Nazi Germany compels the Allies to submit as completely as did Imperial Germany on November 11, 1918, the imposed terms would be less severe? Surely we can now all see that they would be far more sweeping and ruthless. In the supposed contingency it is certain that the Allied naval fleets and most if not all of their merchant fleets would be surrendered or destroyed, their air fleets taken over, their armies disbanded. Thus they would be literally helpless before the enemy. It is difficult or impossible then to perceive why virtually any desired demands could not be imposed. It is hard to see how the surrender of all colonial possessions or even the dominions could be resisted with the exception of Canada and the West Indian islands (which we must prevent) and the possible exception of Australia and New Zealand, which we might prevent.

It is hard to see what could stop the actual occupation of a disarmed England and France and their subjection to virtually the same status as western Poland and Czechoslovakia. If anyone is so disturbed as to revolt at this possibility, has he not forgotten the power of modern weapons—the machine gun, the tank, and the airplane—in the hands of a ruthless enemy against an unarmed people, no matter how brave or how numerous?

It is hard to see what would prevent the complete occupancy or domination of all Europe and the Near East and of all Africa, perhaps in conjunction with Italy which would have become a subordinate partner in the division of the spoils. It is hard to see in truth why the whole world outside the Western Hemisphere would not be held or completely dominated by three great authoritarian powers—Germany, Russia, and Japan. It is hard to see how any free government could exist outside of North America and Latin America. It is hard to see how England and France, disarmed and held in bondage, could revive their power for generations, if at all.

If this whole picture be deemed too dark, let the flaw be pointed out. But let us squarely meet the hypothesis of a serious defeat for the Allied powers instead of any longer sidestepping the issue with loose or wishful thinking.

The putting of the case does not imply that we believe these dire results must come to pass. It does mean that they may come to pass and that there is sufficient possibility of their occurrence to justify and require immediate consideration of our course.

What, then, would be the position of the United States if a serious defeat of the Allies had actually occurred either because we had turned our backs and done nothing to stop it or because our aid was too late or ineffective?

It is as certain as possible that in the event of an Allied defeat as serious as that imagined we would not permit Germany to occupy the British West Indies. We would without doubt have to take over (either directly or as agent for the Pan American Union) Bermuda, Jamaica, Barbados, and Trinidad, and other British, French, and Dutch possessions in the West Indies. Rather than have Greenland in German hands during the coming air age, we would try, at least, to take over Greenland, and probably Iceland, both of which would otherwise fall to Germany. In short, we would secure our outposts almost as a matter of course. We would enter a firm alliance with Canada, and perhaps with Australia and New Zealand, if their independence survived. We would seek to cement our relations with Latin America and to turn the whole Western Hemisphere into a solid defensive alliance. At the same time we would proceed to arm on the sea and in the air on a scale never dreamt of in this country in time of peace, to organize our industry and train our young men, especially, by hundreds of thousands for service in the air.

There is no real chance that the United States would "lie down" in a dangerous world in which the rule of force alone had just triumphed. The American people, while highly unmilitary, are by no means unwilling to fight when definitely threatened (which is a very different thing); and we would not wish to go down without a struggle. With all the measures just mentioned, and considering our vast resources of materials and of resourceful men, we might well organize a power that could stand off the world.

But even if by a great effort we could organize that power what must also give us pause is the consequences to the American way of life that would be involved if we stood virtually alone in a violent world in which the efficacy of force had been demonstrated.

In the material realm what would it cost to defend our interests and commitments in such a world? The mere money cost for military and naval preparation alone would amount to not less than ten to fifteen billions of dollars per annum. The figure may seem fantastic but let us consider together. We are about to spend over $3,000,000,000 per annum now while at this writing the fleets, the air forces, and the armies of the Allies are mainly intact. If those forces have vanished and we stand alone, is it not certain that a modern "two-ocean navy" on a greatly enlarged scale would be deemed essential and would be approved by the virtually unanimous consent of the people? Is it not certain, too, that our air force would need to be multiplied on a vast scale, our Army enlarged and equipped with modern weapons, our young men put in training? Is it not certain that universal compulsory service would be deemed necessary almost as a matter of course? Are not these things clear? If not, what alternative would there be except submission to the enormous military resources at the command of the dominant powers?

These things in our land of high wages and prices cost money. Even in the last year of peace England was spending for armament a sum equivalent to seven to nine billions of dollars per annum for us; and her preparations were even then insufficient. How could we with any degree of safety do less? It is as sure as possible that from the standpoint of taxation alone our people would be subjected to burdens never before even thought of.

But it would be in the intangible field of American values that the real revolution would come. The necessary preparation would involve organization. The pick of our young men would be in uniform; our industry would be largely harnessed to military preparation much as was Germany's from 1933 to 1939. We would live in a state of constant tension and pressures for conformity would necessarily increase. Under the pressure of self-preservation many of our customary liberties would necessarily be restricted. It would be a counsel of despair to say that this would be the end of the American way. We can even have faith that in spite of a vast organization of the national life we could still retain most of our essential liberties. But one thing is certain—that the tensions, the pressure, and the dangers to free institutions would be such as we have never encountered and that the avoidance of this condition of affairs is devoutly to be wished.

If this diagnosis is sound what should be done? Obviously the prevention of an Allied catastrophe is the remedy. But how?

It may be that there is still time—though not for long—by measures short of war to furnish sufficient aid to the Allies to forestall the consequences we have envisaged. We believe that it is in our purely selfish national interest to take these measures at once. Being weary of vague generalities—such as "we should sympathize with the Allies and help them" but without specifying in what manner—we offer the following concrete suggestions:

First. Repeal the Johnson Act so as to permit private loans to the Allies. If we really want them not to be defeated, what difference does it make that years ago they defaulted on their vast debts from the last war? What difference does it make either if we deem them unjustified in the default—a question upon which opinions will always differ? If we really believe that it is in our national interest that they shall not be defeated is it not common sense to aid them at least with private credit voluntarily supplied by our citizens?

Second. Let the law that prohibits Americans volunteering in the Allied armies be forthwith repealed. Since there are aviators and others who feel the call to serve against Hitler why should we forbid it? Their aid might be invaluable.

Third. Let our Government facilitate in every way the procurement by the Allies of the most modern planes and arms we can supply. Let no "secrets" be withheld; let permission be given freely for the sale or charter of our shipping in order to safeguard their lines of supply by sea; let our Government see that the terms of these charters and sales are reasonable.

Fourth. Let immediate steps be taken to stop entirely the export of copper, tin, rubber, and other war materials to Russia or other countries, whence these materials may find their way to Germany. It is said that a principal "leak" in the blockade is through Vladivostok. If so, stop it. What sense does it make to aid with war materials the formidable enemy of the Allies—if we really wish them to be saved from defeat? Incidentally, let us cease our objections to the opening of our mails—a right which we virtually conceded in 1916 and one which Britain cannot afford to forego without handicap. Let us cease enforcing such a technicality as requires exported war planes to be hauled across the Canadian border by horses.

Fifth. Let our Government see to the doubling, at least, of our merchant-ship-building capacity so that in a long war a new supply of ships may be forthcoming to insure communications. Let these new ships be sold or chartered to the Allies on reasonable terms, without profit.

Sixth. Let a great public discussion be begun as to the advisability of governmental grants to the Allies, so that, when they are needed, public opinion may be formed and the Congress can act quickly. Let this question relate to outright grants, not loans. For what is the use of piling up new debts that we know cannot be repaid? Let discussion proceed also as to other ways of private and governmental help, that would place our full resources, short of actual military participation, at the disposal of the Allies and the invaded small nations. Let Congress remain in session continuously, so that it may respond to the national need.

All these measures would be "short of war," in the sense that they would involve no military action. There is, indeed, no use in saying that they would be within the bounds of impartial neutrality. But let the Nation first decide whether it is a major national interest that the Allies shall not be defeated. If so, it follows that we ought not to fool ourselves by pretending to be strictly neutral.

It is, of course, impossible to say whether the application of all measures short of military participation would turn the scale. However, this is no sound reason why these measures should not be forthwith applied. Meanwhile let there be a searching national debate as to whether it is in the national interest to go further; and if so, to what extent and by what means; or whether we shall stop at measures short of military action and permit the war to come out as it may.

In any event, simultaneously with the measures and public discussion just mentioned, it will be only common sense greatly to enlarge our own military preparations and to solidify our national unity. Ordinary prudence requires that the Nation should get ready to play an effective part whatever the national decision may be. If that decision be to take a military part in the war it is apparent that our contribution should not be "too little and too late." On the other hand, if the decision be not to participate with arms it is none the less vital that we prepare to meet the vast threat with which we would be confronted in the contingency of a catastrophe to the Allied cause.

We submit that the foregoing represents a coherent program which we owe to ourselves as a matter of mere common prudence—if we really value our safety and our institutions.

If it be said that such a program tends toward war, as compared with a policy of drift and strict "neutrality," we deny the proposition. We are as anxious as anyone to avoid military participation in this war. For how could any responsible person be rash enough to advocate war except to preserve our integrity and our free institutions? But we sincerely believe that full aid to the Allies without military participation, accompanied by greatly increased preparation, instead of drifting us toward active war constitutes the best chance of avoiding it. Rather, we submit, it is the "blind isolationists" and the extreme pacifists whose views, if they prevailed, would most likely create a situation in which the American people, as a last resort, would find themselves involved in mortal combat or in a complete revolution of the national life as a means of self-preservation.

We have made some progress in facing up to the facts of life in the world of today. Many have been blind, many ill informed. In last September President Conant, of Harvard, in a letter to Governor Landon said that if the Allies "are defeated by a totalitarian power the hope of free institutions as a basis of modern civilization will be jeopardized." For this conservative and sensible observation he was criticized as a "warmonger." Will there be anyone to have that effrontery now?

Now, at last, even the most blind of us knows what the thoughtful and informed knew from the start—that this is a cruel and a bitter war. And even the most ignorant must now perceive that a German victory, with all that it would imply, would be a grave threat, if not to our immediate safety, at least to the maintenance of the "American way" of life. Yet our public opinion has still a long way to go before it realizes the full measure of the issue and before it will be able to form coherent ideas as to what should be done.

Most of all should those who really care for the integrity of free institutions and our civil rights encourage their countrymen to consider well what is at stake. Above all others, whatever their views on domestic questions—whether so-called radicals or liberals or conservatives—men and women devoted to the basic principles of American life should be most alive to recognize that these principles are faced with the gravest threat from abroad that they have ever been called on to meet.

It is willingness to face the facts, to think them out, to use our knowledge and foresight and imagination, that most of all is needed now. Will our people rise to the occasion? We should like to give a clearly optimistic answer but cannot do so. On the dark side it was recently said: "The United States is dangerously unprepared in its mind, its economic organization, and in its defenses to survive the twentieth century." On the brighter side we can remember that we have not in the past been helpless in emergencies when we saw the light in time.

We can be neither confident nor hopeless as to whether the American people will show sufficient intelligence and resolution to meet this crisis. We only know that our first duty is humbly to confess our past complacence and blindness and humbly pray that the clear vision and courage of the best days of our past will return to us anew.

GRANVILLE CLARK.

National Defense and American Aid to the Allies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY F. ASHURST

OF ARIZONA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

EXCERPTS FROM SPEECHES BY HON. HENRY F. ASHURST, OF ARIZONA, AND TELEGRAMS

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD short excerpts from speeches I have delivered in the Senate, a copy of an entry in my diary made on October 14, 1918, and a number of telegrams I have received urging American aid to the Allies.

There being no objection, the matters referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, May 22, 1940

AMERICA

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. I should like to say a word, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I shall be glad to have the Senator from Arizona interrupt me at any time.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator.

I have already announced myself as a candidate for reelection to the Senate. I am opposed by two or three able candidates. I wish it understood that I am not disposed to go home in order to look after my political fortunes when one of the most acute crises in history is upon the human race. I am not just now paying much attention to whether or not I return to the Senate, must as I desire to do so. Whether or not I am returned is of such small importance to the Senate and the country compared to the present posture of world affairs that I am willing to remain here in Washington if it will be of any assistance to the country.

The President may safely be trusted. He has with such almost telepathic ability horoscoped the situation as to our foreign affairs that we may well trust him. Trusting the President, however, does not excuse us from performing our constitutional functions.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I entirely agree with the Senator from Arizona. It is not a question of trusting the President. Everyone trusts the President of the United States in an emergency of this kind. It is a question of what is to be done in this situation, and as to Congress performing its own plain duty.

Mr. ASHURST. Much as I should like to go home, weary and tired as I am here, I shall vote against adjourning, and shall protest against any adjournment, so long as we have any further duties here.

* * * * * * *

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, for taking the time of the Senate at this critical hour I make due apology, and the contribution I now propose to make will be to read to the Senate a speech I delivered in the Senate over 23 years ago, to wit, on April 4, 1917, which speech will be found in volume 55, part 1, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Sixty-fifth Congress.

Mr. President, of all the plagiarists in this world, history is the most persistent. History is constantly repeating herself. I now read from my 23-year-old speech, as follows:

"Mr. President, the United States is great not simply and solely because of her vast area, but because she never seeks revenge—she simply demands justice. Our Government came into life not only as the fulfillment of the bright dream of liberty-loving persons, but as the fulfillment of a task as well. Our free States are not mere abstract longings for justice and peace, for when the States were formed these abstractions and longing were galvanized into life and translated into communities seeking concrete justice and liberty.

"Civil liberty on this continent was a worthy but denied and baffled sentiment until it became articulate in our Declaration of Independence. The Declaration itself would have been nothing more than an eloquent and accurate recital of the philosophy of liberty except that its principles were vivified and enforced by the American patriots. Liberty cannot survive if it does no more than parade around in nightgown and slippers looking for comfort, safety, luxury, and ease. When democracy is attacked it must repel force with force. Democracy will not survive if in times of danger it does no more than preach the doctrine of philosophical nonresistance, simper sentimental regret over a deadly wound it receives, and with lustrous, soft-expressioned eyes view with pensive melancholy decisive action aimed for its destruction.

"If we are to keep our Nation powerful for good in the affairs of men and continue to work out the altruistic problems to which our country was dedicated, we must present to other nations an unweakened fiber, a courage both moral and physical, a mind free from trash and slush, flexed muscles and thews that have not been debilitated or degenerated by sensuality, security, and luxury.

"Our governmental system is and was intended to be one which shall be nourished by the individual instead of one which shall nourish the individual. The individual should give strength and sustenance to the State, not receive strength and sustenance from the State. It is easy and pleasing to indulge in smug complacency and self-deception and thus evade the unwelcome thought of national defeat or degradation, but it is neither wise, judicious, nor statesmanlike to do so. It is wiser and safer to be on guard and preclude all possibility of danger than to hide our fears of danger in the secret recesses of our closets.

"We are living in a day of wonders. Gigantic events are coming so rapidly that they tread upon each other's heels, and among the lessons being taught is the fact that men may be heroes, but unless they are drilled their heroism will end only in unavailing martyrdom. Our mountains are filled with copper and iron ore, but these cannot instantly be converted into battle craft. Preparation and vigilance only can work the necessary changes. Men do not ascend to eminence, strength, and power by a single leap or by growing overnight. It is only by steady tread that a man moves up the rough and rugged path to success. Those who reach eminence and distinction are they who subject their lives to the fires of intellectual and physical endeavor. Success and efficiency, in war and in peace, come only after many years of anxious striving and long-sustained effort. He who expects something for nothing has already begun to decay. There is nothing worth possessing that we get without effort. To compensate the world for what we use is the profound law of all life. Liberty, security, peace, health, and happiness must be paid for. We must face problems as they are presented, not as we should like to have them presented.

"So it is with a nation. It holds its place and preserves its liberty only by never becoming careless and by never despising nor underrating nor running from an opponent. Ever since the days of the children of Noah men have sought to build them a tower which they might ascend in a day of trouble and thus escape the hardships and the clash and din of this world. But such cannot be; under Nature's harsh yet profound laws we must meet and overcome dangers and perform duties; we cannot build a tower lofty enough to take us above and beyond the trials and duties of this life.

"In the annals of every nation it has frequently been necessary to protect innocence and peace by vigorous action. Persons who think with any degree of accuracy are bound to know that this is not a world of automatic righteousness and self-acting justice. Innocence alone is not sufficient to protect the innocent.

"No man making a pretense toward statesmanship would for a moment assert that it would be moral or righteous for us inertly and supinely to sit by and twiddle melting notes on a harp of peace, the while our progress, spiritual and material, our liberties—the most cherished deposits confided to human hands—the blessings of our industry, the fruits of our toil and self-denial, were being subverted or annihilated. It is honorable and righteous to oppose with force those who forcibly attempt to subvert and destroy any of the attributes which adorn and elevate humanity.

"A government designed to make life pleasant for its people is frequently obliged to take some immediate measures to insure the survival of its people. Sometimes in a nation's history it is required to be fearless as well as careful.

"Surely no one could quarrel with those luminous souls who advocate peace at any price. I respect them, but I am not of them. In their hearts repose sentiments of love for all mankind. They believe that Mars is dead instead of red. They think they perceive this earth to be a beautiful temple within which are walled peace, contentment, and plenty; a temple domed with rosy hues; a temple within which turmoil, strife, and struggle are blackballed, and from which all crime, vice, cupidity, hate, envy, rage, and revenge are banished till time itself shall be no more. They see, however, a vision of heaven, not of earth. Evil things constantly assail man on this mundane sphere. Envy, deceit, fraud, force, foaming revenge, livid fires of malice and hate, bigotry, cupidity, greed, lust for world power, and kindred evil passions inveterately attack the human heart and must be combated, not surrendered to. The liberties of our citizens—yea, our very security in the future—will be preserved by public servants who have their eyes to the sea, not by those who have their ears to the ground.

"If our country is to retain, as I believe she will, her historic position as the leader and noble pioneer in the vanguard of progress and human liberty; if she is to remain the beautiful exemplar, we must keep her, in senate, in court, in camp, in field, and in home, true to the principles upon which she was founded.

"What shall it profit a nation if, by keeping an unpunctured skin, it rots its heart? What shall it profit a nation to keep a full pocket and lose its soul? America must not only rear temples, build cities, conquer deserts, enchain the bolts of Olympian Jove, hew down mountains, and harness waters that pour destructive floods; she must also heal sore wounds, crush bigotry and race hatred, struggle for liberty, endow the youth of the land with standards of courageous patriotism, and constantly pour fourth her long-enduring strength for the vindication of American rights and the preservation of human justice on these shores."

SEA POWER

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, it was sea power that saved Rome from Greece.

It was sea power that saved Greece from Persia.

It was sea power that gave to the Phoenicians the command of the ancient maritime world. Sea power built up the far-flung commercial empire of Carthage. Sea power made Athens ruler of vast territories, and it was sea power that made the Rome of antiquity mistress of the civilized world. Rome could not have subsisted without her sea power, because nearly all her wheat came overseas.

When Spain had great sea power she dominated Christendom; and Spain's decline began when storms and British seamanship wrecked her great armada.

The sea power of the American Colonies with the sea power of France won the American Revolution.

Although it would seem that Napoleon's domination was broken at Waterloo, his defeat really took place in 1805, when Lord Nelson off Cape Trafalgar destroyed the combined French and Spanish fleets and prevented the invasion of England. The naval blockade defeated the American Confederacy.

During the World War the Allies would have starved had it not been for sea power.

EXTRACTS FROM DIARY OF HON. HENRY F. ASHURST, OF ARIZONA, UNDER DATE OF OCTOBER 14, 1918

Monday, October 14, 1918

When the Senate convened the galleries were empty (no visitors allowed because of influenza); the sun shone, but the day was cold. Senators charged that Wilson had softened toward Germany and that (by opening correspondence with the German Government) he was resuming "note writing."

Senators were mystified, as the President had not taken any of them into his confidence. Many feared that the President's "altruism" would lead him to a reply to Germany that would lack directness. We knew that an ambiguous reply would chill the ardor of the people and depress the Liberty loan. The strain was enormous; the rumors were that the President's mind was not made up, so I resolved upon my own course; I called an automobile and went to the Executive Offices of the White House, where the President's secretary, Mr. Tumulty, read me a three-page letter he had just sent to W. W. urging that a firm reply be sent to the German note. Mr. Tumulty's letter was eloquent and embraced a coherent plan for future peace. I then dispatched a note to W. W., saying that I was in the Executive Offices and desired an interview with him. He received me graciously; we exchanged salutations, whereupon the following dialogue took place:

"Sen. H. F. A. Mr. President, you might as well know in advance that I am going to say plain and unpleasant things. The time for plain talk is here.

"Pres. WILSON. Why, my dear fellow, sit down and tell me what is the matter.

"Sen. H. F. A. Mr. President, the Senate, the press, and the people are nervous; they expect and desire that you demand an 'unconditional surrender' of the German armies. Please give assurances that your reply to the German note will be one that will meet America's expectations. If your reply should fail to come up to the American spirit, you are destroyed. It is now widely feared—indeed, charged in the Senate—that by your 'notes' to the German Government you are signing away with the pen much of the advantage that our valorous soldiers won with the sword.

"Pres. WILSON. So far as my being destroyed is concerned, I am willing, if I can serve the country, to go into a cellar and read poetry the remainder of my life. I am thinking now only of putting the U. S. into a position of strength and justice. I am now playing for 100 years hence; I laid down my terms to Germany in my fourteen points speech to Congress on January 8th last, and in my 4th of July speech and my speech of September 27th. When Germany fully meets our terms, we are through. Can it be that the people do not remember my fourteen points and my speeches of July 4th and September 27th?

"Sen. H. F. A. No, Mr. President; they do not remember the details of those speeches.

"Pres. WILSON. Well, I remember.

"Sen. H. F. A. Mr. President, it is feared everywhere that an armistice would permit Germany to gain some advantage by diplomacy that she could not obtain militarily.

"Pres. WILSON. I am not making armistices, they must be left to the commanders in the field.

"Sen. H. F. A. Do you intend to demand that Alsace and Lorraine shall be restored to France?

"Pres. WILSON. Read my speech of January 8th, 1918, wherein I said: 'The wrong done to France by Prussia in the year 1871 in the matters of Alsace and Lorraine must be righted.' Now what was that wrong? It was the taking of Alsace-Lorraine.

"Sen. H. F. A. The Allies should demand of Germany a ship for every ship sunk by the German submarine.

"Pres. WILSON. Such matters can be left safely to the peace treaty.

"Sen H. F. A. Mr. President, you should, as a symbol, require the German commander actually to deliver his sword to General Foch, Haig, or Pershing in Berlin.

"Pres. WILSON. Why?

"Sen. H. F. A. Because symbols, next to habit, most powerfully influence human beings."

He then asked me to speak in the Senate and say that the country need have no fear as to what he would do. I started to leave, and told him I was "somewhat" cheered. He said, "Why are you only 'somewhat' cheered?" And I told him that his failure to demand unconditional surrender would give him leisure in which to read poetry, and that he would read it in a cellar to escape the cyclone of the people's wrath, and I then walked out.

Your patriotic telegram appreciated. You are correct in your conclusions. War and Navy Departments seem to be moving with celerity in forwarding the materials and equipment before it is too late. Commencement Exercises at New York University

OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY CHANCELOR HARRY WOODBURN CHASE

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, on last Wednesday, June 5, 1940, I enjoyed the honor of attending the one hundred and eighth commencement exercises of New York University, which I am proud to claim as my alma mater. During the impressive ceremonies on that occasion the distinguished chancellor of the university, Dr. Harry Woodburn Chase, delivered a notable address calling for the rededication of ourselves to the ideals for which democracy stands. I feel that his very able and patriotic appeal should have widespread circulation. I therefore ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am happy to greet the graduates of New York University who have now received their degrees. There are nearly 5,000 of these degrees. As the president of the Carnegie Foundation recently pointed out, the number of degrees now conferred at a single commencement by Columbia and New York University alone now equals the sum total of all the degrees conferred by all the colleges and universities in America in 1900.

You who have received these degrees represent, in your origins, every country in Europe and every continent on earth. A few of you—comparatively few in these unhappy days—are here as visitors from other countries. The overwhelming majority of you have led and will lead your lives within the American framework. Your ancestors, whether near or remote, came to this country for many reasons—religious freedom, enhanced opportunity, freedom from racial persecution, love of liberty. But all of them came here because they felt that America offered something they did not have at home. It was the land of opportunity, the land of promise.

You have come to this moment as living witnesses of the fact that that opportunity still exists. I am not unaware—indeed, I have reason to be especially aware—of the sacrifices which your families and yourselves have made, in many instances, to make it possible for you to receive these degrees. I honor them, and you, for these sacrifices. But, nonetheless, there is no other country on earth today in which any conceivable sacrifice would have made possible for most of you the education which you enjoy. Here is a private institution, bound by no ties of party or creed, with no discrimination save that of ability and fitness. No matter how much individual colleges and universities may restrict their numbers and specialize their student bodies, it still remains true that the American system of higher education as a whole offers a more broadly based and a more varied educational opportunity than has been offered in any country at any period of the world's history.

If you ask why that is so, there can be only one answer. Institutions like this, opportunities like this, exist because America believes it to be important that they should exist. And we believe this to be important because we believe that only by the existence in this country of a large, well educated, well disposed, informed body of citizens, trained in accordance with their abilities, and contributing to the society in which they live, can our free institutions, in the long run, be preserved.

There is no one of you, no matter how great his personal sacrifices may have been, who is not heavily in debt to the social order which has made his education possible. It is no small matter to have been born, and to have grown up, in a society which has put at your disposal the accumulated knowledge and artistry of the race, which has made available to you its specialized skills and techniques, which has encouraged the search for truth. And, more than that, this system of education has not sought to coerce your minds. It has sought to develop you into responsible and balanced people, competent to weigh evidence and to arrive at sane judgments. Our system of higher education may be, as some of its critics have said, mass education, in the sense that it attempts to educate a great many people. But its aim is certainly not mass psychology. Nothing is more abhorrent to it than that regimentation of emotion and will, that distortion of the intellect, which disposes men and women to follow blindly the demagog and the dictator. It is rather centered about the belief that the individual has worth and dignity, that free institutions rest on our ability to develop free people capable of understanding and of directing them.

Now, the generation to which the majority of you belong has grown up in a confused and bewildering world. There was the profound post-war dislocation of the twenties; there was, in this country, the exaltation of materialism, the accelerated and hectic pace of life in every field. Then, almost overnight, the picture changed. There was not only a depression in industry and agriculture; there was a depression in spirit. Optimism about the future gave way to a deep pessimism. For the first time in our history the question was seriously raised in many quarters whether an ample future was possible in this country. The negative aspects of democracy have been kept constantly before your eyes; unemployment, the underprivileged, failures of individuals highly placed to meet their public responsibilities, friction between business and Government, insidious appeals to prejudice, voices proclaiming that democracy was an outworn way of life have resounded both here and abroad.

The result has been that that faith in ourselves which has been such a signal characteristic of our whole history has been temporarily obscured. There has been abroad in the land a spirit of defeatism which some day, I believe, we shall look back upon with wonder. And, more than this, there has been a growing tendency to question moral values. Archibald MacLeish recently pointed out that a school of writers, disillusioned by the last war had, in all honesty, written about war in such a vein that many of us had become so cynical that it was difficult for us to see that there are sometimes moral issues in war. Within the last few weeks two university presidents have publicly stated that "good" and "bad" were words which meant little to the younger generation any more.

All this makes up a depressing picture. It is well that a people should search its soul. It is well that it should become more keenly aware of the deficiencies in its way of life and that it should try to correct them. But loss of faith in ourselves and denial of moral values—these strike at the heart of our free civilization. If faith is gone and a sense of moral values is gone, then no expenditures for adequate national defense can guarantee our future.

I do not believe, however, for a moment, that these things are gone. Surely in these last tragic weeks there must have come home to everyone of us a new sense of the worthwhileness of the institutions of a free civilization. Denmark and Norway and Holland and Belgium differed in many details of their culture from each other and from ourselves. But they were like each other and like ourselves in their attempt to work out their destinies with regard to the freedom of the individual, the ideal of justice in the social order, the ideal of morality in international relationships.

They, and we, have preferred public opinion to the concentration camp, courts of justice to the Gestapo, peace to war, school and the university to the labor camp, liberty to regimentation, the public forum to the impositions of dictators, the right of citizens to live in peace together to the persecution of men and women because of their race and their religion. Who among us is there who can honestly say in his heart that there is no difference in moral values between such civilizations and the resurgence of barbarianism which has overthrown them? Search your own lives. Consider what they would be like under the rule of a totalitarian state.

Consider, on the other hand, what, with all its imperfections, the American State, with its free way of life, has done for you. Is not this thing we call our American democracy worth our faith and our support? Do its values not stand out for all of us in sharp relief against that of a system willing to wreck the happiness and future of the world if only it can dominate that world by force?

I wish that in this hour we might all rededicate ourselves to the ideals for which democracy stands. I wish that we might do this, not merely in our words but in our lives. For our democracy will stand or fall in proportion to the sense of responsibility which the individual feels for its preservation. Democracy cannot be imposed upon a people. It must be always an expression of their own inner spirit or it is lost.

What sacrifices we may be called upon to make in order to preserve our way of life no one can tell. But if only we, as individuals, have faith in its obligations and its ideals, and if we manifest that faith by our works, it will prevail.

CONFERMENT OF HONORARY DEGREES

(The candidates upon whom honorary degrees were conferred were presented by the secretary of the University, Harold O. Voorhis.)

Mr. VOORHIS: Elizabeth Cutter Morrow, called most appropriately to service ad interim in the presidency of Smith College, her Alma Mater, she has distinguished herself in so many capacities that the honor we would do her is quite eclipsed by the tribute she pays us in gracing this occasion. Whether as teacher and administrator, as leader in civic affairs, as alleviator of human distress in wartime and in peace, as poet and author, as first lady of an embassy, as stump speaker in her late husband's successful senatorial campaign, or as consummate maternal genius throughout in an eminent household, the measure of her remarkable attainments is the measure of our admiration and respect in tendering her our Doctorate of Humane Letters.

Chancellor CHASE: Elizabeth Cutter Morrow, to all that you have done in the course of your busy and useful life you have this year added an experience, as Acting President of your Alma Mater, which has not only been happy and fortunate for your students, but I am certain, enlightening and educational for you as well. It has seemed altogether appropriate to us that, as you are about to graduate from that severe curriculum in the field of adult education, we should join with all your friends and admirers in signalizing that fact, and in token thereof we pronounce you Doctor of Humane Letters and welcome you to the body of honorary alumni of New York University.

Mr. VOORHI:: Carl Sandburg, migratory songster of the prairies, whose stark, pungent, vibrant—and whimsical—verses have caught and cased in amber forevermore the idiom and the spirit of mid-America as is; son of a Swedish immigrant blacksmith, alumnus of antecedent incarnations no end: Bricklayer; harvest hand; hotel flunky; coal heaver; house painter; volunteer infantryman at Puerto Rico in '98; Illinois collegian; Milwaukee mayor's secretary; magazine editor; Chicago reporter; foreign correspondent; editorial writer; university lecturer; Harvard Phi Beta Kappa poet; author of a dozen books of verse; historian and biographer, withal, of Abraham Lincoln and his times, in a monumental work which, truly, also "belongs to the ages." May he now belong to us as a New York University doctor of letters.

Chancellor CHASE: Carl Sandburg, as American in your genius as Walt Whitman, yours has been one of the chief creative voices of our generation. It was inevitable that you should occupy yourself with that great American statesman from your own State, who, like yourself, saw American life steadily and saw it whole. Because of your contribution to America and to American literature we today confer upon you our degree of doctor of letters.

Mr. VOORHIS: Horace William Baden Donegan, rector of St. James Church in this city since 1933 and, previous thereto, assistant rector of All Saints Church in Worcester, Mass., and latterly rector of Christ Church, Baltimore; educated at St. Stephens College, Oxford University, and Episcopal Theological School; trustee of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine and of other notable agencies of the Protestant Episcopal denomination; enhancing the rich traditions of distinguished ministerial service in a singularly influential parish, and at the same time devoting himself with conspicuous success to concerns of social and spiritual welfare that traverse the broadest reaches of the faith, he is a benefactor of us all, and we would now pronounce upon him a fervent benediction in the form of our honorary doctorate of divinity.

Chancellor CHASE: Horace William Baden Donegan, head of one of the important parishes of your church in this city for the last 7 years, you have demonstrated qualities of religious leadership of a distinctive character, while at the same time you have administered with great skill the affairs of your parish. It is with pleasure that we now confer upon you our degree of doctor of divinity.

Mr. VOORHIS: Nathan Bristol Van Etten, today celebrating his fiftieth anniversary of graduation from our former tributary, Bellevue Medical College, has not only served a full half century in the general practice of medicine in this city, but extended widely the benefits of his wisdom and experience through high medical executive capacities: President of Morrisania City Hospital, and Union Hospital, past president of the Bronx Borough, Bronx County, and New York State Medical Societies, of the Greater New York Medical Association, of the New York Society of Medical Jurisprudence, and of the Medical Alumni of this university. Able practitioner and counselor, stanch bulwark against the pandemic threat of quixotic schemes of socialized medicine, he now stands at the threshold of the highest office in the medical profession of this country, the presidency of the American Medical Association. Our prescription for him reads: Doctor of public health.

Chancellor CHASE: Nathan Bristol Van Etten, a half century ago you were graduating from what is now the New York University Medical College. Today you stand here as president-elect of the American Medical Association. The years between have been crowded with achievement. You have taken with high seriousness the oath of your profession. You have been active in promoting the service of that profession to the public good. For what you have done, and for your active pursuit of the ideals you symbolize, we now pronounce you doctor of public health of New York University.

Mr. VOORHIS: John Philip Hogan, president of the American Society of Civil Engineers. For 25 years following graduation in arts and science at Harvard, he served this city with conspicuous ability, particularly in the realization of that life-giving miracle, the Catskill Aqueduct. In subsequent professional practice he has become recognized as an outstanding authority on water supply and related problems. As military engineer in France during the first World War, he received many deserved citations and was raised to high command. As vice president and chief engineer of the New York World's Fair, he not only directed its vast and inexorable schedule of construction but was responsible for the solution of the fundamental problem of giving the waterlogged and waste-incrusted meadows of Flushing requisite stability for construction. Engineer extraordinary, he is presented for our honorary engineering doctorate.

Chancellor CHASE: John Philip Hogan, in the profession you adorn none has rendered greater service than you. Your latest achievement is the solution of the difficult engineering problems that were associated with the building of a world's fair on Flushing Meadow. The verdict of your own colleagues is abundantly evident in your presidency of the American Society of Civil Engineers. In recognition of your great professional services we now name you honorary doctor of engineering.

Mr. VOORHIS: Gano Dunn, native New Yorker, alumnus of City College and of the engineering school at Columbia; president of the J. G. White Engineering Corporation since 1913; past president of the New York Electrical Society, the American Institute of Electrical Engineers, and the United Engineering Society; past chairman of the Engineering Foundation and the National Research Council; effective officer and delegate at many international scientific congresses; able counselor of national defence agencies; honored member of a score of distinguished professional and learned societies; valued director and trustee of various banking, industrial, and educational establishments; president of the Cooper Union for Advancement of Science and Art; humanist and man of affairs; he is presented for the degree of doctor of science.

Chancellor CHASE: Gano Dunn, in the midst of a crowded professional career, the latest achievement of which is the streamlining of the island of Haiti, you have somehow found time for so many varieties of public service that the mere recounting of them would turn this citation into a biographical essay. These are matters of record for all men to read. You have contributed to education, to business, to national and international affairs, and all your life you have been concerned with the advancement of science in many fields. You are entitled to any honorary degree in the whole category, but we have chosen that of doctor of science, which I now confer upon you.

Mr. VOORHIS: Frank Aydelotte, A. B., Indiana; A. M., Harvard; B. Litt., Oxford; American secretary to the Rhodes trustees since 1918, and president for the past 10 years of the American Association of Rhodes Scholars; sometime normal and high-school teacher of English and professor of that subject at Indiana University and M. I. T.; trustee of leading foundations for the advancement of learning; president of Swarthmore College for the past 19 years, where he repaired the plumbing, extended the plant, bolstered the endowment, pioneered the "honors" movement among American colleges, sweetened faculty salaries, balanced the budget, and brought tears to the students when he announced last fall his withdrawal to accept the directorship of that crowning citadel of higher education in this country—the Institute for Advanced Study at Princeton; scholar, educator, administrator, author, editor—doctor of laws of New York University, if you please, Mr. Chancellor.

Chancellor CHASE: Frank Aydelotte, the degree we give you today bears witness both to our recognition of what you have done for the cause of education and to our faith in what, as head of the Institute for Advanced Study, you will be doing over the years that lie ahead. For myself, I hail you as a respected and admired colleague, and with genuine pleasure I confer upon you our degree of doctor of laws.

Mr. VOORHIS: Leslie Jay Tompkins, bachelor of science, New York University, 1890; bachelor of laws, 1892; master of science, 1894; master of laws, 1897; and doctor of jurisprudence, 1903. Amidst service at the bar these many years, membership in the New York Assembly, right-hand aid to the New York district attorney, and the writing of erudite and practical works on various branches of the law and the practice thereof, he has maintained for nearly 50 years an official connection with this institution, successively as librarian, assistant treasurer, registrar, and for the past 41 years as professor of law. Verily has his useful life been translated nobly and indefeasibly into the vital structure of this institution; wherefore we tender him, in grateful acknowledgement, the honorary degree of doctor of laws.

Chancellor CHASE: Tommy, you received your first degree from New York University just 50 years ago. Two years later you became actively associated with New York University, and it has never been the same since. Your hand helped in many, many ways to guide its destiny. For more than 50 years you have been guilty of conspiracy in that you have helped to train men and women for bar and bench. Yours has been a useful, a distinguished, and a productive career, typical of the highest ideals of your profession. Therefore, and in consideration thereof, we now tender you, under the hand and seal of your alma mater, the degree of doctor of laws, to have and to hold in perpetuity.

Military Establishment Appropriation Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

Monday, June 10, 1940

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks I want to express my pleasure over the passage of the Military Establishment appropriation bill, and especially my gratification for the inclusion of the item for funds to purchase additional land for Fort Devens, Mass. This increased acreage will be invaluable in training men and in maneuvers. Fort Devens serves as a protection for one of the greatest industrial areas in the country, and this addition to it was needed very badly. I was most interested in the speech of my colleague from Mississippi, Mr. COLLINS. The distinguished gentleman has made an amazing and admirable record in his work for the mechanization of our Army. Some of you may recall that years ago, in fact in 1926, I introduced the first educational order bill in Congress. If the provisions of that measure had been carried out steadily and increased during all these years, we would now have the nucleus for an adequate national defense. We would have the trained personnel available to turn out the war materials very rapidly.

National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH McKELLAR
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, June 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY JACK W. CARLEY

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD a speech recently made by Mr. Jack W. Carley, one of the editors of the Commercial Appeal, Memphis, Tenn. This address is such an eloquent and timely discussion of present-day questions in America and in the world that I take great pleasure in asking that it be printed in the RECORD. It is truly inspiring to have such sentiments expressed.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Commander, comrades, members of the auxiliaries, to all free men and women present; the hallowed soil on which we stand has been bought by those whose bodies rest within at bitter, sacrificial cost.

This is no place for platitudes. This is no time for tears. They who have died for country demand of us something more than that.

Nothing we might say or do here could add one whit to their glory or detract from the sublimity of their sacrifice. Their place is fixed in the history of this Nation for all time. They have been praised in poetry and their deeds are recounted in song.

BETRAYED BY BLINDNESS

They do not need us here this afternoon, but we, my friends, have dire need of them—need of their faith, their courage, and their complete willingness to subordinate self to needs of country.

Somewhere they live on, no longer earthbound to this selfish and insane world, and their voices—if we choose to listen—yet speak to us, aye they cry out to us not to betray them further.

For they have been betrayed by us—betrayed by our blindnesses and our hypocrisies—betrayed through the fact that we have permitted those things for which they died to be threatened with destruction.

They threw us a torch and unless we spring to the alert its flame will go out.

They get nothing out of our coming here this afternoon. We may get something out of it if we will. If we fail to do that then this becomes a futile, blasphemous gesture.

RECENT EVENTS SHOCKING

No war veteran here can possibly misunderstand or fail to see the evil which is abroad. None can fail to view the future with apprehension. There is no longer time for recrimination, no moment in which to wonder how or why we failed. Our obligation is to build now so strongly that the evil winds which blow cannot destroy that which the dead who lie here created—they and their comrades in hundreds of thousands of military and naval graves.

How shocking have been these past few weeks. I cannot help but think as we stand here in this secluded, safe, and quite spot of other American war cemeteries across the seas, two now under fire—two in the hands of an aggressor—and of the land in which those men lie being ravaged and despoiled by the very forces which we a quarter of a century ago hoped had been eliminated for all time.

What a foolish dream it was, and how foolish we to idly go our way thinking that these evil things abroad in the world could never touch us.

MUST ARM FOR FREEDOM

Why, even as we meet here, those who, if they could, would destroy all that the American pattern of life means meet elsewhere to nominate a convicted agent of a foreign government to be President of the United States. What idiocies do we permit, indeed, in the name of freedom.

What mockery have we made of that priceless possession of freedom of speech and free assemblage.

To what strange and unthought-of degree of national impotency in defensive strength have we permitted our indifference and our refusal to see bring us.

And yet we quarrel and equivocate when all the omens, all the whisperings of evil tidings, warn us to gird ourselves as one people, dominated by but one ideal—the perpetuation of freedom with justice.

It is a wonder to me that these graves do not open and those within stand up to damn us for our lethargy and lack of foresight and for our irrationality.

NATION IN DANGER

The whirlwind rises ominously on the horizon, and yet we wait.

This Nation is in danger. What, ask the dead, are we going to do about it?

Money alone, billions of it, will not, of itself, do the job.

First of all it is going to take faith and a rededication of the soul and spirit to the things which we hold to be primarily and fundamentally American.

It is going to take concerted will to do.

It is going to take manpower and it is going to demand sacrifice of free and easy methods and free and easy thinking.

This task which must be done is not going to permit of petty, partisan political bickering. It is going to demand that those with great ambition place national zeal above self-desire.

It is going to require that there be rooted out all internal activities which have as a goal the destruction of the American pattern, and that the rooting out be done without fear or favor.

It is going to require all that we possess in way of national energy and native ingenuity. Not the least of the tasks before us is to clean our own house without, at the same time, resorting to the abhorrent methods by which totalitarianism succeeds. This Nation must be stern with the agents of the dark within, but it must be fair and it must be careful lest hysteria and injustice become motivating forces.

So far as this Nation alone is involved in the chaos spreading over the earth, there is no sure prior pattern for action. We do not yet know all which we will have to defend. Circumstance may widen our orbit at any hour, but while we are preparing for the storm it is equally essential that our neighbors prepare, particularly those to the south.

The term "good neighbor" is high sounding. It is important that we keep our eyes open lest it be as deceptive as it is high-sounding. Good neighbors are not those whose premises have a satisfactory outward appearance and at the same time permit rotten things within. If there's to be national house cleaning there must be international house cleaning on this hemisphere from Cape Horn to the Great Lakes. The Dominion to the north is already doing her cleaning.

There is no use building a barrier at the front door if the back is to be left wide open. Malarial control in Shelby County would be ineffective if our neighboring counties failed to take similar steps. The elimination of subversive groups in this country will be only partly effective if our neighbors continue to permit colonization by totalitarian groups. The enlistment of all of the American republics in a common cause is only one of the major tasks to be accomplished.

SANITY NEEDED

If ever in the history of this Nation there has been need for complete sanity in leadership, it is now. This is no hour for political claptrap or partisan, political jousting. It is imperative that the voices of acknowledged military, naval, and industrial experts be permitted to prevail. We must believe in the quality of their reasoning and take their advice.

No great national effort such as this emergency demands—and this is a grave emergency—can be successful unless there is complete harmony among all elements—among political leaders, among industry, among labor, among the military and naval forces. We must demand and see to it that harmony prevails and that no one element uses the other as a stepping stone to selfish goals.

There are some things which cannot and will not be permitted and those who underestimate the temper and energy of the mass of American people in that respect are blind indeed. The sight of a felon running for office of President of the United States, and as the representative of an international political force which seeks world revolution and the destruction of all Christianity and civilization implies does not set well with present American temper and energy.

The sight of a shipyard, wherein are being built vitally needed naval vessels, tied up by a strike which could have been averted had reason been permitted to prevail at a conference table, does not set well on the conscience of the American people.

VETERANS KNOW SACRIFICE

The thing that each of us has got to recognize is that each must make sacrifices commensurate with the national need. It is better to give up a little or much now than to have to give up all we possess and all we hold dear later.

I believe we veterans know what giving up means and what the word "sacrifice" in behalf of others means. Our knowledge was not acquired the easy way. The harmony which we demand of others must prevail, too, among the living veterans of this Nation. The energy and the voice represented by all the veterans of wars in this Nation is strong. We have been taught a high concept of duty. We know what is loyalty and what is disloyalty. Let the voices of the war veterans speak in unison and those in high places will not dare ignore it.

There is no human being, no matter how exalted his position, or how great his resources for information, who can foretell where, when, or how the present conflict which shows every sign of spreading, is going to end. No element is so difficult to control once it is unleashed than that force we call war.

In many respects the history of a quarter century ago is being repeated with painful monotony. Old lines have been reestablished, old sectors are being reoccupied in many instances by the very men who fought in them in the war that was to have ended all wars. So closely is the old pattern followed that even regiments occupy the very areas they occupied once before.

On the other hand, there are some elements which are entirely new, and ambition for conquest has reached undreamed-of peaks.

It is no exaggeration to say that this conflict has passed far beyond the point of geographical and territorial considerations—that it has become, at last, a conflict between good and evil as we know them, between civilization as we know it, and a force which will lead us back to beastiality, the jungle, and slavery.

None of us, however, need be afraid of the future if we dare face facts, if we dare sacrifice, and if we guide into the proper channels for strong defensive building the unlimited energy represented by the will of the American people.

If we do the things we know must be done and which we know how to do, come the world against her, this land of free men yet shall stand.

DEMOCRACY BEST

Democracy yet remains the best national system yet devised and this Nation represents the greatest undertaking for democracy which could be conceived. They lie who say that democracy is decadent and that might shall triumph over right.

They lie who say that we cannot achieve as our forefathers achieved.

They lie who say that the Christian way of life is not best and that faith in God and in true national idealism do not provide the right way to national contentment.

There is work to do. Voices call to us from behind the Concord walls, from the waters of Lake Erie, from the beach at Tripoli, from Gettysburg and San Juan, from atop the China wall, from the forest in Argonne—call us to be on guard and to do the job the way the dead did theirs—with full valor and full desire.

Let's have done with useless chatter. Let's do this job as these men, lying here, demand through us, demand that it be done, now, and in such a way that no victor, however mad he may be, will dare strike.

This ground here is sacred.

It shall be kept sacred—free from desecration by any tyrant—whoever he may be.

The Congress of the United States Should Continue At Its Duties During This Critical Time

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 10, 1940

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, for the past 10 days I have been firmly convinced that Congress should remain in session. I have come to this considered conclusion after weighing what I believe to be all factors that should determine a Member in coming to a publicly known position on this matter.

WE MUST KEEP AT POSTS

I have receive many letters from residents of my district and State asking me where I stand on the question of adjournment. I have replied that I felt the people have a right to expect their elected Representatives to remain at their posts of duty in these times of stress. It is impossible for any of us to foretell what may happen from one week to the other; in fact, from one day to the next. As Members of Congress we should be ready to meet the problems which are certain to confront us increasingly in the immediate future. We can best do this by standing by to discharge our duties.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot too strongly state my feeling at this hour on the possibility of adjournment of this session of the Congress. We have a responsibility as individual Members to share the burden with the Chief Executive, in being able to promptly cope with situations which can and will arise. We have been chosen by the citizens of the Republic to legislate and safeguard and protect the best interests of this land and its institutions.

PEOPLE ASK CONTINUANCE

I shall be compelled, Mr. Speaker, to vote against the adjournment of Congress when such a resolution comes before our body. I am hoping that the leadership will not go too far with plans for "quitting." I know that the men and women in West Virginia and the other 47 States of the country are not going to look with favor on such a procedure.

There is no doubt in my mind and heart but that the Members of this body desire to do their high patriotic duty in the continued defense preparation for the country. We realize we must not waste time in strengthening the defenses of the Nation.

It is the duty of Congress to provide now, not when it is too late, the means for making the weapons with which to protect ourselves. We do not desire participation in the present war, but if this country is forced into conflict let us be feared by the aggressor who dares to fight against an America which will at all costs continue to preserve its democratic form of government.

ALERT NOW TO DANGER

We are awake to the enemies within our gates. It is tragic that we waited until this hour of danger to weed out those individuals who live in this country, but hold allegiance to lands across the sea. They continue to attempt to tear apart the solidarity of our people and undermine our fine citizenship. We must be increasingly alert to this danger.

Indicative of the growing sentiment of the public on the question of congressional adjournment is the following splendid and thought-provoking editorial from the New York Times of Saturday morning, June 8:

CONGRESS MUST STAY

If the leaders of Congress have not abandoned in their own minds all expectation of an early adjournment, it is time for them to face the fact that the course of events and the interests of the American people simply do not permit of such action. At one of the most critical moments in the world's history, at a time when there is work to be done every day to strengthen the bulwarks of this democracy, it is unthinkable that the institution through which the will of the American people is expressed should shortly go into hibernation for a period of 7 months, subject only to the President's call to meet in special session, abandoning both its obligations and its opportunities.

It is the patriotic duty of Congress to remain in session now, for one reason, because the various defense measures already on its calendar must not receive slipshod attention in a hurried drive to get away from Washington. But that is only a beginning of the responsibilities of Congress. There will be other defense measures the need of which cannot now be foreseen but on which action will be imperative long before snow flies again and Congress meets next January. There is the increasingly critical problem of defense finances that ought to be met without delay; the wholly casual and inadequate "token tax" which is now in view must be supplemented with a far more adequate and more carefully considered tax program, and the sooner we begin the better. There is the need of a defense force which is adequate in manpower as well as matériel; the case for a democratic system of universal compulsory military training has now become overwhelming. Above all, in the great crises which lie ahead, in the dark hours that may bring news which will profoundly shock this country, it is proper that Congress should be continuously in session so that it may share the responsibilities of the Executive and speak with the voice of the American people.

The right course of action is plainly to recess for the two conventions and then come back to work. That will be hot and uncomfortable. It will spoil many summer plans. But the American people have every right to expect patience, fidelity, and intelligence on the part of their chosen representatives in such a crisis as we face today.

OBLIGATION IS CLEAR

Yes, Mr. Speaker, the people of the United States do have the right to expect their Members of Congress to continue on the job, and with patience, fidelity, and intelligence—meet the crisis. We must not fail them now. Devotion to duty demands our facing of the facts—our obligation is clear.

HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO

OF MICHIGAN

STATEMENT BY HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO, OF MICHIGAN

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement made by me before the House Committee on the Judiciary in support of resolution introduced by the gentleman from New Jersey, the Honorable CLARENCE J. MCLEOD, before the Judiciary Committee of the House, House Concurrent Resolution 55:

We stand today the most favored nation on earth. Representing 7 percent of the population of the world, we have created and possess more in material wealth than most, if not all, of Europe combined. On 6 percent of the world's acreage we provide one-half of the world's foodstuffs. On the youth of this Nation we expend each year for public education as much money as the rest of the world combined. Our cultural attainments are equal to, if not superior to, our material possessions.

Here we enjoy the rights, privileges, opportunities, and freedom unknown to other peoples and their governments. Here we have established a standard of living and a way of life that has become the envy of other civilizations and nationalities in the Old and New World. From the very beginning of this Government, we have extended a beckoning and a welcoming hand to the oppressed and underprivileged people of other lands. We have invited them to come here, find an asylum, and share the gift of freedom and human rights established in this hemisphere for the first time in history.

Those people and their descendants now constitute the great masses of our people. Countless thousands came to share and enjoy the blessings of humanity which their own land did not provide.

Paradoxical as it may seem, we now discover that a misguided, misled, and recalcitrant minority, but militant and vocal, seeks to destroy, by subtle and subversive means through force, violence, and bloodshed if necessary, every principle of liberty and justice that their ancestors and kindred embraced with an appreciation known only to those released from bondage.

We may be the richest country on the globe but we shall also be the most stupid if we stand idly by, shirk our clear and undebatable duty as representatives of a free people without taking prompt and effective measures to combat, destroy and overcome the very forces that seek to destroy us.

It is my firm conviction that it is within the purview of our Constitution that our sovereign state has the right to maintain itself. Assuredly we have the right to repel a foe from without, and just as certainly we have the right to attack a foe from within. The objective of both is or may be the same.

We have done very little to meet the treasonable activities of the "fifth column" subversive groups known to be in our midst.

The Dies committee apparently is the only agency of the Government that has openly undertaken the task of ferreting out and turning the spotlight of publicity on the danger that lurks on our very doorstep.

The brazen purpose, openly stated and secretly served, fostered and abetted by dictators in Europe, of Communists, and other alien groups working to overthrow this Government, have proceeded unchecked, and have been encouraged by the indifference of government itself. To pamper, coddle, dine, and employ, without reason, the enemies of our freedom and our country, will not be tolerated by the people of this Nation. Such practices are repugnant to the conscience and offensive to the patriotism and loyalty of the American people. The time has come when we must strike quickly and hard. Brute force seems to be the only yardstick in the world. Self-preservation is an inborn instinct of the animal kingdom, and it is also the law of individuals and nations.

One of the proposed instruments of attack on these groups that are boring from within is the resolution of my able and distinguished friend and colleague the gentleman from Michigan, Congressman CLARENCE J. MCLEOD, now before this committee for consideration.

It suggests and asks action on the part of the legislatures of the States for the enactment of laws prohibiting or denying the use of the American ballot by any party, political or otherwise, that seeks to overthrow this Government by force. It may be argued that such action may be unconstitutional; that it might violate the first amendment to the Constitution, the Bill of Rights.

The Constitution gives to every individual the right to discuss freely any and all questions; to criticize public officials for their opinion and their acts. But I do not believe the Constitution is so broad that it permits anyone to advocate the destruction of the Government.

The Communist Party is not a political party. It advocates the overthrow of this Government through revolution if necessary. It has had a ticket on the American ballot. A political party seeks the election of candidates to public office who shall administer the established form of government. The Communist Party hopes to elect candidates to public office to destroy the established form of government and, therefore, is a revolutionary party not entitled to any rights in the machinery of the American ballot system.

The resolution before this committee is a timely and patriotic proposal. It has my full and complete support. I appeal to this committee to report it unanimously to the House of Representatives for action.

Eternal vigilance is still the price of freedom.

ESSAYS BY CAROLYN GUTERMUTH, ARCANUM, OHIO, AND JOAN SENDELBACK, DELPHOS, OHIO

Mr. JONES of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, it is my distinct pleasure and honor to have two winners of the American Legion Americanization Essay Contest in my district.

The American Legion has sent to me the winning essays of my constituents, Miss Carolyn Gutermuth, of Arcanum, Ohio, and Miss Joan Sendelback, of Delphos, Ohio.

Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include these two winning essays:

THE BILL OF RIGHTS—MY PROTECTION

(By Joan Sendelback, Delphos, Ohio)

The wisest and best insurance policy ever issued was the one written nearly 150 years ago when our forefathers, seeking to insure for all time to come those inalienable rights of men as set forth in the Declaration of Independence, added to the Constitution the first 10 amendments, commonly known as the Bill of Rights.

The rights set forth in these amendments set America apart from every other nation on the face of the earth. It is these rights which attract millions of immigrants to "the land of the free," to a new home, a new life, a new country, which guarantees to them the very rights and privileges denied by their own government. Being forced to seek them elsewhere, they found them in a new government, which guaranteed them, not out of generosity but because they are the God-given rights of every man regardless of race, creed, or color. The 10 amendments in the Bill of Rights are then the greatest safeguard to our freedom, to our democracy.

The most important of these 10 is the first amendment, which states in the pact that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press." Because of this amendment, I can worship God according to the dictates of my conscience, and worship the God of my heart, not of the state.

Because of this amendment, too, I can think and speak openly without fear of dread secret police or concentration camps. Yes; the Bill of Rights guarantees freedom of speech and press even to those who seek to undermine the foundation of the democracy which grants them these privileges—privileges denied them by their own government.

The next important amendment is the fourth which declares that the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation and particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things seized. This amendment protects me against seizure for political reasons or for any other reason where there is no clear or just cause, and protects my property against search or seizure without a lawful and valid reason. In other words it substantiates the old proverb that "a man's home is his castle."

By the fourth and fifth amendments I am guaranteed protection from being held to answer for a crime unless indicted by a grand jury and, if so indicted, I am entitled to a "speedy and public trial," by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime was committed. I cannot be arrested and sentenced to prison merely for political views as is being done in so many lands today. I have every right and opportunity to prove myself innocent of the crime, and if once proven innocent I cannot be arrested again for the same offense.

The eighth amendment guarantees that any fine or punishment inflicted upon me shall be in proportion to the crime committed. This amendment prevents a recurrence of earlier history where many were sentenced to death for crimes which today are considered trivial misdemeanors.

To safeguard those of our rights which are not specifically set forth in the Constitution, the ninth amendment was added, preventing the Government from depriving us of any of our God-given rights merely because they are not mentioned in the Constitution.

Thus we can see that the Bill of Rights is our greatest heritage, our best insurance, our greatest protection guaranteed to us because it is our right, given to us by God, the giver of all good things.

THE BILL OF RIGHTS—MY PROTECTION

(By Carolyn Gutermuth, Arcanum, Ohio)

Last night the more I pondered over the title of this year's American Legion essay, the more absurd it seemed. A mere scrap of paper my protection! How silly! I would leave that service to the police department. I could see a big, brawny policeman several times a day patroling his beat past our house.

What could I write about? Oh, yes; I know; that 12 amendments to the Constitution had been proposed in 1789 and that 10 of these had been ratified in 1791. Later, these amendments became known as the Bill of Rights. I knew all that. They stated very specifically certain rights to which I was entitled and which the Federal or State Government could not deny me.

But that was simply a matter of history, which anyone might read. Finally I gave up and went to bed. I slept and dreamed—

I was in a large house plainly but strongly constructed of enduring granite. The house stood on a small rocky island, surrounded by an angry sea. The huge frothing waves broke incessantly upon the rocks and tore viciously at the very foundation of the house, trying again and again to sweep it to destruction.

The house stood firm and unshaken. As I watched these savage waves in their wild fury, I was glad for the protection of this house.

Over the door was chiseled deep in stone the name, a strange name—"The Bill of Rights."

From the window I could see the waves cut deep crevices in the rocky island. By an odd coincidence, these crevices appeared to form the word "Constitution." But as the waves receded these crevices filled immediately with the rocky soil, leaving the island intact.

As I continued to watch, I was amazed to see words in huge letters appear on the crest of the menacing waves—dictatorship, intolerance, forbiddance of peaceful assembly, suppression of control of religion, suppression of free speech, controlled presses, government control of radios, prohibition of the right to keep and bear arms, violation of personal property and effects, confiscation of personal wealth, trial without indictment by grand jury, quartering of soldiers in homes, trial delayed again and again, convictions without trial by an impartial jury, third-degree tactics, illegal imprisonment, denial of right to legal defense, excessive fines, prohibitive bail, too severe punishments for minor crimes, despotic powers of government, political persecutions, race prejudices, blood purges.

These are the terrifying waves which were dashing against this house, trying to undermine it and destroy me.

Suddenly I realized I was not alone. The house was filled with people; people of every race and creed, the rich and poor, the young and old, the educated and the ignorant, the sick, the lame, and the blind—America's millions safe within the protecting walls of this house, called the Bill of Rights.

The lawless waves continued to pound. The house stood firm, a bulwark of protection in a storm-tossed sea.

When I awoke, the dream stayed with me. It was so real I was glad to be an American, whose forefathers had builded so wisely and well. Here in my house, the Bill of Rights, constructed on the firm ground of the Constitution, I was safe from the storms of the world.

EDITORIAL FROM THE EDISON (NEBR.) ECHO

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, the following editorial appeared in the Edison Echo published at Edison, Nebr. Mr. John Stevens, the writer of this editorial, is a man of mature years who has been a leader in public matters throughout that territory for a long time. I commend this to the Members of Congress, and I hope they will read it very carefully.

[From the Edison (Nebr.) Echo]

Those people who claim that a man may get too old to learn are mistaken. We are now learning a new meaning for the word "neutrality," and some other people are going to have to learn it too. Heretofore the guy who didn't give a darn which side won a war and wouldn't do a thing to help either side has been considered neutral; but that is no longer true. In the present war in Europe you are not going to be accepted as a neutral unless you are strongly pro-British. If you don't care who wins the war and are not willing to help on either side, then you are a pro-German and the council of defense will make you kiss the British flag and some brave patriot will come in the nighttime and paint your buildings yellow.

And another thing you are going to learn is what defense means. Billions of American dollars are being appropriated under that name, to be used to carry on a war wherein we have nothing at all to defend. The spending is being done for means to carry on a war across the ocean, and not to defend our own country. We have been told that Omaha and cities similarly located are open to aerial attack from Europe, but not a cent is proposed to be spent to prepare Omaha or any other inland city to defend itself against such attack. If it be true that such cities are subject to such attack, then they should be prepared to defend against it.

However, if you don't like any of the military and political maneuvers of the present and want to remonstrate against any of them, you had better speak quickly and talk fast, for the time is coming when you will have to shut up and pretend to like it whether you do or not. That thing that Lindbergh called hysterical chatter is sweeping the country and the victims of the hysteria are in the saddle, so you had best be careful what you say—or think.

There is an effort to increase the jitters by the prediction that Italy will enter war on Germany's side. The things that are already being accomplished indicate that Italy and Spain are both actively aiding Germany, and the Allies haven't found it out. Hitler could not do all that unaided, and it is probable that he would not have undertaken it unaided. So if we are going to fight to save the King we may as well understand that we will have to fight Italy and Spain.

PRIZE-WINNING ESSAY BY EDITH ROETHER, McCOMB, OHIO

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, for several years the American Legion of the State of Ohio has sponsored an annual essay contest on subjects dealing with Americanism. This year the subject was Bill of Rights—My Protection. Pupils from the 4 highest grades of school were eligible to compete in this contest and 3 are selected from each grade as State winners, totaling 12 in number. The number of participants have increased each year until this year it reached 150,000.

It gives me great pleasure to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the essay of Miss Edith Roether, McComb, Ohio, a constituent of mine, who was awarded 1 of the 12 prizes offered in this contest.

THE BILL OF RIGHTS—MY PROTECTION

I shall always keep on my desk the paperweight of the three little monkeys. In addition to the lesson it has always taught, "see no evil, hear no evil, speak no evil," it serves to remind me of what I would be like without my protection, the Bill of Rights: a hand over my eyes to keep me from seeing the truth, a hand over my ears to keep me from hearing the truth, and a hand over my mouth to keep me from speaking the truth when I see and hear it.

The Bill of Rights has removed the hand from my eyes. They can be opened wide, if I myself will let them be, to see truth and right. The hand is gone from my ears, and I may hear the truth. It is gone from my mouth, and I may speak freely the opinions which I believe to be right.

Like many of the people of Europe today, I am not a puppet to be moved at will by the hands of a controller who holds the strings. I am free to speak, to assemble, to petition, and to worship as I will, so long as I do not destroy the rights of others for which my country stands.

I may thank the Bill of Rights for the fact that "my home is my castle." My home, my person, my papers and effects are secure against unreasonable searches and seizures.

If I am arrested on the charge of breaking the just laws of my county, the Bill of Rights again protects me and gives meaning to the court axiom, "A man is innocent until proven guilty." I am assured at all times of fair treatment in prosecution, trial, and punishment. In all criminal prosecutions I enjoy the right of a speedy trial by an impartial jury and the right to be justly defended. I am protected from excessive fines and cruel punishment. In suits at common law, where the value in controversy exceeds $20, I have the right of trial by jury.

In addition to the enumerated rights in the bill which I possess, the ninth article further protects me by declaring that the eumeration of these rights cannot be construed to deny others retained by me.

When I see the state of other countries of the world today, I realize how wise the early citizens of my country were in insisting that the Bill of Rights become part of our Constitution. Without it our Constitution might have been just another brilliant document to be twisted to mean what a ruling mind would have it mean. The Bill of Rights has made my Constitution and my country the leaders of democracy. The end of American democracy would be the end of my protection; the Bill of Rights and I will work with the rest of the American youth to keep my protection secure.

Wool Under Reciprocal-Trade Agreement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK O. HORTON

OF WYOMING

Monday, June 10, 1940

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, Assistant Secretary Grady of the State Department will tell you that no tariff reduction was made on wool, but that is because he does not know anything about wool or sheep. Since he can probably add and subtract, he no doubt would tell you that 10 sheep would be left after 5 of a bunch of 15 jumped through a hole in the hedge. Wrong; there would not be any left.

Just like wool. They did not lower the duty on wool. They just lowered the duty on wool 50 percent, and to judge from their shadow-boxing they do not know it yet. Sure, they call it rags and waste over there—city-slicker stuff—that is so they can ship it in under the 50-percent tariff reduction.

Rags over there, but virgin wool over here. If you do not believe it, just ask the objectors to the truth-in-fabrics bill.

Because of this 50 percent tariff reduction on wool a total of 794,436 pounds of wool rags was imported in 1938, and 8,417,818 pounds in 1939, or an increase of 1,060 percent. Of this total, 465,257 pounds of rags were imported in 1938 from the United Kingdom alone, and 6,163,722 pounds from the United Kingdom in 1939, or an increase of 1,325 percent since the reciprocal-trade agreement with Great Britain.

Naturally the war is slowing up imports, but if there is any England left after this war there will certainly be millions of pounds of blood-soaked rags (virgin wool) find their way to our shores and into the fabrics that some of your kids wear.

A pretty thought, is it not?

No one can tell what this war is going to mean in depreciated currencies, but there is no doubt that win or lose, we are in for the greatest economic upset of all time.

It does seem like a fool time to be virtually throwing our markets open to the world.

Well, after 7 years of being caught without our umbrella we should be getting used to a soaking.

Launching of Steamship "Exchequer"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM M. COLMER

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 10, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. WILLIAM M. COLMER, OF MISSISSIPPI

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I present herewith a short speech made by me at my home town of Pascagoula, Miss., on June 8. The occasion was the launching of the steamship Exchequer built for the Maritime Commission. The launching of this great ship is another incident in our preparedness program. The whole launching program was broadcast by the Columbia Broadcasting System. The speech follows:

Mr. Chairman, distinguished guests, my fellow citizens, it was my privilege to make a few remarks on the occasion of the laying of the keel of this great vessel, it would seem, only a few weeks ago. It is, therefore, with distinct pleasure and gratification that I have returned in a flying trip from the stirring scenes in the Capitol of the greatest democracy on earth to join you, my neighbors and friends, to participate in your jubilation at the launching of this beautiful ship. As we as Mississippians and Americans look upon this mighty product of brains, brawn, steel, and sweat, our hearts exult with gratitude and justifiable pride. For here we shall shortly witness a spectacle resplendent in its glory and magnificent in its achievement as the good ship Exchequer glides majestically into the placid waters of the singing river. Today our thoughts go back to a period of more than a year ago when a group of civic-minded citizens headed by our friend and neighbor, the dynamic and unselfish Hermes Gautier, set about to bring this plant here. This ship represents the fruition of all of our dreams. It is not only the largest ship ever launched within the borders of the great State of Mississippi; it is not alone the most modern ship of its type; but it also represents the greatest tonnage ever assembled anywhere in the world in the form of an all-welded bottom. It is a far cry from the canoe of the Pascagoula Indians, which was first launched on the banks of this historic river to this great leviathan of the deep.

Moreover, the launching of this ship marks the acquisition of another unit in the Nation's program of national defense. For after a disheartening decline in our merchant marine in the decade between 1920 and 1930, the American Congress created the United States Maritime Commission, which is so effectively restoring American strength on the seven seas. The United States Maritime Commission has devised and is now executing a 10-year program for replacing the obsolete vessels in our merchant fleet, which will provide this Nation with the fastest and most efficient, and probably the most modern, fleet of merchant vessels in the world. The Exchequer, which you admire here today, is a prime example of the efforts of this Government to bring about this muchly desired objective. A cargo vessel of the C–3 type, she will do better than 17 knots. Her cargo-handling machinery is among the most efficient in existence. Her navigating equipment, as well as her propulsion machinery, will give the utmost in safety as well as economy of operation. In the event of war she and her 32 sister ships, now constructed or under construction, can effectively supply the fleet. If that should not be necessary, they can transport the strategic raw materials which will be needed by this country in the event of such a national crisis. An efficient merchant-marine fleet is as essential in times of war as are the mighty battleships under direct control of the Navy. It is true that vessels of this type are not combat ships in the sense of waging a naval battle, but of equal importance is the fact that each merchant ship can be used to bring the materials and products necessary to the intense industrial effort involved in a modern war. Tin, chromium, manganese, and rubber are as essential under modern warfare in a great national crisis as are men and guns.

The construction of these Maritime ships thus being as much a part of our national defense as the wearing of a uniform or the shouldering of a gun, I am confident that every man, from the humblest Negro laborer who handles a piece of timber to the skilled draftsman who lays out the plans of the ship, is fully aware of the importance and the patriotism of their several endeavors. So-called "fifth column" activities, sabotage, and other subversive activities should be frowned upon in the important task of building this portion of the Nation's defense line as strongly as they would be condemned in the armed or naval forces in our first line of national defense.

Let every American who enters yonder gates to perform his daily task consider himself as much a patriot as he who wears the uniform of a sailor, a marine, or a soldier in the armed forces of his country. God forbid that this country, the haven of the oppressed—the home of the free—and the beneficiary of the heritage left us by our forefathers in the greatest model of free Government ever conceived by the human mind, should fall prey to a foreign foe as the result of internal dissension and domestic quarrels. Let us go forward as one great united American people in a common fight, should the occasion demand, against a common enemy of our democratic form of government. United, backed by the greatest natural resources in the world, we cannot fail.

Modern wars as we are now witnessing abroad are no longer fought upon fields of chivalry, nor are they won by patriotism alone. No longer can we rely upon a patriotic upsurge of activity after trouble confronts us. Poland, Czechoslovakia, Belgium, Norway, and Holland, as well as England and France, now only too sadly realize that the only answer to the would-be world dictators is a preparedness program which permits the aggrieved nation to meet force with superior force. So today, our Nation, which you and I love better than our own lives, is engaged in a preparedness program to meet that force not with equal force but with superior force should the occasion arise. In our combat ships—the first line of the country's defense—under the authority of Congress we have built since 1933, or now have under construction, a total of 160 ships. When our present program is completed our Navy will have an aggregate tonnage of more than 2,000,000 tons, which will comprise a Navy of approximately 522 vessels all told. The present program of the Maritime Commission is none the less ambitious. In an effort to be prepared for any eventuality as well as the peaceful pursuit of international trade in the field of merchant marine, the Maritime Commission is engaged in a program for the construction of 152 ships. The Exchequer is the forty-seventh to be launched; 36 are already in operation. This Maritime Commission program alone will cost in excess of $150,000,000. Over $20,000,000 of this money will be spent in Pascagoula alone. It is hoped that the Exchequer will be but the forerunner of many more ships of the 500-ship program of the Maritime Commission which will be built at Pascagoula.

For that matter I shall here and now be so bold as to prophesy that before many more months have passed we shall be building destroyers and other smaller combat boats for the naval fleet here on the Mississippi coast. Nature has bounteously and lavishly created the natural facilities for such an undertaking.

It can therefore readily be seen that as a result of this gigantic program this country is in a far better position with regard to its need for both naval and nonnaval ships than it was in 1914 when the clouds of war, which are now engulfing Europe for a second time in our generation, first descended upon the Old World. At that time the United States had but 93 ships of this type available for use in foreign trade.

The American people have always been a peace-loving people. Never has the American sword been unsheathed in the cause of imperialistic conquest. Never has an American gun been fired in a war of exploitation, conquest, or self-aggrandizement. We have ever followed a policy as a nation of live and let live. American wars without a single exception have been fought upon the noble heights of idealistic government and stabilization of world order. America today wants no war. Having learned its lesson on previous occasions, America now has no thought of setting out in another war with the purpose of making the world safe for democracy. The thought uppermost in American minds everywhere is to be let alone and allowed to follow the paths of peaceful pursuit of normal existence. But as our eyes scan the world horizon and we see the death struggle for power on the one hand and for national existence on the other, we realize that it would be asinine stupidity of the worst type for us to stick our heads in the sand like the proverbial ostrich and fail to prepare for any eventuality. Self-preservation and national existence, not to mention the preservation of our cherished philosophy of government, as set out in the Declaration of Independence, are obligations of the most vital and compelling importance. So today, we in America, peace-loving as we are, are concerning ourselves with the necessity of preparing to meet such an eventuality. Every loyal American insists that this preparation go forward with accelerated speed lest our land, and our people too, be left to the mercy of a foreign aggressor or a combination of foreign powers who might see fit to launch a "blitzkrieg" at this Nation—the wealthiest prize in the Western Hemisphere. Americans everywhere as a united people have willed that they shall not come, they shall not see, they shall not conquer.

Finally, my friends, you and I have gathered here on this historic spot from far and near to witness this resplendent spectacle of the launching of this great ship as another bulwark in our national defense. As a community recognized for its hospitality, we are, indeed, happy to welcome within our gates and have present with us on this colorful occasion so many friends from neighboring cities. We especially recognize the gracious presence of the officials of the Maritime Commission and the executive vice president of the American Export Lines, Mr. Slater, and his staff, who will operate the Exchequer when it is completed. In the name of the President of the United States—that great man who in this time of peril to civilization is at the helm of the ship of state—Franklin D. Roosevelt; in the name of the American Congress; in the name of the Maritime Commissioners; and in the name of patriotic God-fearing Americans everywhere, I extend the heartiest and most sincere congratulations to Mr. Bob Ingalls, his staff of competent officials, and to every patriotic, home-loving employee of the Ingalls Shipbuilding Corporation, who, by their devotion to and their service of their country, their diligence, their skill, their engineering genius, and their many hours of honest labor, have made possible this great achievement. You have wrought well. You have built a sturdy ship.

All honor to a great, patriotic organization of capital and labor. May the two working shoulder to shoulder continue united and harmonious in the patriotic task before us of shortly making America the mistress of the seas.

EDITORIAL FROM THE WHEELING (W. VA.) INTELLIGENCER

Mr. SCHIFFLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include an editorial from the Wheeling Intelligencer of June 6, 1940:

LET'S BE REALISTIC

It is an inescapable law of economics that there is no such thing as something for nothing. Eventually, one way or another, everything must be paid for.

That is a fact we should keep well in mind as we contemplate the new defense program, the fiscal record of the present administration, and the future of our public business.

Although a great deal has been said and written about debt and taxes and deficits, it is the literal truth that none of this has come home yet to the man in the street. That is so because we haven't yet begun to pay the bill. Taxes haven't caught up to the spending. We still are doing it on borrowed money. So that the average man's reaction to complaints about extravagance is to shake it off with the reflection that he hasn't felt any of it.

But the very fact that we haven't felt the pinch yet makes it certain that the pressure will be doubly severe when it comes.

Let's look at the facts:

When Mr. Roosevelt assumed the Presidency, the public debt stood at approximately $22,500,000,000. It had come up from a low point of around $16,000,000,000 over a period of 6 or 7 years. The fact that the Hoover administration had accumulated a deficit during its 4 years was one of the major talking points of Mr. Roosevelt during the campaign of 1932. He dwelt at length on the dire results of a policy of borrowing to meet deficits, declared that the only practical method of meeting such problems is to quit incurring deficits, and promised to trim public expenditures by a full fourth in order to bring the Budget into balance.

Well, this same public debt today, after 7 years of Mr. Roosevelt, is in the neighborhood of $44,000,000,000, and Congress has just authorized an extension of the over-all-debt limit from $45,000,000,000 to $49,000,000,000.

What the debt will be by the time this year's spending and this year's authorizations are totaled up nobody knows.

So we come to the defense emergency of today with a Treasury not only empty, but forty-odd-billion dollars in the hole. It is not the purpose of this discussion to inquire into why with all this unbelievable spending, Mr. Roosevelt has failed to provide for the national defense. That is water over the dam now. We can't do anything about it. It is everywhere agreed that we must have an impregnable defense. We don't have it. Apparently we haven't anything remotely approaching it. So there's nothing for it but to get busy.

Very well. As a starter, Mr. Roosevelt asked for an immediate appropriation for emergency defense of $1,182,000,000. Remember, appropriations already contemplated for the incoming fiscal year would have pushed the public debt up to or beyond the $45,000,000,000 limit. This is extra. A few days later, he asked for $1,277,000,000 more. Already, therefore, the total cost of regular and emergency defense items has been pushed up to the impressive figure of $4,600,000,000.

There is a great deal of doubt existing as to the ability of the various governmental agencies to spend this much money efficiently as rapidly as it is being appropriated. But they will make the effort. The money, we may be sure, will be spent. And unless past performance means nothing a great deal more will be appropriated before Congress adjourns.

Thus far, bear in mind, we as taxpayers haven't paid a single dollar of this extraordinary cost. True, our taxes for the past several years have been at about the World War peak. Still, they have been meeting but little more than half of the outlay. The New Deal spent $6,000,000,000 in 1934; $7,000,000,000 in 1935; $8,600,000,000 in 1936; $8,400,000,000 in 1937; $7,625,000,000 in 1938; $9,000,000,000 in 1939. During much of this time taxes yielded just about half what was spent.

So that even before any of this new defense spending came along, we were running in the hole, as indicated, from three to four billion dollars a year. Under the best of circumstances, therefore, it would have become necessary either to raise taxes or curtail spending sharply very shortly now, if complete fiscal collapse were to be avoided.

Well, what is the situation now? To date Congress has taken up for consideration a tax bill which is expected, if passed, to raise about a billion dollars a year. It will accomplish this chiefly by raising rates under existing tax laws. There also is some vague talk about curtailing nondefense expenditures.

The billion-dollar tax bill, if passed, will represent the very first direct levy on the taxpayers to meet any of the extraordinary demands of the times. And it is plain that it will only scratch the surface. It will fall several billion dollars short of meeting the new expenditures for defense, to say nothing of meeting ordinary expenses which already, as noted, are running far ahead of revenue.

In short, the people of the United States face, in the immediate future, a tax burden never before dreamed of, much less borne in this country. At the time the new defense spending began Government—local, State, and National—was costing about a third of the national income, if the deficits are taken into consideration. Within a year, at the present rate of acceleration, governmental exactions well may amount to half of the public income. Out of every dollar you earn 50 cents will be earmarked for government.

You haven't felt this yet. But you will very, very soon, regardless of who is in the White House, regardless of what party is in power.

In these circumstances, and in the light of the record, doesn't the situation call above all else for an administration that knows the value of a dollar—an administration that understands and is capable of applying ordinary financial horse sense?

Let Congress Stay and Saw Wood

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HON. ROBERT B. CHIPERFIELD
OF ILLINOIS

EDITORIAL FROM THE GALESBURG (ILL.) REGISTER-MAIL OF JUNE 7, 1940

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Galesburg (Ill.) Register-Mail of June 7:

[From the Galesburg (Ill.) Register Mail of June 7, 1940]

LET CONGRESS STAY AND SAW WOOD

Just at the time when everybody else is being urged to work harder and to slug away all the more earnestly at important business, Congress proposes to pack up and go home.

Month after month of work is tiresome for Congressmen, it is said. So it is for all of us. Congressmen have campaigning to do this fall, they protest. The country isn't interested in that.

The country is interested in getting its work done.

The country is interested in seeing that the armament program is actually followed through and results shown.

The country is interested in seeing that arrangements are made to pay for armament. It is ready to be taxed for security.

For Congress merely to appropriate any requested number of billions of dollars and then go gaily home is not good enough.

Congress may have its faults. But they are the faults of the people. Congress is the people in action. To argue that its presence in Washington would somehow hamper and handicap the preparedness effort seems foolish. We have not reached the point which England reached when it turned everything over to Churchill.

Congress is highly valuable in times like these as a sort of national listening post and broadcasting station in Washington. Its presence should have a steadying influence on the President, a constant reminder that he is responsible to the people, a constant source of strength in the thought that the "other half of the defense team" is still pulling.

A tax bill to take care of increased military expenditures should be passed before Congress adjourns. The old political belief always was that to levy taxes in an election year was unpopular. This year things are different. The Nation is aroused. It may be more unpopular not to levy taxes than to levy them.

The session should not close before definite provisions have been made for the Alaskan and Pan-American Highways. Both are defense measures that should be pushed forward this summer, not next year. Access to Alaska and the Canal Zone will not wait. There are many other vital measures awaiting action.

The European situation cannot be predicted 24 hours in advance. The rise of any morning's sun may look upon some completely unforeseen situation. Congress, direct representative of the people, should be on hand, not at the discretion of the President to recall it, but because, like everybody else these days, it is sticking to its job.

Our Own Back Yard

EDITORIAL FROM THE SALEM ECHO

Mr. POLK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial which appeared in the Salem Echo, published by Ira Gossett Hawk, of Plainview Farm, Lynchburg, Ohio, on June 7, 1940:

[From the Salem Echo]

OUR OWN BACK YARD

Now that Europe has the so-called total war, Americans realize more and more each day that we are not as safe as we thought. Poland, Czechoslovakia, Austria, Norway, Denmark, Belgium, Luxemburg, and Holland. It makes the chills chase up and down our spines when we think of them, but we cannot help it. Still we lose many hours of sleep looking into the future. The more we think of the horror of what is happening in Europe, the more easily we can be influenced by propaganda, which could draw us into the conflict.

Is it our fault that a man is ambitious? Are we responsible for Europe? Instead of getting the mote out of our neighbor's eye. we should take the beam from our own.

With all the unemployment in our own back yard, we have enough to do in putting our own Government on a sound basis, and to clean up our own dirt, without getting the others out of their mess.

What is happening, we seem to be unable to stop, but we can be prepared to do what is best for our country. To be prepared, we must set our house in order.

There are many men working for the Government of the United States of America. Are they there to help and protect their country, or to draw a fat salary?

Do they make laws for the good of the Nation of people, or to derive personal gain? Do we as a people believing in freedom take our Government for granted?

Large organizations invest money in foreign lands, and then when it faces destruction, they want the Nation to help them, consequently drawing us into war. Should we be responsible for companies so situated? They knew they were taking a chance when they invested their money, and weren't they doing it for personal gain?

As in Norway, "fifth columnists" are trying to undermine the governments of every country in the world; but in the United States the lawmakers have taken drastic measures to prevent such tactics here.

We must work for peace if we are to have peace.

We have a wonderful country; but it could be so much better if it were not so selfish, and did things for the good of our homeland. And if people would keep their fingers out of the other fellow's soup, they would not get burned.

LETTER AND BULLETIN FROM FRANCIS X. PHELAN, DEPARTMENT COMMANDER, UNITED AMERICAN VETERANS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include therein a letter received from Francis X. Phelan, Massachusetts department commander of the United American Veterans, in which he enclosed a copy of a bulletin containing interesting, constructive, and affirmative instructions to the members of his organization under his jurisdiction showing active, not passive, cooperation in our national-defense program.

MASSACHUSETTS DEPARTMENT,
UNITED AMERICAN VETERANS,
Boston, Mass., May 27, 1940.

JOHN J. MCCORMACK, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Enclosed please find copy of the plan of action for preparedness adopted by the United American Veterans.

This organization is composed of all men who have served in the armed forces of these United States either in time of peace or war.

If you have any comments or suggestions pertaining to this plan, I would appreciate it very much if you would advise me.

I am,

Very sincerely yours,

FRANCIS X. PHELAN,
Department Commander.

BULLETIN NO. 1

DEPARTMENT HEADQUARTERS,
UNITED AMERICAN VETERANS,
Boston, Mass., May 20, 1940.

Now is the time for calm and deliberate thinking, and we must not become panicky or hysterical, either in our thoughts or actions. While I do not anticipate this country becoming involved in the present European war, I am cognizant of the fact that we are in a state of unpreparedness. If an emergency should ever come the civilian populace will immediately turn to the veterans for guidance. All our members have at some time or other served in the armed forces of this country and have had a military training and which training has taught them to think clearly and act with precision. While the world at this particular time is in a turmoil of war it becomes the duty of the United American Veterans to set aside what other program and objectives they had planned to reach or accomplish and to now devote their time to passing along to the general public their knowledge of how to prepare for an emergency, it it should come, in an intelligent manner. And with this in mind I am submitting to you and all members of the United American Veterans the following plan of action:

1. Classes will be formed for the instruction of the general public and also our own members in the use of gas masks, on the effects of gas, and on the classification of gases. It is suggested that as we have many members who are in the active service and who have received this instruction, they be assigned as instructors.

2. Classes should be formed in the operation and maintenance of field kitchens, with the personnel of each kitchen unit being thoroughly trained in their respective duty. Again, members who are in the active service and who have received this instruction could be used as instructors.

3. First-aid classes to be formed, at which the general information pertaining to first aid would be given. It is suggested that any qualified member of the Red Cross or any other agency familiar with first-aid work be requested to furnish an instructor. The general public should be invited to attend these classes.

4. A classification of all the members in each respective post as to their particular trade be made, listing each member, his address, and his particular trade. The general public could be invited to be classified by the post, and their names added to this list of classifications of trade, these consolidated lists to be sent to the State Department in order that we might be able to turn them over to the proper authorities when the demand for skilled men is needed. I might add that this is a very important function and should be most accurate in its information.

5. That a list will be made of all privately owned motorcars in the city or town in which our respective posts have their headquarters, giving the owner's name, address, registration, and kind of cars, which cars could be used in any emergency if one should arise. It is suggested that at some later date, when each post has made a complete list, that a test mobilization be put on by each post to ascertain just how quickly these cars could be assembled in case of emergency.

6. A complete list of all motortrucks in the city or town in which cur respective posts have their headquarters be made giving the name of the owner, address, tonnage of the truck, and its registration, these trucks to be used for the transportation of material and supplies if an emergency should arise. It is suggested at a future date that a test mobilization of this list be tried to see how promptly these trucks could be assembled in case of an emergency.

7. That all members of each post form themselves into an intelligence unit, always on the alert to ascertain and report any activities that might be suggestive of a "fifth column" or sabotage. This information should be immediately forwarded to the proper officials for investigation. It is suggested classes be formed in intelligence work and qualified instructors be asked to conduct the courses.

8. That the auxiliaries of each and every post immediately form nursing units and sewing units. The nursing units should be formed in classes and instruction given not only in first aid but in the care and evacuation of the sick or injured. The sewing classes should be given instruction in the making of bandages and sterilized pads.

Again I wish to reiterate that I do not offer this program as one of preparing for war but as one for preparing against war. I request that each post commander keep constantly advising this office of their work and accomplishments of the above program.

I am,

Yours in comradeship,

FRANCIS X. PHELAN,
Department Commander.

Amendment of National Labor Relations Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. HALLECK
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, June 10, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Daily News of today:

[From the Washington Daily News of June 10, 1940]

KEEP THAT PIGEONHOLE EMPTY

The Senate Labor Committee is preparing to pigeonhole for the Smith bill to revise the National Labor Relations Act and reform its administration.

This measure passed the House, 2 to 1, last week. But a majority of the Senate committee has long resisted all proposals for change in the Labor Act. And the Senate's Democratic leadership, under administration pressure to get Congress out of Washington in 2 weeks, wants to smother this and other domestic legislation, on the pretext that all attention must be centered on matters of national defense.

Revision of the Labor Act is no minor or purely domestic issue. The need for it, apparent long before the war broke in Europe, is much greater now. The American industrial machine cannot function with the full efficiency demanded by the great task of rearmament if Labor Board officials and employees, biased against industry, are allowed to go on throwing sand on its bearings and monkey wrenches into its cogs. All labor would be wise to welcome this proposal to put sense and justice into the Government's protection of labor's rights. For if, in months to come, the Labor Board continues to function as foolishly and unfairly as in years past, there will be irresistible public demands for something far more drastic than a corrective revision of the Labor Act.

The Senate should demand that its Labor Committee report out the Smith bill promptly for debate and a vote before adjournment. That pigeonhole should be left empty. The Senate cannot afford to abdicate in the face of its duty to the country to finish the job on which the House has done its part.

True Americanism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM W. BLACKNEY
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, June 10, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE FLINT (MICH.) DAILY JOURNAL OF JUNE 7, 1940

Mr. BLACKNEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I am including an editorial published in the Flint Daily Journal of Flint, Mich., under date of June 7, 1940.

In these days when we hear so much of "isms" and "fifth column" activities, it is refreshing to read an editorial embodying old-fashioned Americanism. If our Nation is to exist as we now know it, it must be because our citizenry are devoted to the Constitution, to the flag, and to those great American principles which have become our heritage.

The Dies investigating committee has clearly demonstrated to the Nation that un-American activities exist in our country. The American people, then, should awaken to their responsibility and help rid this country of those whose doctrines are disloyal and whose hatreds of American institutions is apparent.

The United States Supreme Court in a recent decision affirmed the right of a State to require students in school to salute the American flag. While the radicals of the country opposed this decision, loyal citizens everywhere acclaimed it.

The Flint Daily Journal, of Flint, Mich., contained the following editorial upon the decision of the United States Supreme Court heretofore mentioned. This editorial is thoroughly patriotic and American and should be widely read. The editorial follows:

[From the Flint (Mich.) Journal of June 7, 1940]

COMPULSORY

There is not much reason to become unduly excited on the score of ultraliberalism merely because the United States Supreme Court has ruled, in a 8-to-1 decision, that school boards can compel students to salute the American flag.

There is too much disposition sometimes toward relaxing in the direction of undoing the essential ties to patriotism. We are all too much inclined, in the name of freedom, to think that freedom means an exemption from other fundamentals.

Why should any of us object to the salute to the flag? And, how better can the young people be taught the real lessons of our American democracy than by first learning that they must salute the symbol of our democracy.

The lesson we may have learned in the last few years from the obvious evidences of subversive activities in this country is that home defenses need more protection—and the salute to the flag is one of the outward ways of demonstrating genuine loyalty to the cause this country represents.

If there were anything arduous, frightening, or prejudicial in the act of saluting the American flag perhaps disagreement could be taken with this decision of the court. But, since it is the American flag, and considering the meaning of that flag, it is only fitting that this ruling should make us "stand up and cheer."

The Third Army Maneuvers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. LEONARD ALLEN

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 10, 1940

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, the Third Army maneuvers, perhaps the greatest peacetime military concentration in American history, were recently held in the Eighth Congressional District of Louisiana which I have the honor to represent. The fine people of that district appreciate the action of the Government in holding these maneuvers there and I have received good reports of the fine feeling manifested by the people and the soldiers. The Eighth District of Louisiana is well situated for such maneuvers. The Federal Government owns a great deal of the land where the maneuvers were held. As the Representative of the Eighth Congressional District, it has been my happy privilege to cooperate with the military authorities in every respect. I can assure them that they will continue to have our support and cooperation. We welcome the prospect of having 120,000 men in the district for the maneuvers later this year.

Mr. Speaker, in connection with my remarks I include a resolution of the Chamber of Commerce of Alexandria, La.:

Be it resolved by the board of directors of the Alexandria Chamber of Commerce, on motion made and carried, at the conclusion of the Third Army maneuvers, admittedly the greatest peacetime concentration of troops in American history, that the community is proud that its hinterland has served the national interest as the maneuver area and proud also of the opportunity to be host to such a distinguished portion of the Federal military forces as constituted the Third Army; but be it even more especially

Resolved, That the Alexandria Chamber of Commerce, through its board of directors, record the fact that it has been extremely impressed during the period of the maneuvers involving more than 70,000 troops, by the excellent bearing and deportment of the soldiers of the United States Army. At no previous time in the rather lengthy experience which our community has enjoyed with the Regular Army have our citizens been so genuinely pleased with its military visitors as upon this occasion: Be it, therefore, further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States as Commander in Chief of the Armies, to the Secretary of War, the Chief of Staff, to the members of the Military Affairs Committees of both Senate and House, and to the Senators and Congressmen from Louisiana, with the request that it be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Proclamation by the Government to the People of Finland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK E. HOOK

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 10, 1940

PROCLAMATION ISSUED MARCH 14, 1940

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks, I desire to insert into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, a copy of the proclamation of the Government of the Republic of Finland to the people of that brave and harassed country on the occasion of the cessation of the war with Soviet Russia.

The spirit of the people of this northern nation, which, God be thanked, has preserved its independence and freedom in spite of the unwarranted attack of the communistic Soviet Government, is of such a character that we can well take inspiration from it.

Reconstruction is the order of the day, and in a world seething with the bloodiest warfare of all time, Finland tragically holds a torch aloft. I know I speak the wish of millions of Americans when I say: May God bless Finland.

PROCLAMATION BY THE GOVERNMENT TO THE PEOPLE OF FINLAND, MARCH 14, 1940

By a treaty of peace signed yesterday hostilities between Finland and the Soviet Union have been brought to an end.

On the outbreak of hostilities on November 30, the Finnish people took up their defense against the superior forces in a spirit of unanimity which set an example to the whole world. With the same unanimity our army and the Finnish people who supported it by their labors maintained their defensive struggle for three and a half months.

In the defense of the fatherland and our most precious values, thousands of our best men have fallen and even more have sustained permanent injuries. The fatherland will eternally remember their heroic deeds and bless their memory. The number of those, too, who lost their lives behind the front is great.

When the Government of Finland decided to cease hostilities and conclude peace with the Government of the Soviet Union, this step was taken in the firm conviction that the nation would thus be preserved from still greater misfortunes.

By the joint efforts of our heroic and well-led army and the entire nation, and the blood sacrifices of Finnish youth, we have been able, in spite of cessions of territory, to preserve the dearest of our values, our liberty, to save our national honor, and thus redeem for ourselves the right to an undisturbed work of reconstruction.

While the great war still goes on the nation turns from works of war to tasks of peace.

The Government recognizing the sacred memory of the heroic dead and the value of their deeds, is conscious of its duty to embark with all possible speed on the reconstruction of the country. The Government will have specially at heart the care of the dependents of the heroic dead and the invalided. The duty of the Government will further be to take care of the dependents of those lacking private means who lost their lives or were invalided behind the front. One of the first duties will be to see that justice is done to the inhabitants of the ceded areas and their existence speedily organized, and also that homes destroyed in the aerial bombardments are rebuilt.

The nation thus has before it a work of reconstruction and resettlement calling for the utmost exertions and sacrifices. Yet, taking into account the rapid progress made by the nation after it had achieved its independence, the Government believes that this gigantic work will succeed.

At its hour of fate the nation drew together in the protection of the Fatherland in full unanimity. From now onward the nation must tread its path more closely united than ever before. The nation had been steeled by countless reverses. History shows that Finland, thanks to its unyielding tenacity, has before this successfully emerged from times of hardship.

United, trusting in the Almighty and in each other, we go forth to build a new future.

What Is Needed for Defense

ADDRESS OF HON. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., OF MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of the Republican leader of the House of Representatives, Hon. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR., delivered over the Columbia Broadcasting System, Saturday, June 8:

Originally it was my intention in this talk to review the present session of the Congress. It was then expected this might be very close to the date of adjournment. It is now obvious there should be no adjournment for some time to come, if we are to deal intelligently and thoroughly with the new problems confronting us.

I do not believe this Congress should adjourn with so much necessary work to do. I believe the folks back home will feel a bit more comfortable if they have on guard here in Washington their own representatives, who possess their confidence gained through the years.

The Republicans, realizing the desires of the people, want to stay in session just as long as they can be of service. They want to stay here and discharge their constitutional responsibilities, instead of delegating those powers to others. They want to stay here and exercise their influence in steadying the Nation. They want to stay here to study and debate thoroughly all these tremendous issues. I believe the people expect them to do so.

Economy is still a vital necessity in this Nation. The fact that we are faced by a need for the rapid creation of a national defense on a scale vastly greater than has ever before been required in peacetime is no reason for us to throw caution to the winds; to toss economy out the window; to embark on a wild, hysterical effort to overcome by sheer spending of money the neglect which has brought us to our present state of inadequate national preparedness.

There is growing evidence of a spirit on the part of some people in high places to begin spending on an unlimited scale. This must not be tolerated.

To permit a spirit of hysteria, recklessness, or violent emotionalism to take over the helm of Government or to direct the building of a national defense is to invite waste, extravagance, graft, and, worst of all, the piling up of a huge new public debt without actually accomplishing the creation of an adequate national defense.

Let us spend what is necessary for an adequate national defense, but let us be sure it is efficiently spent. We do not want, and we cannot afford to have waste and worse in the creation of our national preparedness again as we had it in the first World War.

We know billions were wasted during the last war because of unpreparedness and our futile efforts to make the too-hasty spending of stupendous sums of money compensate for our previous national short-sightedness. We cannot afford to repeat that foolish course. We were able to overcome such tremendous handicaps then because we were a rich Nation with practically no Federal debt. We are still a rich Nation—but the Federal debt has grown to proportions which threaten the security of even our rich country.

Reckless spending and waste by the New Deal has made necessary the imposition of tremendous taxes upon the American people. The surplus capacity to borrow which we should possess to care for the extraordinary expenses of defense is gone, frittered away by the experimenters, who knew how to do well only one thing—spend.

Today, without taking care of $1 of the huge defense bill, we find our debt limit of 45 billions will be reached February 1. The first call was for $700,000,000 new taxes and to increase the debt limit $3,000,000,000. Already the Ways and Means Committee believes this is not enough and is boosting further both the debt limit and taxes. We must not forget this increasing of the limit is a step toward inflation and national bankruptcy.

This first call for taxes will be followed by another bigger demand next year, after the election. No one in this country will escape these taxes. The people must begin to plan to pay the heavy cost of the New Deal joy ride.

Critics of unwise spending policies were cried down by the experimenters in the administration who believed we could borrow and spend our way out of the depression.

But certainly those critics whose warnings have now been so amply and tragically confirmed deserve a fair hearing when they now speak against the same sort of waste, extravagance, and recklessness in government which have in 7 years brought us to the difficult and dangerous situation in which we now find ourselves.

The Republicans in Congress have fought resolutely to bring back sanity to government. We have opposed experiments which would drain the Public Treasury. We have fought for economy in government in order to avert the very financial crisis which has been brought on by wild, indiscriminate New Deal spending.

We have fought to give business, small and large, a chance to operate so it might give jobs at American wages to millions of our countrymen. We have fought to restore to the people, through their Representatives in Congress, powers which were mistakenly entrusted to the President and the bureaucracy. We have fought to give this country the benefit of a real two-party government. We have striven to make the minority party in Congress today a fearless, vigorous opposition, ready to support those measures which would contribute to the public welfare, and equally ready to oppose proposals we believed would retard recovery and be harmful to the country. And we appreciate the patriotism of those Democrats who have often joined us in our battles.

There has been much loose talk about abandonment of the two-party system, so to speak, and the silencing of all constructive criticism in a so-called "unity of effort."

Unity of effort we should and must have. But we also need and must have fair, honest, constructive criticism unless we want to pile mistake upon mistake. There can be real unity of effort without any abandonment of the traditional American two-party system. To insist that the two-party system be given up is to insist that only the majority party has any patriotism, any interest in the safety and security of the Nation, or any desire for an adequate national defense. To assert such a thing would be absurd.

Without constructive criticism to curb the spenders we might be plunged into a wild nightmare of extravagance which would gravely endanger not only our constitutional Republic but our very defense itself.

We Republicans have placed, and will continue to place, the welfare of our country first. The Republicans in Congress are 100 percent for American security.

There has been a studied effort on the part of some to create hysteria in this Nation. Hysteria is unwarranted. This is a time when, if we are to take the actions essential for our welfare, we must be cool and calm.

We must not lose any time in bringing our defenses to a point where America can defend herself from any attack. We do not expect any attack, and we certainly hope there will be none. Prudence, however, demands adequate preparedness.

Republicans in Congress can be depended upon to give solid support to all real defense measures. Naturally they resent efforts to make national-defense measures vehicles for granting dictatorial powers to the Executive.

Let the elimination of politics in defense matters be the resolute purpose of both parties.

This can be accomplished by sincerely directing defense measures to their avowed purpose. There is more to defense than headlines and appropriation by Congress of huge sums of money. We want this money honestly and prudently spent for the type of weapons and materials which will most quickly give us the greatest measure of protection where it is most needed. This can be done only through the appointment of men and women who have demonstrated in the past their capacity to get results. This is no job for the Government playboys or the experimenters. The people are demanding constructive work, prompt action, and careful planning, instead of beautiful phrases, glittering promises, and impressive gestures.

No defense can be considered effective without curbing the subversive forces now commonly called the "fifth column." We Republicans have never courted them. We are in no way responsible for their existence as a menacing factor in our national life.

It is too late now to discuss why they are here or who encouraged them. They are here, and we must take prompt and vigorous action to see that they cannot operate in America as they did in Norway, Holland, and in other countries. America must rid herself of Trojan horses. We must suppress those forces which are ready at a crucial moment to destroy the Nation.

Unfortunately, many of this group have been able to secure important berths in our Government. Those in the Government service who are known to be hostile to our constitutional form of government should be eliminated without a minute's hesitation, and those outside Government must be checked with equal promptness.

It will be of no avail to spend billions for defense and then wake up too late to the realization that we have permitted the "fifth column" to checkmate all those preparations and to scuttle America. The elimination of the subversive forces must be a primary part of our defense.

Let's go calmly about building our national defense with the least loss of time, effort, and money. Meanwhile let us continue to hold on to our constitutional form of government; let us continue to hold on to the Bill of Rights; let us continue our traditional two-party system of government; let us not abandon our liberties and our rights and our privileges simply because some people begin to cry "wolf." Prepare? Yes. But let us keep our heads while we do it.

EDITORIAL FROM THE BUCYRUS (OHIO) TELEGRAPH-FORUM

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following editorial of Rowland R. Peters, editor, Bucyrus Telegraph-Forum, Ohio, that appeared in the May 23 issue of that publication, entitled "What the American People Should Not Overlook."

I hope that every Member of this Congress will avail himself of the opportunity to read Mr. Peters' timely remarks.

[From the Bucyrus (Ohio) Telegraph-Forum of May 23, 1940]

WHAT THE AMERICAN PEOPLE SHOULD NOT OVERLOOK

However agreed the American people now are or may become with President Roosevelt's war-preparedness program, they should not overlook the regrettable fact that their country is not financially prepared to enter into such a program and that responsibility for our unpreparedness rests solely upon Franklin Roosevelt. Whatever defense measures are finally adopted by Congress must, because of 8 years of new dealism, be another mortgage upon our future generations.

Like Nero, Mr. Roosevelt and his corps of extravagant spenders have been fiddling while Rome has been burning. The President himself has talked much about his hatred for war, but he has done nothing to prepare for the day when he might be called upon to prove this hatred. There is absolutely no credit due him for his defense message. Any person could have asked and said as much without offering specific recommendations for paying the bill.

There are but two avenues open for congressional travel in the fulfillment of an adequate defense program. One is new taxes, the other a boost in the legal debt limit. All other avenues have been closed by the Roosevelt administration. The facts should today be uppermost in the public mind. And the people should also not overlook that were it not for Mr. Roosevelt's meddling in Europe's affairs our defense problem would not now be as pressing as it is.

It is clear that President Roosevelt is using the European war to further his own political interests. By his personal utterances against totalitarian policies, utterances which date back to his dedicatory address at Chicago's Outer Drive Bridge several years ago, he has imperiled America's international security just as he has over the last 8 years imperiled her domestic security. He wants America put into a position where it will believe next November that it cannot survive without his leadership. He wants events to be such that the people will overlook and excuse the condition into which he has put the country's financial and economic structure.

President Roosevelt has failed as a President. He has broken a trust with the American people. A man who cannot be a successful Chief Executive in peacetimes most certaintly could not be a successful Chief Executive during wartimes. And a man who has repeatedly broken faith with the public during peacetimes most certainly should not be entrusted with the Nation's affairs during wartimes.

Today he is making every effort to build himself up for November. So far he has refused to reveal his political intentions, but they are obvious. He is offering key posts to Republicans. Why? Is it not that he is attempting to break up the high command of the Republican Party to open a clear track for the party he deserted shortly after he took office back in 1933?

America is not as close to war as Mr. Roosevelt would have the people believe. It is as close as it is only by reason of his own interference in matters which are not our business, however much they concern us. We need to be prepared for any eventuality. We need a defense upon which we can rely for national protection, but our first line of defense should be the elimination from public affairs of those who have brought the situation as close to America as it is and who have closed all doors to preparedness without further mortgaging our future. Preparedness is more than military strength. It is financial and economic security plus military strength. Mr. Roosevelt has robbed us of the former and thrown the latter into financial danger. So long as he is President we cannot have domestic nor international security.

LETTER FROM PROF. J. L. SELLERS AND EDITORIAL COMMENT THEREON

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter appearing in the Lincoln Star, of Lincoln, Nebr., on June 5, 1940, entitled "Defense—Problem No. 1," from Prof. J. L. Sellers, of the University of Nebraska faculty. I also ask to have printed in the same connection an editorial commenting upon the letter of Professor Sellers, written by J. E. Lawrence, editor of the Lincoln Star, and published on June 5, 1940.

There being no objection, the matters referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Lincoln (Nebr.) Star of June 5, 1940]

PEOPLE'S FORUM—DEFENSE—PROBLEM NO. 1

To the EDITOR OF THE LINCOLN STAR:

The world of our colonial ancestors was a linear world. Men of those days moved slowly over the level waters. They followed the worn valleys of streams and sometimes threaeded the mountain passes. Their heavier commerce was borne by wind or gravity. Man moved independent of wind and gravity only by painful exertion of animal power. Land barriers of mountains, deserts, and vast expanses defined the orbits of land communication, and the seas connected the threading inlets. The possession of a few well-selected spots as bases for sea patrol controlled the routes of the world and made sea power the decisive factor in human affairs. The fact that no one continent possesses or produces all the commodities for human existence makes the control of the interconnection of continents vital to the people of every continent. The North American continent is not self-sufficient and probably can never become so.

As long as man's activity was confined to the surface of the land and the water, a great navy gave us our security, and doubly so while we remained friendly with the other greatest naval power. With our fleet in the Pacific and a friendly fleet in the Atlantic we felt fully protected.

The world has changed. Man has left the surface of land and water. He travels beneath the waves and he pierces the stratosphere. Communication has abandoned its linear grooves. The air encircling the earth is a network of air lines of infinite numbers piled layer upon layer and completely intercommunicable. There are no barriers; there are no bottlenecks; there are no impregnable heights and no inaccessible fortresses. What does a Louisburg, a heights of Abraham, a rock of Gibraltar, or the bluffs of Vicksburg mean in these days? Attacks can be brought against any position. Advantages of defense due to inaccessible positions have disappeared.

How has this affected warfare? The old assertion that it is more costly to attack than to defend is completely obliterated. The new speed has given the great advantage to offense. The entire area of every country is open to attack as soon as an enemy can establish an air base within flying distance. The enemy does not have to enter by harbors or by railroads or by motor trails. He is borne on the ever-present air. A nation cannot concentrate its defense in one place to meet attack. The defense must be scattered over the entire region. The offense concentrates its strength and assaults the weakest and most vulnerable point with lightning speed and destruction, and the defender has no chance to collect strength to meet it.

The new blitzkrieg has made defensive warfare a futile illusion. The only defense that exists in these days is an offense against the base from whence the attackers can come.

This is a changed world; a world of a new dimension. A nation that does not recognize this fact and adapt itself to the crisis will go the way of the eight liberal states that so recently were but are no more.

J. L. SELLERS.

HEART AND CORE

(By J. E. Lawrence, editor)

One single paragraph of the Monroe Doctrine, as it came from the pen of the fifth President of the United States, to dominate

American foreign policy over a period of more than a hundred years, is sufficient to show why it is heart and core of present American interest in the present European war. That paragraph follows:

"It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced that we resent injury or make preparations for our defense. With the movements in this hemisphere, we are of necessity more immediately connected, and, by causes which must be obvious to all enlightened and impartial observers, the political system of the Allied powers is essentially different in this respect from that of America. We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their systems to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere. But with the governments who have declared their independence and maintained it and whose independence we have in great consideration and just principles acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purposes of oppressing them or controlling in any other manner their destiny by any European power in any other light than the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States."

That paragraph walks again as a result of developments in Europe. It does not, the language makes plain, limit itself to actual physical invasion of the territories of the two American Continents. Specifically, it extends itself to any attempt to interfere with or control the affairs of the nations of the Western Hemisphere.

Then the Holy Alliance of Europe was considering steps to reestablish the influence of Spain, and of the Spanish crown among the South American republics. Now, it would seem that the Monroe Doctrine is doubly vital to the American people.

It is of greater importance because the problem of the security and safety of peaceful peoples has been increased infinitely by the changes in modern warfare. Defenses which were looked upon as adequate if not impregnable no longer are the insurmountable barriers which they were. The English Channel, with its narrow strip of water, was sufficient to safeguard the British people from invasion for 800 years. No military expert pretends it is an imposing obstacle today.

Elsewhere on this page is a discussion of the new problem of national defense by an able, scholarly historian. What he sets forth in condensed form is true. Water and land have been conquered by the new methods of transportation—by the airplane and by mechanized land forces. The strategy of war, a war of conquest, has changed. Previously in conflicts between evenly matched nations it was the attacking armies which bore the brunt of battle. Today it is the defending armies which are confronted with graver problems, if not called upon to bear the heavier losses in men and materials. More than ever before war strategy has changed to make the best defense a spirited offense.

In practical application, if, as Monroe said, it was an unfriendly act 100 years ago to attempt to fasten the policy of aggression and conquest on countries of the Western Hemisphere, it becomes doubly so today. Can the American people complacently approve of the establishment of naval and air bases in South American territorial waters? Can they permit European nations to secure a foothold in South America? Can they let that happen without gambling dangerously on the future?

Those are questions which naturally this country would like to dodge. It prefers peace. It is committed so strongly to peace that it hesitates, at times, to give thought to developments intimately connected with peace. They have been told many times by ambitious leaders exercising dictatorial powers as the representatives of totalitarian governments that democratic institutions are outlawed and that the happiness and contentment of the peoples of the world depend upon the substitution of totalitarian governments for democracies. The Western Hemisphere is the last, as well as the first cradle of liberty. It must be preserved.

DO WE LIVE FOR AMERICA NOW?

If one of ours might come back on this day of memory from the field where he fell, the grave that is nameless, or arise from the green fathoms of ocean, he would find the Americans to be offering garlands as his memorial, while rededicating themselves to the precious traditions and liberties for which he yielded his life. He would be young, we think, this hero for whom April never shall come again, nor the plow in the cornland nor the tryst at the crossroads. And this is just about what he would say to those who came afterward, when the pain was at an end and the gun smoke had drifted away:

I died for America. Say, if you will, that the confusion of lesser issues, the babel of voices in controversy, the charges and countercharges, were chaos to me. Say, if you will that I went lightly and with laughter to my sacrifice, unaware of the disputes and stratagems of the statesmen, as youth advances to an adventure, to the greatest adventure of all—still is this true of the score that I paid; I died for America. For the valleys you love, for the home in the valley, for the cities that were and that should be. For the traditions that were and are far dearer to us than the spring of the year or the wheat field of autumn. I died for America.

The planning, the statecraft, the scheming, I left to the others, far wiser than I. And this I knew only, that there was a need. All they might say, though they said it with tongues of flame, or the cool reason of logic, meant less to me than a single idea, constant, unchanging, an ideal—and the ideal was the land that I loved. The word was a hymn in my thought. The word was America. And what else had significance? The girl at the gate, the plow in the cornland, the immediacy and urgency of April, though these were all in all to me there was something else that was more. In the thunder of battle or the stillness of pain, by land or by sea, I died because I believed.

There is a gladness even in fear, when the flesh shrinks from the testing, and this I have known. Do not grieve for me now. These wreaths that you bring me shall wither, and soon, as all wreaths must wither. Do not grieve for me now. If you have a service to do me, a tribute to pay, think instead of the part that I played, and the price that I paid, for the home that you have in the valley, and the city that rests by the river.

Well I know, well we know—says the voice from the past, the voice out of history—that you, too, are willing to die for America, to die as I died. But the voice that I raise is one of a chorus of voices, of lips long since stilled, and the question we ask of you now is of few words and simple. Have you lived for America, you who came after? For we testify now, we who have warrant and authenticity, that it is simpler far to die for America than to live for her. One dies in a moment, one lives through the years—and there are no temptations in death, no lingering weakness, no last indecision. Are you living for America now?

And he might say, this one of ours, on the day we keep with fidelity and that which we consider devotion: Ask of your hearts, you Americans, kinsmen of mine and comrades still, if you live for America now. For it is evident to the dead, who were guided to death by a constant ideal, that the cynicism and insincerity of politics have misled you, that self-interest has counseled, and demagogs have swayed. It is evident to the dead that often you have asked yourselves, in the exercise of your franchise, not "Is it best for America?" but "Is it best for me?"

It is evident to the contemplative dead that you have misused, at your comfort and convenience, those liberties for which the shattered frigate sank and the last trench was taken. It is evident to the patriotic dead that you have given hearing to the sophists because their words were pleasing, and have closed your ears to the earnest and the sincere. It is evident to the dead that you have made a mockery of your common traditions and political sport of your heritage of liberty. As did we—say the dead—yet we died. And in death there is purification and understanding.

Ask yourself, "Is it best for America?" Ask yourself, "Have I self-interest beyond or beneath my Americanism?" Ask yourself, "What have I given to America?" And again, "What can I give?" Put it plainly, "They died for an ideal, and the ideal is America; how have I kept it?" Ask yourself, as they ask you, "They died for America, in the laughter and terror of youth—cannot I live for her now?" For they say to us now, on this day of their memory, this hour of the crisis, when gusts assault the flame, they, the torch-bearers, "We are those who died for our country, for the home in the valley, the city beside the untroubled river. Are you living for America now?"

If one of ours might come back from the field that is only a date in a history book, from the secret, green depths of the sea, in the uniform of his service, with the glow of his heart in his face, and it so very young, this is what he might say to us now. This is what he must say.

Benefits Under Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT F. WAGNER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

STATEMENT BY THE RAILWAY LABOR EXECUTIVES' ASSOCIATION

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix a statement by the Railway Labor Executives' Association supporting S. 3920, now on the Senate Calendar, to liberalize the benefits paid unemployed workers under the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Railway Labor Executives' Association has unanimously endorsed S. 3920, a bill to amend the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, introduced by Senator WAGNER and favorably reported by the Committee on Interstate Commerce and now on the Consent Calendar.

In support of the association's position, the following facts are respectfully submitted:

(1) In order to make the solvency of the railroad unemployment insurance system absolutely certain, this association sponsored the original Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act on an ultraconservative basis.

It was deemed advisable to proceed on that basis 2 years ago, because at that time most of the States had launched their unemployment-insurance systems on a somewhat similar basis.

However, since then, many of the States have liberalized their unemployment-compensation systems with the result that, during the current year, at least 50 percent of the more than 160,000 railroad employees who are drawing benefits receive less than they would have secured under State laws.

The average benefit during the base year has been only at the rate of $7 per week, an amount obviously so inadequate as to require no further argument on that point.

(2) Under the present system, a railroad worker who becomes unemployed must wait, on the average, 38 days before receiving any benefits. It needs no elaboration by us to indicate that interruption of a regular income for so long a period will have most unfortunate results for railroad workers who are victims of unemployment.

(3) It cannot be successfully challenged that the railroad unemployment-insurance system is financially capable of supporting the benefits provided in S. 3920. On the contrary, there is an ample surplus in the fund to take care of the increased benefits proposed by S. 3920. These increased benefits, in a year like the present, would amount to the sum of $12,000,000.

(4) Certain administrative provisions of the present Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act are forcing many thousands of railroad employees to register for waiting period credits which, in most cases, will be of no use to them. Experience has indicated the desirability of simplifying the act in this and other respects so as to relieve railroad workers of unnecessary burdens without jeopardizing the solvency of the system.

(5) If the unemployment-insurance system is to remain simple, it will be necessary to fix base years and benefit years. Both the railroads and the standard railroad labor organizations agree that the base year should be the calendar year and the benefit year should begin July 1 of each year.

(6) Unless action is taken at the current session of Congress, revision of the unemployment-insurance system will be delayed until July 1, 1941. We submit there is no substantial reason for any such delay. On the contrary, the reasons for immediate action are convincing and impelling.

We feel it is only necessary to direct the attention of Members of the Senate to this situation to convince them of the desirability of taking steps to correct the intolerable condition which now exists.

Permit us to repeat that in making this appeal we are expressing the unanimous sentiment of the authorized representatives of the 21 standard railroad labor organizations now functioning in the transportation industry, and we are also confident we are expressing the unanimous sentiment of the approximately 1,000,000 American railroad workers who are active members of those organizations.

In every State of the Union are hundreds, and perhaps thousands, of railroad workers who will be vitally affected by the legislation we propose. In their name, as well as in the names of the Railway Labor Executives' Association, we take the liberty of urging immediate and favorable action on this most important bill.

The Alien Question

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE ASHEVILLE (N. C.) CITIZEN

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article addressed to Editor of the Citizen, a daily newspaper published in my home town of Asheville, N. C., entitled "The Alien Question," and signed "An American."

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Asheville (N. C.) Citizen]

THE ALIEN QUESTION

EDITOR OF THE CITIZEN:

Just let a guy have a brand new idea that is contrary to what men probably would have thought during the days of George Washington and you will see the "horse and buggy" boys grab their muzzle-loaders, buggywhips, and pitchforks, and go on the warpath to destroy that man. Those same old fossilized backseat drivers have just about ruined England and France, and if their moth-eaten ideas are followed in the United States our great national-defense program will be an international joke.

Think of the lives that could have been saved had England listened to a progressive like Eden instead of following the leadership of an ultraconservative like Chamberlain.

Gen. Billy Mitchell, 15 or more years ago, on the lecture platform and in articles that appeared in nationally circulated magazines, warned the American people that the next war would be fought in the air as well as on the ground and water, and that we should arm accordingly. What happened? The "horse and buggy" brass hats said, in effect, that wars were not fought that way during the days of George Washington and, therefore, General Mitchell was all wet. They were so peeved at General Mitchell for having a new idea that they kicked him out of the Army. Now, who was right: The "horse and buggy" boys or the late Gen. Billy Mitchell?

About 5 years ago Senator ROBERT R. REYNOLDS introduced a bill in the United States Senate providing that all aliens be registered, fingerprinted, and photographed, so that the Government could deport the millions of foreigners who have illegally entered the United States, and also that the Government could know at all times where the aliens are and what they are doing in this country. Senator REYNOLDS also proposed that immigration be stopped for a period of 10 years, or until American industry could absorb the millions of unemployed American citizens, and decent aliens who have come to this country legally to become law-abiding, loyal citizens of the United States. What happened? Senator REYNOLDS, like General Billy Mitchell, got nowhere with his sound and wise ideas. The "horse and buggy" boys laughed at the Senator's proposals, saying, in effect, that George Washington favored unrestricted immigration, and, therefore, Senator REYNOLDS was all wet. However, Senator REYNOLDS will not likely suffer the fate of General Mitchell and lose his job because he had a fresh, crisp idea. The American people, having seen what aliens, affectionately referred to as Trojan horses and "fifth columnists," have done to Holland, Belgium, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Norway, France, and England, know that Senator REYNOLDS was eternally right, and that his bills should have been enacted into laws years ago.

One of the greatest needs in this country today is for the American people to listen more to the thinking men of 1940 and less to what men are supposed to have thought in 1776. George Washington never dreamed there would ever be flying machines, radio, steam engines, and steamboats, so why try to make everything Washington, Jefferson, and other revered American statesmen and patriots thought, more than 150 years ago, apply to conditions existing today? Conditions change, and governments and their armies must change to meet new conditions.

AN AMERICAN.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE BIRMINGHAM NEWS

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I have before me a very able and brilliant editorial from the Birmingham News of June 6 last, written by Mr. Osburn Zuber, under the caption "Roosevelt and the War." I think the editorial ought to have the widest possible distribution. I ask unanimous consent that it be published in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Birmingham News of June 6, 1940]

ROOSEVELT AND THE WAR

Every man who has ever served in the White House has had to bear criticism, some of it deserved and some not deserved. Franklin D. Roosevelt doubtless realizes that as well as anyone, and expects his share of criticism, which he probably does not mind too much; he has shown that he can take it. Yet few men who have occupied the Presidency have been subjected to as constant and as bitter a bombardment of criticism as Franklin D. Roosevelt, and in still fewer cases has so much of it been unwarranted and unfair.

Since the very first months of his administration, President Roosevelt has been under unrelenting attack by certain groups—and nobody needs to name them. The "Roosevelt haters" have made that term a famous one. How they do hate Roosevelt! They always have; they always will. They did not say so much against him in the first 2 or 3 months after he took office in those dark days of 1933, when he was giving this Nation as marvelous an example of dauntless and inspiring leadership as it has ever had during a crisis. The banks were all closed when his administration began, and business was at its lowest ebb; nobody knew what was going to happen to the country. And Franklin D. Roosevelt took firm hold of the helm the minute he was sworn in, and he spoke needed words of encouragement to the country, and he started doing things at once, with the wise acquiescence of a Congress which did not deserve the epithet of "rubber stamp" which the Roosevelt haters soon started hurling at it.

For a few months the President's critics withheld their fire, while Mr. Roosevelt, by the force and magnetism of his leadership, was restoring the public confidence that was so badly shaken then, in 1933, that now we can hardly realize how desperate we did feel in those days. But the Roosevelt haters were sharpening their knives. And soon after some confidence had returned to the American people—and to American business itself—and economic conditions had begun to improve, they unsheathed their sharpened knives.

Ever since then they have been hacking away, in season and out. There is no closed season on hating Roosevelt.

Now our country is facing another grave crisis of a different sort. The trend of events in the war in Europe raises great potential danger to our national security. We must arm and prepare ourselves for any possible eventuality, and we must do it quickly.

Again President Roosevelt is giving the country strong and courageous leadership in a critical time. He has spoken frankly to the country and he has made bold recommendations. Congress and the public alike have responded to his leadership. Congress and the President are working together—as "a team," in Mr. Roosevelt's own words—in this emergency.

How about the Roosevelt haters? They find themselves in a somewhat embarrassing situation. They are, naturally, in favor of the defense program which the President has launched; but they are very reluctant to speak well or think well of Mr. Roosevelt. In this grave hour, they cannot forget that they do not like Mr. Roosevelt, and that this "madman" in the White House is "ruining the country."

While their natural impulses make them want to applaud what the President is doing now for national defense, they cannot help relapsing into the old mood of dislike of Roosevelt's domestic policies. Alternately, it seems, they want to cheer and jeer.

So how are they meeting this awkward situation? They have gotten under way what appears to be a well-organized campaign of sniping, of petty pin pricks here and there, of quibbling over details of defense policy, and the like. What the President proposes is right, they say; but he is doing it all wrong they add. And what he should do is to appoint somebody—some one man—to do the whole job. The American people regard the President as the "one man" to direct the Nation's efforts in a crisis like this.

They have gotten under way also another line of attack, which is that Roosevelt should have let the country know about all this danger long ago, instead of waiting, as they say, until disaster was upon us, only to find out that we have no defensive strength "worth speaking of." They say that either Roosevelt did not know about it when he should have, and is therefore incompetent, or else he knew about it and did not tell the people, and is therefore untrustworthy. He should start telling the people "the truth," they say, and treat them like "grown-ups."

How shamefully unfair! Roosevelt has been warning this country of possible dangers for at least 3 years. And what did the Roosevelt haters do every time he said anything? They promptly yelled: "Roosevelt is trying to get the country into war!"

They did that when the President spoke at Chicago, nearly 3 years ago, of the menace of "gangster" nations. They did it when he spoke nearly 2 years ago, about the time of the Munich appeasement, of the necessity for America's relying more on arms and less on words. Every time they howled: "Roosevelt is trying to get us into war!" He told them, and they would not believe him. He told the American people about this danger faster than they were willing to accept his statements. For the people were misled by the Roosevelt haters who said that Roosevelt was trying to get us into war."

Only a few months ago, shortly after war was declared in Europe, President Roosevelt had one of the hardest fights of his life to get Congress to modify our ridiculous and utterly useless neutrality legislation. Who can forget how hard he had to fight to get that done? And who is there who today will say he was not right about it? And still they say, "Roosevelt should have told us sooner."

This editorial is no protest against criticism. We say that anybody ought to criticize any administration whenever he has grounds for criticism. We recognize that there are and always will be differences of opinion. To fair criticism of Roosevelt we do not object. This newspaper itself has criticized the President very strongly for some things, but it has never failed to praise him when it thought he deserved it. This paper has criticized the President, but it has never hated him. That is the difference; and that is what we object to—blind hatred of the President by those who will never grant that he may be right about anything.

Certainly Roosevelt has been right about this danger for years, and the people would not heed his warnings until they got scared by what they saw happening in Europe. They did not heed his warnings largely because the Roosevelt haters were saying the President was trying to get us into war.

Franklin D. Roosevelt became President in the midst of the worst depression in our history. It was not a depression of his making. And he did his level best to pull the country out of it, with, we believe, marked success, despite the calamity howling still to be heard.

Franklin D. Roosevelt as President now has to face as grave an international situation, perhaps, as has ever confronted the United States. He is not responsible for the war abroad, or for its effects on us. And he is doing his level best to steer a wise course for the Nation.

Meanwhile, the Roosevelt haters, knowing that he is trying to do the right thing, nevertheless, cannot forget that they do not like Roosevelt and are not supposed to say anything kind about him. They are trying to take advantage of this national crisis by using it for political purposes. Openly they are using it to try to block a third term. They are belittling him and poisoning people's minds against him.

Third term or no third term, Roosevelt is our President for at least 7 months more, and these may be the most fateful 7 months in all American history. Yet there are many who still chant the old hymn of hate.

They ought to be profoundly ashamed of themselves.

Keep Free From Foreign Entanglements

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 10, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON TIMES-HERALD

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial in the Washington Times-Herald for May 24, 1940:

[From the Washington Times-Herald of May 24, 1940]

IN THE NEWS

There are many hotheads, and quite a proportion of boneheads, in the United States who are urging the country to get into the European war.

These folk probably think they are moved by some sort of high idealism.

As a matter of fact, they are merely the weak and vacillating victims of propaganda and hysteria.

A few months ago they, like all other intelligent Americans, were cool-headedly calculating the unavailing cost of the last war, the utter failure of America's high objectives of permanent democracy, of open covenants openly arrived at, of self-determination of all peoples.

The facts of history have not changed.

It is the thistledown thoughts, the tumbleweed minds, blown hither and thither by every changing puff of propaganda or breath of hysteria, that have changed.

Some of our leaders are probably influenced, as Wilson was influenced, by a desire to occupy an important place in history, and to take a big part in world events—violating the injunction of the fathers of the Republic to keep free from foreign entanglements.

But most of us small fry are animated by no more intelligent motive than the moth which sacrifices itself in the flame, impelled by hysteria and dazed by the blinding glare of publicity and propaganda.

Fortunately, there are experienced men in responsible positions in the United States to warn us foolish and flighty moths to keep our impressionable heads and preserve our inflammable wings.

Rear Admiral Harry E. Yarnell, United States Navy, retired, spoke last Saturday before the graduating class of the Naval War College.

Said the admiral:

"The people of this country are still painfully aware of the result of the last World War, when we sent 2,000,000 men abroad and spent thirty or more billions of dollars to make the world safe for democracy; then at the end witnessed a relapse of the high ideals and a resumption of the old nationalistic policies that planted the seeds of future wars.

"Why should we spend our blood and treasure until there is assurance that they will be spent to a far better end than in 1918?

"The Atlantic Ocean," continued the admiral, "still remains a large body of water, and the probability of plane attack from overseas on this country will remain remote for some time to come."

The admiral concluded with this sound statement:

"Command of the seas is and will remain the primary factor in our plan of national defense, and as long as we have it we are safe from successful enemy invasion."

Fortunately for our blessed and beloved country, our sea defenses are in better condition than our ridiculously insufficient land defenses.

According to Secretary Edison, our Navy will be adequate as soon as our battleships now building are redesigned to resist the powerful weapons of modern airplanes, and as soon as we shall have a fleet of airplanes sufficiently large and powerful to cooperate with our ships of war and to defend them from the attacks of enemy airplanes which might otherwise annihilate them.

This cooperative fleet of modern airplanes, however, we do not seem to be in a very good way to secure soon.

In the debate in the United States Senate Saturday on unpreparedness, Senator CLARK, of Missouri, a World War veteran and former commander of the American Legion, said the United States at the present time, according to General Arnold in his testimony before one of the House committees, has only 58 planes which are not obsolete.

Said Senator CLARK:

"I am not a member of the Military Affairs Committee, the Naval Affairs Committee, or the Appropriations Committee, but I am advised by members of those committees that General Arnold testified before the Appropriations Committee, not once, but a number of times, that the maximum production of the American airplane factories by July 1, 1941—somewhat more than a year from now—would be slightly in excess of 6,000 planes, 2,800 of which were to go to the American Army and the remainder to the Allied armies or various other foreign countries."

So even if all the plane production of 2,800 planes allotted to America should be delivered to the Navy, it would be 2 years before the Navy would have the 5,000 up-to-date, modern planes necessary for successful cooperation in American defense.

The contention of Senator CLARK, Democrat, was sustained by Senator LODGE of Massachusetts, Republican, who is a member of the military subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee, and in addition an Army Reserve officer.

Senator LODGE said:

"The facts, as the Army officials have stated them to us, and they have not been controverted, are that by July 1, 1941, there will have been produced in this country about 6,000 military planes, about half of which will go into our own defense establishment, and the other half will go abroad."

So it will be clearly seen that we are far from adequately prepared even in our best-prepared and most important arm of defense—the Navy.

And the best thing for an unprepared nation to do is to stay out of war if it honorably can.

Senator CAPPER, of Kansas, typically sound and sincere American, speaking under the auspices of the Coalition of Patriotic Societies, said last Saturday:

"The President has a right to make the United States invulnerable, but I will continue to oppose any move to send troops abroad. I will protest against pork-barrel methods and stand against repeal of the Johnson Act.

"In the first place, I will say without any reservation that this European war is not ours, and don't let anyone tell you otherwise. In the second place, no head of any nation is justified in plunging a nation into a war that is not theirs. * * *

"No matter how high our ideals and no matter what we sacrifice in money and men, we cannot bring peace to Europe.

"The situation today is sympathy for the Allies. This sympathy does not justify taking on their war. * * *

"Here is what that would mean to us. First, we would abolish democracy and get a dictatorship. Second, there would be an increase in the national debt. Third, there would be a loss of life running into millions and a loss of property running into billions. Fourth, there would be a depression worse than this and a continuation of dictatorship, and then more European wars.

"Keep these things in mind and stay out of war. I pray in this crisis we will keep faith in ourselves and faith in our form of government."

Senator CAPPER's words of warning are apt and immediately applicable when he says:

"Every time we send supplies, advance credit, and do all the things 'short of war,' then we have the final step—war."

Our position on the side of the Allies is getting to be like the position of Italy on the side of Germany, except that we are not as neutral as Italy.

Italy does not supply Germany with arms and ammunition to the detriment of its own forces and the injury of its own safety and security; nor does it tolerate any hostile interference with its own political rights and national independence.

Those who wish our America to abandon its neutrality and plunge into a terrific war do not realize what that would mean in our utter unpreparedness.

We would soon find ourselves fighting not only Germany, but Italy, Russia, and Japan.

We would be harried on our east coast as well as on our west coast.

Men we would have in plenty for defense, but no munitions, no modern guns, nor modern planes, no sufficient mechanized forces.

We would be unable to send aid to our allies.

We would be unprepared even adequately to defend ourselves.

In 2 years we might be properly prepared; but in 2 years our country might be destroyed.

Says Colonel Lindbergh, truthfully:

"If we desire peace, we need only stop asking for war. No one wishes to attack us and no one is in a position to do so."

As a matter of plain fact, these European nations have their own private quarrels. They have always had them and will always have them.

It is a species of tribal warfare, based on alien interests and foreign policies and jealousies, which are none of our affair.

Our ancestors founded this great free Nation to be independent of these race antagonisms and tribal conflicts.

Let us keep free of them.

Let us maintain our independence.

Let us defend our own land and our own liberties, and neither sacrifice our own interests to fight on foreign ground, nor invite alien conflicts to invade our shores.

A Mother Writes an Open Letter to the Democratic Party on the Third-Term Threat

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

Monday, June 10, 1940

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, from the hearts of the mothers of men, have always come some of the finest sentiments and the most profound thoughts of American history. As this country lives at peace in a world gone mad with war and enjoys self-government in a world walking backward toward one-man dynasties, each mother's son of us might well forget pride in party and pomp of partisanship and search his soul to be sure his actions and decisions work for the preservation of Christianity, peace, and free government on this continent.

Mr. Speaker, we who live so close to the forest of politics may sometimes forget the very trees of independent thinking and free determination upon which politics depends. While we in Congress work and worry about budgets and amendments, the mothers of America are today praying and pleading that the Republic we guard may be preserved and perpetuated for their sons and daughters. Ours is a tremendous responsibility. Self-serving decisions, now, by those of us who must decide, may prove the treacherous means by which this Republic shall be plunged into chaos and by which our free institutions may be forced into a black-out of tyranny.

Once denied the rights and traditions of self-government, a disillusioned and deceived people soon cease to exercise the decadent prerogatives they still retain. A coronation takes the place of an inauguration; strong men become the masters of the State, and citizens pay homage as its creatures. There is no such thing as immortality for democracy; when men cease to be fit to rule themselves or deny their ability to produce leaders in a sequence, totalitarianism becomes the order of the day whether by force of arms or by a "creeping collectivism" by which men slowly let slip through their hands the destiny and heritage for which their forefathers so valiantly sacrificed themselves.

WHETHER BY THIRD REICH OR THIRD TERM, DEMOCRACY MUST NOT DIE

Whether it be by a Third Reich or a third term, self-government once ground underfoot by power politics and one-man rule is slow to rise. History reveals the sorry lesson that frequently a nation once having given up the right to govern itself and change its leaders in orderly succession, never again ascends to the high degree of freedom and liberty which it once enjoyed.

Mr. Speaker, I for one have been slow to believe that President Roosevelt would terminate his second administration by a selfish drive for continued power in violence to every tradition of self-government which Americans throughout the land hold dear. But, of late, his actions and the reports from those who know him best indicate that he has yielded to the self-serving satellites who cling to him because their own positions depend upon his continuance in office for 4, or 8, or 12 more years. All arguments advanced for a third term apply with greater validity to terms four and five than they do to term three.

THE BULLET, THE BALLOT, AND THE BAYONET

While the rest of the world resists with bullet and the bayonet the pagan onrush of one-man government, it is inconceivable to me that free Americans by secret ballot will bring upon themselves the loss of liberty and the destruction of free choice which so many of the people of other lands are so valiantly resisting. But quick decisions and snap judgments are so easy, and repentance is such a slow and painful procedure in the twilight of a democracy. For that reason great patriots of all parties are today praying that the President will not run again. I have faith enough in the clear-sightedness of the American electorate to believe he would be defeated, but, if so, he should be spared the humiliation of that defeat in what would be the bitterest and most acrimonious campaign of them all. And if by a remote chance an electorate with its judgment clouded by fears from abroad and faint-hearted faith within should throw away the lessons of antiquity and elect the President (Roosevelt or any executive) for a third term, the country should be spared such an inglorious ending to its star-kissed history.

A MESSAGE FROM THE MOTHERS OF MEN

Mr. Speaker, you and I, perhaps, and the colleagues who surround us, may be accused of thinking selfishly as we condemn or commend one man's desire to perpetuate himself in Presidential office. Critics might smirk that we stand to profit or lose as individuals, or as officials, or as political soldiers of fortune by the President's decision to seek or to sacrifice opportunity for self-perpetuation in office. Our hope that he might measure up to the patriotic stature of a Washington or a Jefferson in declining even to seek the opportunity to transform the Presidency into a princely post, or our hope that he will use the great power and prestige of his office as a selfish tool to attempt his reelection may be colored by our political philosophy, our congressional responsibilities, or by our having so long paid homage to a party label. But not so with the mothers of men in America, whose first consideration is that their sons may be spared the horrors of war and that they may aspire to high office through public favor by the same formula that American sons of the past have always used to move upward from the plow or the pulpit to the Presidency.

Therefore, I have received permission of the House to publish the following communication received by me from a thoughtful and intelligent mother of my State. This open letter to the Democratic Party comes to me from Mrs. Mildred Dunsworth Fort, of Sioux Falls, S. Dak. She signs herself An Independent Voter. I do not know which party label holds her loyalty, if any, but I dare any Member of this House to read this letter and doubt or deny the sincerity of the soul from which it was inspired. Mrs. Fort is not a politician. Her vision is not colored by being a candidate for any public office. Homemaking is her profession. She seeks no patronage of any kind. She is neither rich nor poor but represents the typical American mother whose heart is with her family and whose hope is with a free America in which self-government may go forward without involvement in foreign war for another century and a half, unsullied and unscathed by surrender of our traditional form of government at home.

Mr. Speaker, there are greater things in life than party victory or partisan advantage. Democrats and Republicans alike cherish higher ideals of patriotism than political patronage and partisan success. Above any party comes America. I hope every Democratic leader in America reads this open letter. I dare to hope that some among them will speak up before it is too late and assure this country in this critical hour that we shall be spared the actual threat of one-man rule at home so we can unite as patriots should and as Americans must, to prepare ourselves against any possible attacks from one-man governments abroad.

A MOTHER'S OPEN LETTER TO THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY ON THE THIRD-TERM THREAT

(By Mrs. Mildred Dunsworth Fort)

Foreword by the letter writer.

I have waited in vain for someone else to say what I have said in this open letter to the Democratic Party. I have watched with incredulous amazement this party, which was the pride and joy of my father and grandfather, selfishly and insanely betraying itself and its country by instructing its delegates to vote for Mr. Roosevelt for a third term, when all of them, including the President, know that as a patriotic American citizen, he is not eligible to run for that office again.

Sadly I have watched Illinois, the State of my birth, Iowa, Wisconsin, and an ever-lengthening string of States all following along in the third-term path like so many stupid sheep. It is not an admirable picture. Were Mr. Roosevelt possessed of the qualities of the Angel Gabriel himself it still would not be an admirable picture, because it represents a long step toward that one-man rule against which England and France are fighting so desperately today.

Unity! How can we have unity with a man in the White House who is willing to cast aside a tradition which has guaranteed us a continuation of freedom from the possibility of a one-man government, and that, for the selfish purpose of keeping himself in a position of power.

And so, while there is still time to speak, while there is still freedom of speech, as an American citizen, a daughter of pioneers, and a mother of sons, I speak out against this dangerously un-American trend toward a third term. I speak out that I may do my part in helping to preserve the good old American way of a government which, by choice, by custom, and by tradition cannot and will not tolerate a third term for any man under any conditions.

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY

GENTLEMEN: I wonder if you realize to what extent the American spotlight has been concentrating in your direction? For you have an unprecedented opportunity at this time to bring either good or evil to this beloved country of yours and mine. If you in large numbers are loyal Roosevelt followers first, and patriotic American citizens second, you will, in all probability, indulge the President in his apparent desire to run for a third term. But that would be a calamity which I cannot believe your party will countenance for the following reasons:

1. Because you know as well as do most thinking people, that to encourage the President to run for a third term would be to bring grave danger to our democratic processes. It would mean the establishing of a precedent which could and probably would become a definite step toward a dictatorship. There is no emergency, not even war itself, that could possibly warrant the establishment of such a gravely un-American precedent.

2. Because you in all honesty know that the distrust and fear in our hearts, engendered by the unpredictableness, instability, and extravagance of the Roosevelt regime, are justifiable.

3. Because you, too, realize that the President has had so much power mistakenly delegated to him by Congress that he can no longer look at the Nation's problems in an objective manner. That already he is intolerant of independent thinking, even having gone so far as to have tried political purges against those of you who dared to differ with him.

4. Because you, as well as we, resent the insidiously dangerous radicalism with which the present administration seems to be flirting.

5. Because you cannot help but note that decent American citizens are appalled over the fact, that for the first time in the history of their memories, politics have been injected into the Supreme Court, and men have been appointed to that high office who have not earned the right to that signal honor through personal integrity nor distinguished service, but have received it simply because of political expediency. What wonder is it that we Americans go to bed each night with fear in our hearts, when this last stronghold against subversive invasion of our rights is being increasingly manned by members subservient to the executive branch of the Government.

If your party further betrays the American people by sponsoring a third term, I believe that it will have sounded its own death knell. For democracy cannot live under a leadership that thinks nothing of smashing protective traditions in order to retain power. Nor can it live under an abdicating Congress and a supine Supreme Court. And I say to you, "If your party is so spineless, so full of "yes" men, that it will allow itself to be thus used as a stepping stone upon which radicalism, masking under the name of liberalism, may enter more completely into the American political picture, then it truly deserves to die."

What has become of the Democratic platform of economy and decentralization of power in government upon which the present administration came into office, the platform upon which the Democratic Party was built in 1840 and to which it held steadfastly until 1932 and to which the present leadership deemed it wise to give lip service in 1936? And have you forgotten the platform of 1896 which carried this significant statement:

"We declare it to be the unwritten law of this Republic, established by custom and usage of 100 years and sanctioned by the examples of the greatest and wisest of those who founded and maintained our Government, that no man should be eligible for a third term of a Presidential office."

If being conservative means being determined to regain and conserve those rights which until recently had been ours because of long-established custom, tradition, or by Constitution, then we are conservative.

If being conservative means holding to the good old American way of a government of checks and balances which provides an effective safeguard against would-be self-perpetuating political machines and one-man governments, then we are conservative.

If being conservative means having a desire for an administration that will conduct the affairs of government in an orderly, businesslike, and efficient way and encourage us to conduct our lives in the same manner, then we are conservative.

If being conservative means being absolutely and uncompromisingly against a third term for any man in any party, under any conditions, then we are conservative.

When Hitler heard of England's change in the personnel of her Government in the midst of war, he probably exclaimed, "Such stupid bungling!" But we say, "What magnificent courage!" In the face of such courage, and when democratic countries abroad are giving their life's blood to retain the blessed privilege of changing their leadership when and if they desire, are we going to present to the world an abject picture of a great and rich country grown too cowardly and too fearful to let go of the coattails of one man when his term should very properly be over? Are we going to lack even the courage to cast our vote for democracy?

We are becoming increasingly aware of the fact, that if we expect to continue as a republic in this perilous period in world history, we must invest with power only those men who have the steadiness and the stability of a Washington or a Lincoln; men, whom we and the whole world can trust; men, who in the bigness of the task before them, forget themselves and in that forgetting become the great men of our times.

Sincerely yours,

MILDRED DUNSWORTH FORT,
Sioux Falls, S. Dak.

Transfer of Naval Planes to the Allies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN C. SCHAFER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, June 10, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE MILWAUKEE JOURNAL

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Milwaukee Journal of June 7, 1940:

[From the Milwaukee Journal of June 7, 1940]

ROOSEVELT GOES TOO FAR

President Roosevelt has found a way to send 50 planes of our Navy to the British and French Allies without action by Congress. More armament, from the Army's left-over supplies, perhaps old destroyers from the Navy, and munitions from the last war, are to follow, the reports say. Some Americans will be in favor of this, and some will oppose it. But all ought to recognize it for what it is—an act of war.

Fifty planes is a token, not real aid. Fifty planes will not win a single small battle or delay the advance of Hitler by 2 hours. The 50 planes are intended as reassurance to the Allies, a pledge that as fast as President Roosevelt can do it we shall send help. Equally the act means to their enemy that he must expect to face all the weapons which American industrial efficiency can produce.

Mr. Roosevelt accomplishes by Executive order what his satellite, Senator PEPPER, has not been able to persuade Congress to authorize.

This is fundamentally wrong. The President owes his loyalty to the American people. He has told them his policy is aid "short of war." And this is not short of war.

The Constitution says that Congress shall have the power to declare war. President Roosevelt commits the country to a course which means that Congress will have no choice but war if the enemies of France and Britain engage in reprisals on the United States for our official aid to their foes.

We do not need the words of Virginio Gayda, Mussolini's unofficial spokesman, to tell us that turning over planes from our Navy to their enemies will be accepted by Germany and any allies she may draw to her side, as war. We know how we should regard it if the case were reversed. The technicality that these planes are "trade-ins" to the Curtiss Co. on new planes not even begun means nothing.

Let's face this thing, then, for what it is. The President commits this country to war, if Germany is strong enough to make it, without consulting the country. How different the course of Woodrow Wilson, who laid before Congress the policy he was pursuing with European governments, emphasizing its grave implication, inviting approval or disapproval.

If there is a reason for our taking part in this war, it is that our way of life is threatened. That is as simple a way as we know of saying it is a war for democracy.

Our way of life, our system of democracy, includes a legislature, an executive, a system of courts. President Roosevelt gives the legislature—that is, Congress—the run-around, and the case will not come before the courts.

If we are to take sides in this war, we have a right to look at the cards of those whom we support. We have a right to pledges that the help we give shall not again lead to a futile peace. If the President has any such assurances, the Nation has not heard of them or had an opportunity to make a decision.

We know, as all our readers must know, that a majority of Americans are heartily on the side of Britain and France. It may be a nine-tenths majority. But we know that they have not said through their representatives that they are ready for Government help to Britain and France—that they have had no chance to express themselves.

It is not the American way to enter a war by the back door. It is not American to begin a war for democracy by giving up democracy.

Fortunately, laws seemingly prohibit a transfer of old guns, and the President has now asked Congress for authority to turn in army guns for resale to the Allies. This throws the question into Congress, where it should have been answered before Mr. Roosevelt adopted the subterfuge to send the token of 50 warplanes.

Germany's Preparation for the War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. SLATTERY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE CHICAGO HERALD-AMERICAN

Mr. SLATTERY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article from the Chicago Herald-American of June 7, 1940, written by Robert P. Vanderpoel, dealing with the preparations Germany made for the present war.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GERMANY CLOSELY FOLLOWS WELL-DELINEATED PLOT; WORLD AWAKENS SLOWLY

(By Robert P. Vanderpoel, financial editor)

"France has just placed rush orders in the United States for 300,000 tons of steel."

As this dispatch came over the news desk on Thursday afternoon someone remarked:

"The war has been going on for 9 months; what have they been doing during all this time?"

For 6 years Germany prepared for conquest. Openly, almost boastfully, it announced to the world that a new day was to come, a day of Nazi leadership. It told its own people that they must sacrifice butter for cannons.

AMUSED AT FIRST

The rest of the world was a bit amused at first, then a bit indignant. But after all, this fantasy of a superior race meant to rule the world was nothing much to worry about. Wasn't Germany exhausted by the World War, and hadn't every economist declared that it would be impossible for this country to recover in less than two or three generations?

The Germans had no gold. They had to resort to primitive methods of barter to maintain even necessitous international commerce. Many of their best men were leaving the country and the imagination and initiative of those remaining was being destroyed under the impact of the most severe regimentation witnessed in modern times.

THEN CAME MUNICH

Certainly there was nothing to fear.

Then came Munich. One of the great democracies of Europe was sacrificed to the monster that previously had interested world statesmen more as a curiosity than as something that could devour.

Old, peaceful Chamberlain and peace-loving, idealistic Daladier returned home, disillusioned men, prodding their nations to awaken to a realization of the viciousness of this thing created by Hitler.

Armament activities were increased. But when war came—as it was inevitable that it should—the French and British were still woefully unprepared.

STARVING THE MONSTER

There followed the quick conquest of Poland. England and France tightened their belts a bit and continued confident of their ability to starve the monster. America remained pretty much aloof—it was not its war.

With the aid of the "fifth column," Denmark and Norway were quickly overrun. The "fifth column" was a surprise, though it need not have been, for its tactics were revealed in detail by former Nazi insiders, including Hermann Rauschning.

It was not until the "blitzkrieg" against Holland and Belgium that public opinion in America began to awaken to the fact that after all we had a big stake in what was taking place in Europe and what these events portended for the future of the world.

INTENT ON PEACE

We were just as intent on peace as were Chamberlain and Daladier.

But the pattern being followed by Hitler was to the last detail so closely akin to that previously delineated by erstwhile cronies that some people in this country began to study it and found that what was taking place in Europe was not a realinement of political boundaries, a reshuffling of the balance of power, but a world economic, political, and social upheaval that carried the gravest threats not alone to the British and French Empires, but to the United States of America.

QUIBBLING OVER DETAILS

Today we are working feverishly to arm—as did France and England after Munich—but we are still quibbling over details, quarreling among ourselves, still pretending—as did France and England—that we can go on pretty much as we have before, only with a little more emphasis on armament.

When German-inspired revolutions take place in South America we shall reach the Munich stage. When the Nazi fleet begins to unload troops in Mexico we shall begin to wonder why we did not place large orders for steel, tin, manganese, quicksilver, and what not many months, even years, earlier.

Where to Start on "Fifth Column"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 10, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE MILWAUKEE JOURNAL OF JUNE 6, 1940

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Milwaukee Journal of June 6:

[From the Milwaukee Journal of June 6, 1940]

WHERE TO START ON "FIFTH COLUMN"

The House in passing another thumping W. P. A. appropriation voted to bar Communists and Nazis from W. P. A. projects. The move in Congress to deport Harry Bridges by special congressional action is undoubtedly gaining headway. The Department of Justice asks citizens to give it tips on "fifth column" activities. This all fits into a plan for a new and much more stringent test of Americanism.

But let us go back a bit and see where we ought to start. What about the hundreds of men and women in Government positions, some of them in very high positions, who have held, and for all we know still hold, ideas that are not traditionally American? We do not say that they are "fifth column" workers. We do say that some of them, by their utterances, their membership in "fifth column" organizations, their official actions, have given aid and comfort to "fifth column" movements.

The Dies committee named 200 Government employees as members of the American League for Peace and Democracy at a time when this outfit was a Communist-front organization. There were 25 of these memberships in the Works Progress Administration, 14 in the Social Security Board, 22 in the Rural Electrification Administration, 12 in the Interior Department, 5 in the War Department, 32 in the Department of Agriculture, 30 in the National Labor Relations Board (including 1 Board Member, Edwin S. Smith), 13 in the Treasury Department, 13 in the Department of Labor, and 14 in the Navy. The rest were scattered in other departments by ones, twos, and threes.

When this came out the Dies committee was attacked mercilessly. Some of those who are most anxious now to track down the "fifth column" sided with the near Communists. There was even the attempt to discredit Chairman DIES by palming forged documents off on the country. What has been done about all this? The country would like to know the situation in Washington, as it is asked to be on guard against "fifth column" activities.

What about David Saposs, economist of the N. L. R. B.? Mr. Saposs was presented as having written that "bourgeois democracy is a sham." His articles indicated time after time that he had little faith in the American way. When Congressmen questioned him, he tried to counter by saying that he had been setting for the thoughts of others. But his explanations did not explain and even the minority members of the special committee that was investigating the Labor Board—his own friends—deserted him. He is still on the Government pay roll, in a key labor position.

What about Edwin Smith? As we said above, Congress is thinking of deporting Harry Bridges. But Mr. Smith, of the N. L. R. B., journeyed to Baltimore to a midnight meeting with Bridges, at which labor problems in the maritime unions were discussed. The least you can say is that Board Member Smith was working with Bridges to shape the maritime-union situation. And the way it has been shaped up it is one of the worst "fifth column" spots we have. Shall we send Bridges back to Australia and keep Edwin Smith in a key job in Washington?

If we are going to clean up the "fifth column" in America, we are surely not foolish enough to keep its former dear friends on the Government pay roll.

Farm-Machinery Monopoly

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ED GOSSETT

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 10, 1940

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, under the leadership of a great President we are now making progress on our serious problem of national defense. With justice and wisdom he has issued a warning to those who would profiteer out of the present crisis. In connection with this warning, I want to again call to the attention of the House an old enemy of the American farmer, to wit, the Farm Machinery Trust.

Last year I introduced H. J. Res. 368, being as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Temporary National Economic Committee created by Senate Joint Resolution 300 of the Seventy-fifth Congress for the purpose of investigating monopoly and the concentration of economic power, be, and is hereby instructed to report and recommend to the Congress at its next session legislation to effectively and permanently break up and destroy the trust and monopoly now existing in the agricultural implement and machinery industry of this country, the existence of such trust and monopoly, and its destructiveness to the farmers of this country, being well known, and also having been conclusively established by an investigation of the Federal Trade Commission pursuant to Senate Joint Resolution 277 as adopted by the Seventy-fourth Congress. The report of this investigation is available to the committee and to the Congress as House Document No. 702, third session, Seventy-fifth Congress.

Last year, in a speech appearing on page 14200 of the RECORD, I called to your attention certain facts revealed by the report of the Federal Trade Commission regarding the unfair practices of the farm-machinery monopoly. The International Harvester Co. has for years dominated and controlled the farm-machinery market and has headed the monopoly in this field. They have charged the farmer whatever seemed necessary to meet the cost of gigantic sales and promotion forces and to pay generous expense allowances and fabulous salaries to many officials.

In 1927 the International Harvester Co. paid a total compensation per officer of $142,940 to each of 11 officers, $147,524 to each of 12 officers in 1928, $161,193 to each of 13 officers in 1929. The president of International Harvester Co. in 1927 received $353,386; in 1928, $405,909; in 1929, $412,860.

I now want to call to your attention that the International Harvester Co. has lost and is losing many millions of dollars in Europe which will probably be charged to the cost of production of farm machinery in America. Some years back this company lost in Russia a plant worth approximately $38,000,000, a sort of contribution to the Communists. In 1938 they owned two plants in Germany, which plants are now doubtless turning out implements of destruction for the Nazi war machine. They own three plants in France whose fate we cannot yet predict.

Figures prepared by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics of the Department of Agriculture show the relative and proportionate advance in the prices of farm machinery since 1910. Assuming that a plow or harrow sold during the years 1910–14 for $100, its average price during the following years has been as follows:

1916	107
1917	122
1918	155
1919	160
1920	165
1921	159
1922	142
1923	147
1924	154
1925	153
1926	153
1927	154
1928	153
1929	152
1930	152
1931	150
1932	142
1933	138
1934	144
1935	146
1936	149
1937	154

We cannot predict the future, yet many well-informed persons believe that after the war, whoever wins, the bottom is going to fall out of the prices of farm products. If the Farm Machinery Trust performs in the future as it has in the past, instead of lowering the prices of farm tools and machinery as the price of cotton, corn, wheat, and other farm products fall, they will raise the price of such tools and machinery in order to maintain the level of their income. Unless restrained from so doing, the International Harvester Co. will doubtless shortly begin to recoup foreign losses out of the pockets of the American farmer.

Farm poverty is the difference in price between what the farmer has to sell and what he has to buy. In our fight to secure parity for the American farmer, we have tried to raise the price of the things he has to sell. We should also endeavor to fight for economic equality and justice for the farmer by compelling a reduction of the unfair prices of certain things the farmer has to buy, such as farm tools and farm machinery.

My father still uses on his farm implements that I used as a boy. He cannot afford to replace worn-out equipment with new machines. No family-sized farmer can today afford to own adequate equipment.

Mr. Speaker, so long as I am in the Congress and so long as the Farm Machinery Trust continues its evil ways, I shall continue to fight for its destruction. May the American farmer soon be relieved from paying tribute to this unconscionable monopoly.

The National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN A. HALL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 10, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM BINGHAMTON (N. Y.) PRESS

Mr. EDWIN A. HALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Binghamton Press of June 7:

[From the Binghamton (N. Y.) Press of Friday, June 7, 1940]

ONE POINT NOT COVERED

In his demand in the House on Wednesday that the national administration make a weekly accounting to Congress in terms of national defense, Representative EDWIN ARTHUR HALL, of the Thirty-fourth Congressional District, certainly performed an outstanding service to the people of the country at large and wrote into the record something which is going to be important later on. Mr. HALL was undoubtedly encouraged to make his demand for an accounting by the fact that he demanded something of the same sort just a day or so before Mr. Roosevelt went before both Houses of Congress in what a great many radical New Dealers think was an ill-advised message on national defense and our lack of it.

Some of the Republicans in the House probably thought Mr. HALL was getting off on the wrong foot then, and perhaps some of them think so now. Yet it would appear that our Congressman carried back from his constituency here in the southern tier of New York State a rather accurate reflection of what they are thinking about and what they want in terms of national defense.

But we think that there is one point which Mr. HALL didn't sufficiently stress in his demand. The accounting of things actually accomplished is particularly necessary because of the characteristic pattern of the New Deal in terms of procrastination, detailed delays, and the habit of making promises serve for accomplishment.

How many more planes has the Army or Navy on this date than they had when Mr. Roosevelt admitted to Congress that he was the commander in chief of an army and navy inadequate to do a reasonable defensive job for the security of the American people?

How many contracts have been let? How many guns have been delivered? How many air bases have been started—let alone finished? How many uniforms for fighting men are passing through the shops?

How many howitzers and machine guns and field pieces and antiaircraft batteries have been authorized? How many American industrialists have been given M-Day orders?

In short, what has been done?

That is what the American people want to know. And that, we think, rather than the question of economy, should have been the principal point made by the Representative of the Thirty-fourth Congressional District in his demand for a weekly accounting.

But at least a start has been made in the right direction. Unless the leaders of Congress, Democratic and Republican alike, are entirely blind they will see for themselves how necessary it is in view of past performances that they keep the whip on the backs of those frisky young colts that have been drawing the Democratic wagon with so little regard to the load and such a profound disregard of the road.

The team may have been halter-broken, harness-broken, and buggy-wise once, but it has been ambling up strange woodland paths and taking an awful long time to get to town. Too much has rattled out over the tailboard because of its flighty jumping. It's time that team buckled down to the collar and did some real pulling before the old farm goes up in smoke and flame one of these days or goes under the hammer because the oats were all fed out to critters that wouldn't pull.

That is bound to be the case in any organization where wide-eyed idealists are found in places that should be occupied by practical men and women. Do you remember The Song of the Bandar Log in the Mowgli stories? Do you remember that fragment of the refrain:

"Things that are noble and kind and good, Done by merely wishing we could."

and that other bit:

"Now we're going to—Never mind!
Brother, thy tail hangs down behind."

That in essence is the theme song that has characterized the performances of the New Deal in various matters for the past 7 years. Five-dollar words and gorgeous promises, glittering prospecti and lovely theories have been made to serve the purpose of things done well and things done completely.

And it is that characteristic of Mr. Roosevelt's administration which worries a great many Democrats as well as Republicans, mugwumps and nincompoops in this day when dark clouds gather on the eastern horizon of the Atlantic.

Everybody knows how short the time may be. It takes no such brusque reminder as that which came from Virginio Gayda, Mussolini's mouthpiece, to convince us that we haven't any time to waste in the actual manufacture of guns and tanks and planes, particularly planes. There was a time when no responsible crowned head or political dictator of Europe would have dared to say such a thing to the United States either in person or through a mouthpiece. The fact that it has been said should be a sufficient hint.

What has been done? Actually, what has been done since Mr. Roosevelt delivered his defense message to Congress and pleaded guilty to a lack of foresight and preparedness in this country in the years of big spending for boondoggling and supposed personal security while threat upon threat mounted in Europe?

Flag Day—Be American

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN C. KUNKEL
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, June 10, 1940

STATEMENT BY CHARLES S. RYCKMAN

Mr. KUNKEL. Mr. Speaker, Friday, June 14, our nation will join in celebrating Flag Day. As American citizens we pay homage to this symbol of our national unity and this symbol of our inalienable rights under our Constitution. As we see one nation after another deprived of its freedom, we cannot fail to realize more clearly and more vitally than ever before the real meaning and the growing importance of our flag in the world of today.

One of the best statements on this subject which I have read appeared in this morning's (June 10) Washington Times-Herald, written by Charles S. Ryckman, and I include it herewith as part of my remarks:

(By Charles S. Ryckman, winner of a Pulitzer prize for the best editorial of the year)

The campaign conducted by your newspapers to encourage public display of the American flag has provided a valuable background for the observance of Flag Day.

As a result of that campaign the American people have put the flag of their country in every lofty place, and the stage is beautifully set for this most important patriotic occasion.

In a few days appropriate ceremonies will be held throughout the United States in honor of the birthday of the American flag.

As in the past, the many alert and vigorous patriotic organizations of the country will devote traditional observances to the history and significance of the beautiful emblem which is symbolic of American peace and freedom.

The American Congress, on June 14, 1777, in the earliest and darkest years of the Revolution, decreed that the magnificent banner of stars and stripes should be the permanent flag of the new Nation.

The anniversary of that historic occasion has never been without great significance, and has never been held lightly.

In war and peace the American people have always remembered to pause in their undertakings and enterprises to recall the incidents and inspiration which gave shape and character to their beloved flag.

It has never been mere bunting and color to us, and never will be.

It has always lived as truly as we have lived, and has embodied the soul and spirit of America, and wherever it has flown it has always quickened the pulse and brightened the eye of those privileged to be under its protection.

This year, somehow, is different.

Not different entirely because there are new and grave perils.

Not different in the sense that there has been indifference to patriotic duties in ordinary times, and that love and gratitude are sharpened by danger.

But different in the larger sense that we have new understanding and reverence for the flag upon which we have centered our faith and love and devotion.

Nowhere on earth is there cause for this flag to be feared or hated.

Nowhere on earth does its approach herald the coming of oppression.

Nowhere on earth do its unfurled folds accompany forces of aggression, plunder, and destruction, turning peaceful countrysides into devastated and desolated battlefields, and turning whole populations into helpless and hopeless refugees.

Wherever it appears, this flag of ours is a symbol of peace and mercy and humanity.

Wherever it flies, it promises charity, comfort, and happiness.

Awed and almost unbelieving that such a flag remains to shelter and inspire any country of the earth, millions of suffering people in persecuted lands envy us this splendid and beautiful banner of freedom and faith.

Why should we not pridefully and reverently honor such a flag?

Why should we not set apart a day for recalling its origin?

Why should we ever let it out of our sight or minds or hearts?

In recent days, ships bearing the American flag have entered the harried harbors of belligerent or war-menaced nations, and have come away laden with those fleeing disaster and death.

These fortunate people can tell us what it means to see the Stars and Stripes at the masthead, bespeaking peace and safety.

These people can tell us what it means to be coming back to America under that flag.

Their tears of gratitude and prayers of thanksgiving should guide us all.

Shall any of us be less glad than they that this is America, and that the flag of the United States is our flag?

Let us all play our full part as Americans on Flag Day.

Attend the programs in honor of Old Glory.

Hold the flag aloft, lift your shining eyes to it, praise it, and wave it.

It is the grand and glorious flag of our prized and beloved America.

Show and shout your Americanism, and be American.

Preparation for War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. USHER L. BURDICK

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 10, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. USHER L. BURDICK, OF NORTH DAKOTA

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me before the National Council for the Prevention of War, on June 7, 1940:

That period in our history between the dissolution of the Continental Congress and the beginning of this Government has been named by our great historians "the critical period" in American history. Critical because several years elapsed before this present form of government was set up, and in the meantime there was, in fact, no government. By common consent the Colonies held to the idea of a strong national government, but from the ending of the Revolution to the beginning of this Government many years had to pass before their common dream of a national democracy was fulfilled.

As I view the situation today, we are living again in a second critical period of our history. We have now conducted our Government for 150 years We have practiced democracy, and, while we have blundered time after time, we still have the possibilities of a greater democracy, or we have the possibility of having taken from us whatever there is left of freedom in America.

The world seems to be turning away from democracies, not because the theory of a democracy is wrong, but because they do not respond fast enough in an emergency. Europe has always been a volcano of wars, and since the first settlement at Jamestown, Va., in 1607, Europe has had 303 wars. This is due in a great measure to the building up of a single nationality to the exclusion of all others; and when the land area reaches the saturation point in population the economic force from within that nation causes an expansion. When all surrounding territories are similarly saturated the result is war. Neither a democracy or any other form of government can stop these economic explosions, which, in plain language, means that people living in cramped economic conditions have just as strong a desire to live as any other class.

This being the situation, there is nothing within the power of this Government that can be done to settle conditions in Europe, unless we take off all restrictions on immigration to the United States and let the overflow population enter this country regardless of their condition. If we did this, we would have to revise our own economic house or the millions who might come here would meet the same economic fate that drove them from Europe. There is nothing we can do in actual fighting or in aiding others to fight by supplying them with engines of war that will in the slightest degree, settle conditions in Europe and bring peace to the major portion of the people of the world. We made that mistake in 1917; our slogan was "to make the world safe for democracy," but when peace came, a peace was made in writing. By the terms of that document, many little unnecessary democracies were set up on the theory that these would be buffer states to prevent future war outbreaks among the major states. Nothing was done in the treaty of peace to establish economic equality between the nations—nothing was done to ease the economic conditions responsible for the World War. On the contrary, very harsh economic terms were imposed on the vanquished and when that pressure became too strong to be endured, the second explosion occurred, and is taking place as I speak to you today.

If this country could free the people of Europe from interest burdens, tax burdens, and landlord burdens, and permit the people of Europe to enjoy the riches of their own labor, I would say let us start today to put that program into effect in Europe and establish permanent peace throughout the world, for I assert openly that there can be no world peace until the people of the world have granted to them by their governments the right to enjoy the fruits of their own labor. I am sure we could not do that in Europe and my reason for saying that is that we are not doing that in the United States, and we could hardly qualify as peace messengers when the thing which we would have to do in Europe is something we have never done here.

There is at the present moment in this country clear evidence of a dangerous economic pressure. The reason that this pressure in the past has been relieved is because we had such an expanse of territory that we could move on from one bad experience to new lands and start life all over. We have reached in the last 20 years, the end of free land. There are no more Indians to drive off a thousand gardens of Eden. We are stalled from this avenue of escape. It isn't due to the fact that we have too many people; we haven't half enough. It is due, however, to the fact that a great mass of the people in this country cannot enjoy the fruits of their own labor. As evidence, I ask why should we have over 60,000,000 people in distress in this country of free opportunity? Why should we have 12,000,000 people unemployed and who want to work and cannot find work? Why is it necessary to foreclose on a million farm homes because the farmers cannot pay their debts? Why should a million city and town people be dispossessed and driven out of their homes? It cannot be said that these millions deserve this fate. A few might be negligent, careless, and thoughtless, but when you run this figure up into the millions, we have to admit that the loss of these homes is not due to any fault within the human control of the unfortunate home owners.

Our job is to set legislation in operation in the United States that will undo what legislation has done. Legislation has caused the unrestrained growth of special privilege. Legislation has permitted a few to obtain control of the many necessities of life of the people in this country, and in the operations under this special privilege, a few have become too rich and too many have become too poor. When we make mild attempts to limit interest rates; when we make attempts to set a yardstick for electricity and power and make this great natural resource of power available to all the people at living rates, those of us who make a stand for the people are branded as meddlers in the affairs of business. When we attempt to pass a law to control the credit of this Nation and use it for the people instead of letting "special privilege" control it, we who make a stand for this move are pointed out as undesirable Members of the National Legislature.

Until we settle this matter here at home, and give every citizen the right to work and enjoy the fruits of his own labor, we are not prepared to tell other nations what to do. We are not prepared to assist them in their wars when we are unable to stop their wars. Remember what happened to us in 1917. We loaned and lost $12,000,000,000, which, if paid back to us today with the same interest which we are compelled to pay under our private banking system, Europe would owe us $24,000,000,000. They owe us the lives of 1,000,000 men. We plunged ourselves in debt from which we will never recover, and I ask you for what? Did we settle anything? Did we prevent future wars? No. Did we remove from the people of Europe that interest cancer caused by the use of the people's money by a private banking system? No. We did none of these things. Why make the mistake again?

If we want this democracy to live, let us make it work for the people and show the world that a democracy is the best form of government. Let us not meddle with any nation—let us work out our own solution of our own great problems.

Beware of war hysteria—it is being generated in this country as rapidly as public opinion can be created. If this country is attacked by any power or powers, I want this country to be in a position to defend itself by means best fitted for that defense. Personally, I am willing to give the last dime I possess to the defense of this country. But I know that billions invested in useless battleships will not be a proper defense. I have fought against this program of battleship building ever since I came to Congress, for I knew that even in the last war our battleships, 90 percent of them, did not participate in the war. I know that a battleship today can be blown up from the air. I know they are being blown up.

The real engine of defense of the United States is not a battleship. The real engine of defense is a strong American heart set on defending this country. People without homes, people without proper food, people poorly clad in a land of plenty, are not hard to defeat. How about the American with a home to defend? How about an American who daily receives the benefits of a democracy? How about an American who knows that he can enjoy the benefits of his own labor and that there are no special laws for him or against him? He will fight and our ingenuity will devise for his use the machinery for defense.

That is what I believe to be the first step in the defense of the United States. Make our Government, in the eyes of our own people, worth defending. When you do that, no "fifth column" can work. No "fifth column" works anywhere unless the ground is prepared for it. Want, misery, suffering, starvation, and the crushing of hope constitute the soil in which the seeds of the "fifth column" grow.

Don't blame people, especially our own citizens, who are listening to advocates of other theories of government. Remove the cause, and no other theories of government can take root.

Should this country, through public opinion created artificially, decide to enter the European war as it did in 1917, I could stop the whole performance if Congress would pass one law. That law would provide that before we could conscript men to go to battle for the cause we espoused, we would first conscript wealth enough to run the war; money enough to provide for the wives, children, and dependents of the men at the front; money enough to pay pensions to our veterans for the next 50 years; money enough to furnish hospitalization and care for millions of sick and disabled veterans; money enough to take care of the dependents of millions of veterans who will die prematurely after the war is over; money enough to build and rebuild, contrive and build all the engines of war which might be necessary in carrying on a modern war of scientific destruction of human life. If that law were passed there would be no sentiment in the United States for our entry into any European war. We could complete the annihilation of the war shouters by taking over all private plants in the United States that are engaged in the manufacture of munitions of war.

Let us operate this Government that every American citizen will be glad to read the lines written by Longfellow in his Ship of State:

"Thou, too, sail on, O Ship of State!
Sail on, O Union, strong and great!
Humanity, with all its fears,
With all the hopes of future years
Is hanging breathless on thy fate!
Sail on, nor fear to breast the sea,
Our hearts, our hopes, are all with thee,
Our hearts, our hopes, our prayers, our tears,
Our faith triumphant o'er our fears,
Are all with thee; are all with thee."

How the Annenberg Case Was Made—Law Enforcement Agencies Should Receive Liberal Appropriations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 10, 1940

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, there is one activity of the Government that does not, in my opinion, receive the publicity that it should. Not from the standpoint so much as praising those responsible for the work, as the effect it will have on our tax collections. I refer to the activities of the Intelligence Unit of the Bureau of Internal Revenue. Commissioner of Internal Revenue Guy Helvering has reasons to be proud of the work of Hon. Elmer Irey, Chief of the Intelligence Unit, as well as Irey's men, for the success that has just come to them in the case of Moses L. Annenberg, of Philadelphia. Not only has Annenberg entered a plea of guilty before a Federal judge in Chicago for income-tax evasion, but he has agreed to pay the Government over $10,000,000 in additional tax assessments, penalties, and interest.

When the general public read of how this man, who felt that he was too big and powerful to be required to abide by our income-tax laws, has been brought to the bar of justice and made to pay a fortune it will realize that they too will meet the same fate if they do not play fair with the Government.

The Intelligence Unit makes the citizen pay, regardless of whether his income is derived legally or illegally.

Last week I insisted that Congress should see that the appropriation for this Unit is increased before we adjourn. The new tax bill broadens the income-tax base. It provides for additional excise taxes and it increases taxes from the bottom up. This means a great deal of additional work for the Internal Revenue Bureau. We cannot expect this Bureau to handle a million or more returns without additional help, nor can we expect Mr. Irey and his men with his small force to assume more burdens without more help. At least 100 inspectors and agents should be added to this force because, as I have repeatedly pointed out, the record of the Intelligence Unit over a period of 10 years or more shows it brought to the Treasury $30 for every dollar we have heretofore spent for enforcement of our income-tax laws.

Mr. Speaker, I have just read in last Thursday's St. Louis Post Dispatch a most interesting article showing how Irey and his men trapped Annenberg. Under permission granted me I include that article, written by Marquis W. Childs, as part of my remarks. The article follows:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch]

TAX MEN BRINGING ANNENBERG TO BOOK SPENT 5 YEARS LABORIOUSLY TRACING PROFITS FROM RACING NEWS EMPIRE—TREASURY'S BIGGEST CASE TOOK EQUIVALENT OF 10 MEN WORKING 10 YEARS—THOUSANDS QUESTIONED; HUNDREDS OF BANK ACCOUNTS CHECKED—WHEN AGENTS FINISHED THERE WERE 55 FILING CABINETS OF EVIDENCE FOR GRAND JURY—HOW EXTRAORDINARY DETECTIVE JOB WAS DONE

(By Marquis W. Childs)

CHICAGO, June 6.—It took 100 man-years—that is, the equivalent time of 10 men working 10 years—to make the income tax against Moses (Moe) L. Annenberg who is today sitting in United States Judge James H. Wilkerson's court hearing his attorneys argue why he should not be sent to jail.

If it is any consolation to Annenberg, absolute dictator of the horse-racing industry until the Government stepped in, the Bureau of Internal Revenue, and particularly the agents of the intelligence unit, have spent more time and effort on him than on any of the other noted and notorious individuals who have been charged with tax evasion, and that includes a motley company, ranging from the late Andrew Mellon to Al Capone.

It took 420,000 separate and detailed computations to figure out just what Annenberg's tax bill should be. Thousands of men and women in every part of the United States were interviewed. Hundreds of bank accounts were examined with the most scrupulous care and transactions checked from one bank to another until it was shown who spent the money, where, and why.

FIXING OF PUNISHMENT

Annenberg has pleaded guilty and the proceedings in court are only to determine his punishment, with his chief of counsel, Weymouth Kirkland, arguing that much of the Government's evidence is improper and the inferences drawn from it unfair. Annenberg has agreed to pay $8,000,000 in taxes, Kirkland argued, and that is at the rate of more than twice what a taxpayer would have paid on the income in question under ordinary circumstances.

But no matter what the exact truth may be with respect to separate points in the lengthy Annenberg indictment, two amazing facts stand out. One is the development by this obscure and almost illiterate man of an industry which, in volume of profits at least, ranked with the largest in the country. It took organizing genius of a high order, plus complete ruthlessness.

Equally extraordinary is the detective job that was necessary to bring about Annenberg's plea of guilty. Not very much that was lurid or melodramatic went into this job. It was the painstaking accumulation over 5 years of a mountain of facts. At the time that the case was presented to the grand jury 55 filing cabinets were made ready for use. Documents stacked high in room after room were organized and indexed.

HOW HE BEGAN CAREER

Intelligence agents, working under the immediate direction of Arthur P. Madden, head of the office here, followed Annenberg's past back to his origins. He was born in European territory that has been alternately German and Polish, came to Chicago with his parents as a boy and quickly got a job as canvasser for Hearst's Chicago Evening American. By 1904, when he was 27, he had become circulation manager for the Chicago Examiner, a very tough assignment in view of the newspaper warfare that went on here.

Before this warfare reached its peak of violence, enlisting many plug-uglies who were later to be Chicago's top gangsters, Annenberg was transferred by Hearst in 1907 to Milwaukee to be publisher of the Wisconsin News. It was here that he started his own newspaper and magazine-distributing business which was to have an important part in his later rise to power and wealth. By 1920 he had so proved himself that he was sent to New York and was made circulation manager of all Hearst's newspapers and magazines as well as publisher of the New York Daily Mirror. Six years later he had pushed his own enterprises to such a point that he felt compelled to sever his Hearst connection.

BEGINNING OF INQUIRY

By 1935 he had become one of the Treasury's major problems. What was apparently no more than a routine examination of the books of Annenberg's General News Co. here was started. Actually, agents photographed hundreds of records, knowing that they were at the beginning of a long, long trail.

General News was one of the companies sending race results to bookmakers all over the country, nearly 10,000 in all. These customers were designated in the loosely kept accounts in code. X-23-BY would represent a smoke shop in Harrisburg, Pa., or a poolroom in Tulsa, Okla. Twenty-five men were put to work translating this code material. They didn't trace every customer, but they managed to identify thousands.

General News had 38 branch offices throughout the country and the question next arose whether to examine each of these branches in order to determine if the income reported on the books of the company's headquarters was correct. It was decided to take samples in six or seven branches in order to get a cross section. Discrepancies were found in the records of two—in Baltimore and Los Angeles—and it was thereupon decided to concentrate on the Los Angeles Branch.

YEAR IN FINDING CUSTOMERS

A crew of men worked for nearly a year and finally identified and found virtually all of the customers of the Los Angeles branch. The bank accounts, the telephone, telegraph, and other records of each of these customers were in turn combed, and when the job was finished the Treasury agents knew that the Los Angeles branch had taken in considerably more money than had been reported on the books in Chicago.

As an indication of the extent of this task, the intake of the branch covering only the city of Chicago was $3,285,000 for the 4 years, 1933 to 1936. The home office books for the same period showed a total income from the 38 branches of approximately $20,000,000. The final conclusion was that the Los Angeles office had not reported all the intake. It had disappeared in graft, despite hard-boiled Annenberg supervisors who traveled over the country keeping a watchful eye on branch operators.

All this, it must be remembered, was only one phase of the case. Part of the task was to go over the bank accounts of Annenberg, scattered from Maine to California, and of all the members of his family and his close associates, using a technique developed by the intelligence unit in the Capone case. Even without a canceled check, an item can be taken from an individual's bank record and traced to the place where it was cashed. This method was originally developed by N. E. Tessen, who was in charge of the fraud phase of the Annenberg investigation.

It was important to show where money was spent and what for because Annenberg had entered many so-called expense items on the books of his company that were really for his personal use or for members of his family. In this roundabout way Annenberg had been very generous with his sisters, son-in-law, his seven daughters, his wife, his son, and others.

HOW THE AGENTS WORKED

Here is how this phase of the investigation was carried on. Take, for example, a member of Annenberg's entourage living in Philadelphia. A watch is put on her mail. She is known to be corresponding with a furrier in New York. The furrier is interviewed and says, "Yes; she bought a leopard jacket for $200 and has just ordered a mink coat for $2,500." These expenditures are checked against entries in the books of certain Annenberg companies.

The most extraordinary and seemingly irrelevant information went into this vast haystack. How many pairs of silk stockings were charged to a certain account in a certain New York store over a period of 18 months—804, which must be some sort of a world's record. Who sent what cablegrams from Habana to what boat and why. The cost of vintage champagne per case.

Without any coercion or third degreeing such an investigation assembles more information about the individual than he himself may possess. It is likely to turn up curious quirks of human nature. One of the individuals involved in the Annenberg case was applying under a fictitious name for an apartment in Essex House in New York. Asked for references, he wrote on the stationery of an Annenberg company, of which he was an executive, giving a glowing account of Mr. Blank, his virtues and his high degree of solvency.

FROM HEARST TO DOORMEN

Thousands of people were interviewed not only in this country but in Canada, Cuba, and Mexico. They ranged from lords of the earth, Mr. Hearst, at his palatial San Simeon, to scrub women, hat checkers, doormen.

There emerged a fairly clear picture of Annenberg's own holdings. His property in Milwaukee, including a theater and a drug store, was carried on his books at about $3,500,000. His property in New York, including an apartment house on Park Avenue, was valued at around $5,000,000.

When he bought the Philadelphia Inquirer in 1936, for a reported price of between $12,000,000 and $13,000,000, he raised nearly $8,000,000 in cash from his companies and through loans from his associates. Some of this came in large amounts, several millions from the Cecilia Co., top Annenberg holding corporation. Again it came in small amounts. William L. Molasky, an Annenberg associate in St. Louis, advanced $150,000 of the money used to buy the Inquirer, and this "loan" was the object of lengthy investigation by revenue agents.

OUTLINE FILLS A BOOK

Only a short time ago, after 5 years of work, Agent Madden and his assistants put together an outline of the case for possible use when and if it should come to trial. Even in outline form it filled a book as broad and thick as a dictionary. This history of an amazing career and an amazing investigation will probably remain buried in the Treasury archives. But for future students who may want to know something about a curious, troubled time in the world's affairs it will be an invaluable source book.

Disposal of American Farm Surpluses for the Benefit of European War Refugees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH J. O'BRIEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 10, 1940

ADDRESS BY FRANK GANNETT DELIVERED AT RUTLAND, VT., JUNE 7, 1940, AND ENDORSEMENT BY FRED BRENCKMAN

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Frank Gannett and statement by Fred Brenckman, Washington representative of the National Grange:

A grave food shortage confronts Europe now and a still greater shortage after the war. Famine threatens all the nations involved in this struggle—famine that will be worse than war itself, for it will mean the starvation of untold millions.

Thirty million men are in uniform. Behind the lines, two men are busy supplying each soldier with munitions and material. The total number engaged in military service is approximately 90,000,000, or twice as many people as are gainfully employed in the United States.

These men are not producing food or wealth. They are engaged in the revolting business of mass murder, of killing each other, of destroying everything in the path of the great war machine. These 90,000,000 have been withdrawn from all enterprise—from agriculture, fishing, mining, manufacturing.

Fear of invasion of the neutral countries has made it necessary for a long time to maintain large standing armies withdrawn from productive fields. Fishing, which has been a large source of European food, has been disrupted in extensive areas. Europe had the coldest winter in 10 years. Much feed and food were destroyed by frost, and there is a shortage of next year's seed.

Even Russia has poor prospects for food this year. Their crop will be far below normal.

The transportation of food products to the nations at war has been seriously interrupted, and Lloyd George in February predicted hungry mouths in England. Transportation within the countries at war has been disrupted. Railroads and highways under forced military service have been wearing out, and if the war should end even tomorrow, it would take a long time to restore normal transportation facilities.

In England, France, Germany—wherever the devastation of war may spread—incendiary bombing at harvest time may destroy the already meager food supply. The situation is so bad that Europe is threatened with the worst famine in all history. Starvation makes the difference between civilization and barbarism.

In the face of this awful situation in Europe, our Government is appropriating this year a billion dollars to aid agriculture, most of which will be used to restrict production. Crops this year are restricted by the program of scarcity fostered by the New Deal. Think of it! Millions hungry and in want, while our Government spends money to cut down our supply of food products. We are also told that we now have on hand surpluses of corn, wheat, cotton, and other products waiting favorable marketing conditions.

Here is great opportunity for America. We have almost unlimited possibilities in the production of food and clothing. America can keep millions from starving and from freezing to death in the coming winter.

The Red Cross, of course, has been doing splendid work. Millions are responding to its noble appeals. But however generous individuals will be, the Red Cross can supply only a meager part of the help that is needed.

Therefore, I make this proposal: That Congress should make a new appropriation up to $500,000,000 to purchase our surplus agricultural products, this amount to be made available dollar for dollar as France, England, and other designated countries purchase foodstuffs in the United States in regular commercial transactions. Meat, wheat, corn, lard, butter, powdered milk, and cotton are products most needed.

I suggest that our donated agricultural products be supplied through an organization such as Mr. Hoover set up during the last World War, to be distributed to refugee and needy groups.

Five hundred million dollars should cover, at $125 each, the annual food cost for the 4,000,000 refugees who already have become a burden on France and England.

If in this way we could move $1,000,000,000 worth of foodstuffs to the sufferers in Europe, we could undoubtedly—if we ended the New Deal scarcity program—abandon our policy of restricting production and save at least a large part of the billion dollars that we are this year giving to farmers for decreasing production.

This aid that I have suggested is especially necessary because the currencies of the countries at war have fallen in value. For example: The pound sterling, which formerly was worth $5 in our money and could buy 5 bushels of wheat at $1 a bushel, has fallen to less than $3.30, so that today a British pound sterling can buy only 3⅓ bushels of wheat at $1 a bushel. In other words, the drop in the value of the British pound means an increase of 50 percent in the price of our food to a British consumer.

My proposal would overcome this disadvantage, and make it possible for these brave people who are in great need to buy our food at a reasonable price. Because of the great need of airplanes and war materials, these nations are spending their money here largely for war materials. As a result, the farmers of America are suffering from a loss of their export markets. As the war continues, less and less food will be exported from America to Europe. The increase in the activity of a few plants filling war orders will not offset the tremendous loss that will be suffered by our farmers.

My proposal not only would help the farmers market a billion dollars' worth of food, but it would give to all America the great satisfaction of helping to feed the victims of this unspeakably cruel war. It would teach the American people anew a moral lesson: "It is more blessed to give than to destroy."

And it would not be necessary longer to plow under our crops or kill little pigs. Along that line I would suggest going further. Every restriction on normal food-crop production should be lifted at once. What starving Europe may not need before its devastated fields can again produce, we may need if war should come to us. We should be growing full, normal crops this year.

How our farmers would rejoice if they were given the "go" sign to produce all the crops they could grow. With famine certain for Europe in the coming year, all the food that we can produce could be marketed, with the assistance of the Government, along the lines that I have proposed. Congress has here an opportunity of rendering tremendous service to mankind.

This would not only be a great humanitarian program, but it would be good, sound business. Every businessman endeavors to help a customer finance a purchase of any sort. This is another illustration of the need in government of good, sound business experience.

If our farmers could sell their crops abroad, they would enjoy prosperity. Prosperity for the farmer means prosperity for the country. In fact, the Nation cannot prosper unless the farmer prospers.

Entirely apart from the need of warding off starvation from millions in Europe, we must give constructive help to agriculture, or our agricultural exports will continue to decline even during the war. Our agricultural exports already have fallen in value almost one-half. They averaged a billion and a quarter dollars a year under President Hoover. They have averaged only three-quarters of a billion under President Roosevelt.

While our farm prices were depressed and our agricultural exports were decreasing, our farmers have suffered another blow through the Hull trade treaties permitting foreign agricultural products to enter our markets and depress prices here. If someone benefited by them, it was not the farmer.

The farmer is the foundation of the market for manufactured goods. Research shows that among our farmers there is an unlimited market for bathrooms, radios, washing machines, vacuum cleaners, sewing machines, automobiles, trucks, tractors, and farm machinery. If the farmer had his just income of four or five billion dollars more a year, every farmer would have $666 to $800 more a year to spend. What a market there would then be for the products of our cities! There would be such a demand for these things that city industries would have to work to capacity to supply the demands.

There is another reason why our farmers must have increased income. What America's future shall be will depend largely on the economic status of American agriculture in our lifetime. If 25 percent of our gainfully employed, contributing the unpaid labor of 22,000,000 of women and children and fifty billions of capital, are to continue to have their income reduced as now to 10 percent of the national income, disintegration lies ahead. With agriculture so impoverished, the physical, intellectual, and moral quality of that new blood stream from farm to city must deteriorate as it becomes increasingly difficult to maintain schools, churches, and social standards in rural districts. Thirty-one percent of the Nation's youth is fed, clothed, and educated by our farmers on less than 10 percent of the national income.

The population of our cities does not reproduce itself. Ten city adults bear only seven children. The vitality of our cities must be replenished by that continuing blood stream from the soil. Whether the youth who migrate to the cities shall be educated, grounded in American ideals and prepared for life's work, or shall be ignorant, unskilled, discouraged, and fertile soil for alien "isms," must necessarily depend in large part on the restoration of a just price level for our rural population. There is no time to delay.

The National Grange, through its Washington representative, Fred Brenckman, today issued the following statement regarding the disposal of American farm surpluses for the benefit of European war refugees:

"There is much to be commended in the speech made by Frank Gannett, the Rochester publisher, at Rutland, Vt., June 7, advocating the disposition of surplus American farm products for the benefit of the war refugees of Europe.

"Mr. Gannett urged the enlargement of American aid to include foodstuffs necessary to save millions of European refugees and avert what might become one of the greatest famines in history.

"He proposes that Congress appropriate up to $500,000,000 to purchase American surplus agricultural products if France, England, or any other designated country purchases the same amount of foodstuffs in the United States in the regular course of business. These foodstuffs would be donated to the unfortunate victims of the European war.

"This is a practical and humanitarian plan and is worthy of careful consideration not only by the farm groups of the United States but by Congress as well. Congress should thoroughly explore the possibilities of this proposal and if found feasible should act upon it before adjournment."

Get Out the Vote

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEE E. GEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 7, 1940

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, everyone who believes in American ideals—in the freedom to express one's honest opinions and in the democratic election of Representatives to Congress—will be interested in an incident which recently happened in Richmond, Va. A young man dared to say that requiring a poll tax to be paid in eight States in the South before permitting a person to vote means denial of the right to vote in many instances, and that it should therefore be eliminated. For his adherence to the American principle of democracy this young man lost his job, due to the fact that the company for which he was working was threatened with a boycott by certain un-American Richmonders unless the young man was discharged. In order to prevent further retaliation against this young man, I shall not use his name, but under my leave to extend my remarks I am entering the speech which caused the loss of his job. This speech was broadcast April 19, 1940:

For the past 2 years the ——— Young Democratic Club has sponsored a get-out-the-vote campaign in order that a larger number of the people in Richmond and vicinity might participate in choosing the men and women who are to represent us in public office on a city- and State-wide scale.

November 5 we will cast our votes for President, Vice President, Senators, and Congressmen. These people will make laws, amend and abolish other laws. Our relations on a Nation-wide scale will be determined by these elected Representatives of the voters in Washington. It is they who will govern our relations with other countries of the world. Local issues that seem completely disconnected from Washington's influence will of necessity follow the line laid down by the President and Congress.

Many problems face us as Southerners and Americans. Some of them are peculiar only to the South; others we hold in common with the rest of the United States.

Of great importance to us as Americans is the question of the foreign policy of the United States, or, in plain language, how shall we, as a nation, conduct ourselves in dealing with all other nations of the world. Which nation shall we favor in our trade agreements; which ones shall we place at a disadvantage? Will Japan be allowed to continue buying war materials from the United States to be used in the war against China? How about the people in our colonies—Puerto Rico and the Philippines—shall they be allowed their independence or will they continue to be ruled from Washington? In our relations with our neighbors to the south of us, Latin America, shall we establish the good-neighbor policy or apply the policy of the big stick? How must we act toward the warring nations of Europe? Shall we become involved in the European war?

Of equal importance is the question of Washington's attitude toward social, economic, and labor legislation affecting the entire country. The past 8 years have seen drastic changes in the approach of our national legislators and Chief Executive to these problems. The paralysis of our national economy following the economic crash of 1929 made it imperative that the Federal Government pass legislation to help lessen the suffering of our people. It has been during this period that the responsibility of the Federal Government to provide work for the people, when private enterprise was not able to do so, has been recognized. The large number of families needing direct financial assistance that could not be given by local and State agencies made it necessary for the Federal Government to provide money for direct aid to these people. The inability of individual States to provide schools, parks, roads, hospitals, and other essentials for the well-being of the Nation demanded that Washington do the job. The evils resulting from long hours and low pay in industry brought about legislation to establish maximum hours and minimum wages, thereby putting more people to work and increasing the total income of the Nation's wage workers. Bitter strife between workers and employers was lessened through appropriate legislation and the establishment of responsible government boards for the examination of employer and trade-union relations, saving millions of dollars in lost time by prompt settlement of labor disputes. All of this legislation, social, economic, and labor, is now up for examination. Shall we continue along these lines or shall we go back to the days of 1930, 1931, and 1932?

As southerners, one of the most important problems of this time is that of making it possible for all of our people to take part in the selection of our national, State, and local representatives. This means that the South must be allowed the right to vote. This is as true of Virginia as of the rest of the South. The plain fact is this: Only one out of four persons is eligible to vote in the eight Southern States where payment of a poll tax is required before one can vote. In the rest of the United States where no poll tax is required, three out of four persons, 75 percent of the adult population, vote in the elections for national, State, and local officers. This means that three-fourths of the people in Virginia and the South have absolutely no voice in the Government—be it national, State, or local. Inasmuch as this condition exists in the South it cannot be said that our elected representatives are truly representative of the people. The people who rule the States of Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Mississippi, South Carolina, Texas, Tennessee, and Virginia are not the representatives of the entire people. Nor are the governors, State legislators, members of city councils, mayors, and county officials representatives of the majority of the people. The same is true of the Senators and Congressmen in Washington who are from these States. We can take as an example one man in Congress in the public eye at the present time who was elected by only 4 percent of the population in his district. Can it be said that he represents the people in his district? Yet he is accepted as such. This is not the democratic way.

The poll tax was slipped over on the Southern people. Every kind of trickery was used. In our own State it was done in the Constitutional Convention of 1902 and even today has never been submitted to the people of Virginia for ratification. Were the people of this State able to express themselves on this subject, I am sure that Virginia would not have a tax scheme that disfranchises three-fourths of its citizens. And if this three-fourths were not disfranchised, if they were allowed to express their needs and desires by means of the ballot, I am sure that the history of Virginia in the past would have been entirely different from that we have known, and the position of Virginia as a State in the Union would be that of a leading one as it was in the old days. Virginia once led the Union in many fields; today she is among the most backward in the Union as regards literacy, wages, crime, disease, housing, and many other things. And all of this is directly traceable to the disfranchisement of the Virginia people. Such a degeneration is inevitable in a society where the people do not have a voice in their rule. As that greatest of all Democrats, Thomas Jefferson, said, and I quote, "Every government degenerates when entrusted to the rulers of the people alone. The people themselves therefore are its only safe depositories. The influence over government must be shared by all the people. If every individual who composes their mass participates in the ultimate authority, the government will be safe."

There is only one way for the people of Virginia to rid themselves of the poll tax, and that is by amending the State constitution. This will take 4 years. But there is no other way of doing it. However, there is a chance of making it possible for the people of Virginia to vote for national representatives; that is, for President, Vice President, Senators, and Congressmen. A bill has recently been introduced in Congress by LEE GEYER, Democrat, of California, that will make it unlawful for any State to require the payment of a poll tax in order to qualify for voting for any of the national officers. While this is certainly not the final answer, still it would represent a long step forward and should be supported. We urge that you give all possible support to the Geyer bill. But the problem of doing away with the poll tax completely can only be done by getting as many people as we can to participate in the State elections and gain enough strength to defeat the poll tax by amending the constitution. Once this is accomplished and the people assured of a voice in the State government, it will be possible for Virginia to go ahead and take her rightful place in the Nation.

Knowing these things, and appreciating what they mean, impresses us with the importance of voting, of having our say in the Government. It makes us realize that if we do not express our needs and desires by means of the ballot, then we can never be sure that the Government will act in accordance with what is best for the majority of us. Not to take part in the political life of a democracy is a very dangerous thing. That is why we, the members of the ——— Young Democratic Club, urge you to prepare yourself to vote. The picture is not nearly so dark as it looks if we examine the methods by which it is possible for us to bring democracy back to Virginia. It is primarily a question of each one of us using his influence, of explaining the need of people casting their ballots. This can be done in a number of ways, the following being an example that can be expanded upon: Most people in Richmond and vicinity belong to some kind of an organization, such as churches, clubs, trade-unions, and the like. It is through these organizations that it is easiest for us to influence the largest number of people. Go to these organizations, tell them about Virginia and how only one out of four of our people can take part in the making of laws that will affect them directly. Explain to them how it was possible for the people who already have the right to vote to express themselves on the question of better housing and a modern form of city government in the recent city primaries when they defeated Mayor Bright, the man who opposed slum clearance in Richmond and who fought to maintain the archaic bicameral form of city government. Tell them how progressive voters in Richmond elected a man committed to clearing the slum areas that breed crime and disease, a man who agrees with the majority of Richmond voters that the present form of city government is out of date and must be replaced by the one-body form of government, which will make it necessary for the body to act on questions and will not allow a vital question to be evaded by passing it backward and forward from one body to the other until it is lullabyed to sleep as has so often happened in the past.

The unicameral form of city government lets the people know exactly how individual members of the city government stand on all questions; there can be no evading and passing the buck. This is what Richmond needs and has asked for. Richmond needs other things and it can get them if we will act. Explain these things to all these groups. Once they understand as you do how important it is, then they too will act. And they in turn will get others to act.

But we still have the poll tax and before one can vote it must be paid up in full. That means that it must have been paid for 3 years back. The tax is $1.50 a year plus a few cents penalty, so if you owe for 3 years it will cost you $4.80. After you pay your tax you must register before you can vote. Having done these two things you will be listed as eligible to vote.

To pay your poll tax go to the city hall. You also register at the city hall. However, there is another thing and that is, you must have paid your poll tax 6 months before election day or you will not be allowed to vote. The dead line for paying the poll tax so that you can vote in November 1940, is May 5. You must pay your poll tax before this date if you are to have a voice on these vital questions facing us now.

Don't forget: There are only a few days left. Pay your poll tax. Tell your friends to become qualified voters. Let's get out the vote.

Rural Electrification

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. NORRIS

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. HARRY SLATTERY

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Hon. Harry Slattery on June 3, 1940, on the progress of the Rural Electrification Administration and its work.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"The lights are going out all over Europe. The Rural Electrification Administration is helping to turn them on all over rural America."

They were striking words, spoken to me from the heart of a man high in the esteem of the American people and high in the ranks of American jurisprudence as I sat with him on a recent evening.

Those words stuck in my heart. And if a phrase can embrace all the challenge and significance of an idea, that phrase is today's inspiration for the rural-electrification program: The lights are going out all over Europe; * * * R. E. A., as we call the Rural Electrification Administration, is helping to turn them on all over rural America. And as I speak to you tonight there are thousands of farm families along new R. E. A. financed rural power lines from coast to coast who listen by the light, and hear by the magic of radio, that electricity has brought at last to their farms. They know much of the story I shall tell, and I trust they hear me with approval. To all of you, I report the progress of a development for the people of rural America that is closely linked with the lives and livelihoods of every one of us.

America needs light today; light for the mind, and light for the eyes. With that thought in mind I want to acknowledge with deep sincerity my gratitude for the opportunity to speak to you tonight—my gratitude to the blue network of the N. B. C. and to the Washington Evening Star. For these Star Forum programs are designed to bring light to our minds. And this brief discussion of the R. E. A.'s endeavor to help bring light to the eyes of rural America will, I think, stand up to that tradition.

For more than 30 years I have been intimately associated with the conservation and electric power program in America. Twenty-five years ago I watched the beginnings of the movement to bring the benefits of electricity to the farms of the country. I heard the late Senator Robert M. La Follette, sterling leader and statesman, repeat often the slogan which he carried on the masthead of his weekly paper. "Where there is no vision, the people perish." He was one of the first to voice the hope of bringing the blessings of electricity to the families of rural America. He had the vision.

Twenty-eight years ago I saw the great strides already achieved in rural electrification in Ontario, Canada, and on my return from that trip I saw and talked with the great Steinmetz, wizard of electricity, at work in his General Electric Co. laboratories in Schenectady. He spoke even then of his belief in a network of transmission lines that would gird this country border to border, and reach into every hamlet and every home. He had the vision.

I watched Gifford Pinchot, when first Governor of Pennsylvania, endeavor to awaken the Keystone State to the need for rural electrification. He had the vision.

In his efforts to decentralize industrial activity, Justice Louis D. Brandeis early saw the need and potentialities of electricity in small villages, towns, and on the farm. He also had the vision—and still has, I assure you.

During the administration of Theodore Roosevelt, the grandfather of the present Secretary of Agriculture, affectionately known to thousands of you in the Middle West as "Uncle Henry" Wallace, urged the cooperative electrification of our rural areas.

He had the vision then. His grandson, Henry A. Wallace, the present Secretary of Agriculture, has the vision now as indicated by his achievements for the farmer's welfare and for rural electrification.

President Roosevelt has told how, while he was visiting Warm Springs some years ago, an idea crystallized into a plan of action. The idea which he had long cherished was: Electricity is a necessity of modern life and ought to be found in every village, every home, every farm, in every part of the United States. The plan of action was the creation of the Rural Electrification Administration. All of us know he had the vision.

Today the work of the Rural Electrification Administration has brought that vision of these men and many others to a reality—electricity on the farm is a fact for hundreds of thousands of our people. For many more, it is on the march.

I wish it were somehow possible for you out there on the loudspeaker end of this discussion to shoot questions at me as I go along, then we'd have a real forum, but I think I can anticipate many of your possible queries.

What is this rural electrification?

Why is the Federal Government stimulating the development of electric service for unserved farm families, anyway?

Who benefits—only the farmer?

What does it cost, and who's going to pay the bill?

How is the program carried on, and what has been accomplished?

Let's turn the pages of the book of rural electrification on the march and sift the answers. The facts are simple and plain.

Rural electrification means, obviously enough, the taking of electric service to unserved rural areas of the Nation. But it means more than that, too. It means the extension of opportunity for farm families to live on a plane equal to that enjoyed by the family in the city. It means bringing to the farmer new tools for making a better living—doing a better job of working a livelihood from the soil. It means better sanitation and a stepped-up standard of farm health. It means increased living comfort for all the farm family—not the comfort that softens a man's muscles, but the comfort that promotes leisure and an opportunity to plan, to think, to sharpen the mind through intelligent use of leisure.

For the boy and girl on the farm, rural electrification means a renewed interest in seeking his or her place in life, in the country—not in the harried confines of a city shop—or in the too-long line that still leads to a dismal employment office.

These things are the real essence of rural electrification—and the Rural Electrification Administration and its program are designed to speed the sound development of these basic improvements for the agricultural arm of the Nation.

As late as 1925 the established private power companies had extended electric service to only about 200,000 farms. At that time there were nearly six and a half million farms in America. From 1925 until 1935 service was extended to about half a million more, but the unplanned character of these rural extensions, often simply short fingers reaching out from the cities, merely skimmed the cream of potential rural consumers and left more than five and a half million farms unserved.

Nine farm families in every ten did not have, and many of them had forsaken the idea of ever being able to get, electricity.

They needed it. And it was important to the Nation as a whole that they have it. I say it was important to the Nation because the efficiency and convenience of life in the city had developed rapidly, largely as the result of electricity, while people who lived in the country still had to get along with old-fashioned, and for some farm work, almost pioneer types of equipment. Socially and economically, country and city were thrown increasingly out of balance. In terms of effective living the agricultural arm of the Nation grew proportionately weaker as the urban arm became stronger.

No one needs an economist to explain that such a situation undermines the strength and the competence of our whole social and economic organism. And a situation that did not make good economic sense had to be remedied.

The Nation could not afford to have five and a half million farm families living in the era of the kerosene lamp while the rest of the Nation, the Nation in which they had to live and make a living, went speeding on, geared up for the age of electricity.

The Nation could not afford to have more than five and a half million farm families handicapped for want of the modern tools for better living and more effective production that had become such potent instruments for progress in the city home and factory.

It was evident that electricity could bring the farm family, insofar as electric service and its attendant advantages were concerned, into closer social and economic parity with the city family. And in 1935 the growing appreciation of these facts, coupled with the need for added stimulus to national and employment industry running in low gear, set the stage for the timely establishment of the Rural Electrification Administration.

Congress acted under the dynamic intellectual and practical leadership of such men as Senator GEORGE W. NORRIS, of Nebraska, Congressman SAM RAYBURN, of Texas, and Congressman JOHN ELLIOTT RANKIN, of Mississippi—provided the funds for actually building rural power lines. Construction took the place of conversation, and the rural electrification program was under way. R. E. A. started lending money; low cost electric service started to spread, slowly but with growing vigor into unserved rural areas; and the money used to build the lines prompted new activity in a hundred trades and crafts.

First benefits of the new rural electrification went to the farm family. Electricity lit the farmer's evening—sped his completion of a dozen nightly chores. Electricity sprang to action for the farm woman in her kitchen * * * pumped the water for her many tasks and retired the awkward pail that had bent her back on countless trips to the pump. Farm youngsters turned to their school books with more enthusiasm and less eyestrain. Across the face of isolated countrysides thousands of folks thrilled to the magic of their new-found perfect farmhand—low cost electricity at the snap of a switch.

And across the face of industrial America a new stimulus was felt as the demands of rural line construction piled up new orders for wire and insulators and poles and hardware, piled up new demands for the services of workers in the mines, in transportation and in electrical equipment factories.

The new rural electrification built new outlooks and new incentives and new tools for the farm family while it bolstered employment and the pay roll of the Nation.

Who benefits from the far-reaching program to take low-cost electricity to the Nation's farmsteads? The farm families, yes; but you and I as well. For each fundamental improvement in the lot of one branch of our national family spreads its benefits through the whole economic and social fabric of America.

During the first 5 years of operation, concluded last month, R. E. A. lent $270,000,000 for the construction of rural power lines to serve 850,000 farm families and other rural users. A relatively small amount of this money has been made available for financing farm wiring and plumbing and for the construction of generating plants in places and in situations where electricity could not be purchased wholesale at rates which would permit the rural electric systems to provide low-cost service to their consumer-members and pay out as the law requires.

Two hundred and seventy million dollars is a tremendous sum of money, but it has been lent strictly as an investment. The law under which the Rural Electrification Administration operates requires that all this money be returned to the Treasury, with interest, within 20 to 25 years.

The American people, through their Government, have made this investment in the people and the prospects of America's most basic industry—agriculture. It is a sound investment. The cash will be repaid by the farm families who use electric service. And these families will also pay the small interest charge on that cash. But the return of actual value to you and me as taxpayers will exceed a hundredfold the money returned to the Treasury. No economist can compute the value to the Nation of the new vitality, the new standard of health and of living, the new impetus to better farm production, or the whole new outlook on life in a democratic United States that is the fundamental product of the rural electrification program.

Money is the lifeblood and action is the creed of this dynamic effort to speed the electrification of rural America. But the job could not have been done as it has been done without the enlistment of new attitudes and new principles of management.

The new attitudes and the new principles are those of cooperation.

Cooperation is the idea and the method that has made possible most of the rural electrification stimulated by the R. E. A.

And cooperative principles of management—principles designed solely for the purpose of providing service, unhampered by the demand for profits—these principles are the operating device for building and maintaining the new rural electric systems.

Nearly 90 percent of all R. E. A. loans have been made to cooperative organizations of progressive farm people. Their functioning is simple, democratic, and well adapted both to the temper and the interests of the farmer and to the job of providing electric service in rural areas.

This is how the cooperative grows and works in the field of rural electrification.

A group of farmers who want service meet and organize as a corporation. They apply to R. E. A. for a loan. The amount of the loan depends upon the amount of line that must be built, the engineering and related problems that must be met in building comprehensive service for the area to be served, and the number of farms that will use the service. After a thorough investigation of the economic, agricultural, and engineering factors that will affect the financial and service success of the cooperative—and providing, of course, that the investigation proves the feasibility of the intended construction, R. E. A. grants the loan.

All farmers who are to take service join the cooperative. Each pays a nominal membership fee into the treasury of the cooperative, and this money is used to offset the expenses of organization and initial development. Each member has an equal vote and voice in the management of the cooperative, and this, I submit, is a pattern for true democracy in action.

The cooperative employs a manager and other competent personnel to handle specialized tasks of operation and management. These employees, responsible to a board of directors elected by and from the membership, run the business as any other sound business is run—always with this exception, however, that their responsibility is to the members, the folks whom they serve, rather than to stockholders. Their entire effort is directed toward the maintenance and improvement of service—a service job, undiluted by demand for profit.

The farmer-member's responsibility to his cooperative is simple. His sole obligation is to pay his bills for current, to use his electricity wisely and abundantly for the improvement of his home and his work, thus contributing to the financial soundness of his cooperative, and to take an active part in the affairs of his system to the end that it serve the whole farm community completely and as fully as possible.

Throughout all stages of the cooperative's organization and development the staff of the Rural Electrification Administration works with the staff and membership of the cooperative, smoothing its way in matters of law, assisting in the engineering and maintenance of the lines, helping the farm families to initiate the most practical and profit-producing applications of electricity.

That, in brief, is the way these rural electric cooperatives function.

All these answers to the questions which I posed myself point up the final question which always comes to the alert mind, "So what?" What does all this mean in terms of accomplishment—accomplishment we can weigh and appraise? Does it all add up to a tangible result that justifies the expenditure of time and money and tremendous effort? A practical America wants results. These are the results to date of the R. E. A. program to electrify rural America.

More than 600 R. E. A.-financed rural electric systems are now in operation. These systems are serving over half a million consumer-members and new members are being added every day. Nearly a hundred other systems are being speeded to completion and each tomorrow brings to my desk reports of construction completed, lines energized, the juice turned on. These additional systems will serve half again as many farm families and other rural users. Awaiting the momentary allotment of funds for construction are plans for 75,000 miles of power line destined to bring service to many thousands more. Moneys already allotted will ultimately bring electric service to 4,000,000 rural people.

Farmers in 45 of the 48 States have enlisted R. E. A. cooperation. Only in 3 States no R. E. A. power systems have been set up. There, in some instances, the farmers have been prevented in various ways from building and operating their own electric distribution systems. But I hope we will eventually bring R. E. A. to these States.

This movement for rural electrification owes no little to the firm support of the agriculture organizations like the Farm Bureau, the National Grange, the Farmers' Union, and others.

I want to take this occasion to say, too, that the success of the R. E. A. program is due in a large part to the devoted day-in-and-day-out efforts of the men and women of the R. E. A. staff both in Washington and in the field.

Since the inception of the R. E. A. program the number of farms served with high-line electric power has increased by 150 percent. In 1935, 1 farm in 10 had central station service; today 1 farm family in 4 enjoys the new opportunity and incentive for more effective life and work on the farm that comes with the magic of electricity at the click of a switch.

These have been the physical, the tangible results of the R. E. A. program.

Less tangible, but no less real and important, are the human results.

Written in the eyes of thousands upon thousands of farm women is a joy and sense of new freedom from drudgeries inherited from the pioneers. The electric refrigerator; running water, pumped with electricity; a bright light over her sink; an electric bulb in her hen house, prompting extra egg income from her hens—these things are not mere gadgets for improved living to the farm woman—these things are symbols of a dream come true.

Better farm management, made possible by electric equipment, reflects the electrified farmer's new sense of opportunity to make his farming a more profitable and a more satisfying way of life.

Farm youngsters have a yen to stick to the old place, because the old place is a better place—as good as the city cousin's—when electricity turns on the lights.

Only they who toil in the highlands and along the river bottoms, they who work the soil to fill the larder of our Nation—they know best how great are these results. To them the new rural power lines are symbols of their modern pioneering, a new source of power for their modern progress.

In a letter to me commemorating the fifth anniversary of R. E. A., President Roosevelt acknowledged the significance of these human results in these words: "* * * even in a complex industrial economy such as ours the roots of national well-being strike deeply into the soil. But particularly in times like these, all who strive to bring to the life of the American farmer new comfort, new power, and new dignity may take special pride in their task."

We do take special pride in our task. But it is the pride one feels as he accepts a challenge, such a challenge as was implied by Secretary of Agriculture Henry A. Wallace when he said to our R. E. A. staff recently, "Electricity in agriculture is going to be enormously more important than any of us now appreciate."

We are challenged by many things today. Many are grim but many others are promising. America has never looked down, and she never shall, so long as her men and women, free and independent in thought and action, can join together of their own will to accomplish common ends for the common good.

Our problems as a nation are grave, but no chaos in the tides of human affairs can match the spirit of our confidence in the future of America.

And I say to you, every one, that the electrification of rural America by and for the farmers themselves is a vital, democratic action that is proof, positive and triumphant, that our American way of life is virile and equal to every challenge of the future.

Is Roosevelt Trying To Dissolve Congress So He Can Plunge the United States Into Another Foreign War?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS D. THILL

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 10, 1940

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, Roosevelt has most likely committed an act of war in ordering our war equipment traded in to help the Allies. The stratagem of turning planes back to the manufacturer with the proviso that he in turn transfer the material does not deceive anyone. Is the country ready to approve such intervention? Does the Congress approve of it? Does Roosevelt believe that war is inevitable and that we should now begin by supporting war on European battlefields?

No one seems to know what the President's policy is, because he has not taken the country into his confidence, nor has he explained the significance of his far-reaching action, nor has he divulged how far he will go. When it was brought to Roosevelt's attention that the Republicans desired to have Congress continue in session for the duration of the emergency, he is alleged to have said, rather sarcastically, that he saw no good reason for Congress to remain in session except for the laudable goal of delivering speeches. Is Roosevelt trying to dissolve Congress so he can plunge the United States into another foreign war?

It might be well for certain interventionists to read the following newspaper editorial, which quotes a passage from a book written by Hilaire Belloc, an English writer:

[From the Washington (D. C.) Times-Herald]

UNCLE BARBARA MANVILLE

Sometimes the United States as a nation—Uncle Sam—makes us think of Barbara Hutton and Tommy Manville. Through no particular merit of their own our ancestors lucked into and took away from the Indians a fabulously wealthy and beautiful country.

Below this country's surface soil was a world of petroleum, coal, iron, copper, gold, silver, and natural gas. Its surface soil over large areas was so fertile as to be capable of producing crops of unheard-of richness and size. That soil continues so fertile that we have to pay our farmers not to produce too much—in contrast to Europe, which hovers endlessly on the brink of serious food shortages.

We occasionally act as a nation like some inheritor of great wealth who does eccentric and highly expensive things because he or she can afford them, or thinks so.

Our Navy Department has now released to the Curtiss-Wright plane factory at Buffalo 50 first-line bombers, somewhat outmoded but very serviceable, for immediate reshipment to the Allies. The move is reported to have been made "with White House approval, if not actual order."

What we think it means is that President Roosevelt has decided to sell the American people the idea that they should go to any lengths that may be necessary to enable the Allies to win the war.

The first step will, of course, not be the last, unless the war ends almost immediately—of which there seems little chance. Soon it will be 500 planes that the Allies must have, then probably another 500, and so on. It is now easy to foresee another A. E. F. going to another war to end war.

We believe the President has the magnetism and the popularity to enable him to sell actual if not declared participation in this war to the American people, just as Woodrow Wilson was able to do in 1917.

We have no doubt that the President sincerely believes the Allies must win if the world is to go on being livable for typical Americans, Englishmen, Frenchmen. And he may be right. He may be more far-seeing than isolationists who view with horror a second American attempt to bail Europe out of one of its endless wars.

To assist the President as a coordinate branch of the Government, we think Congress should sit through to next January 3, either in recess or in actual session; that it should not adjourn.

Of course, if we get into this war, the thing for us to do is to put out every ounce of strength in an effort to win it.

CAN WE BAIL THEM OUT THIS TIME?

Whether we can win it for the Allies is another question. Italy, Russia, and Japan were lined up with the Allies in the World War; Russia was impotent by the time we went in. Even so, it took the Allies 52 months and our weight to beat the Germans. This time, Italy is tied up with Germany; Russia is at least benevolently neutral toward Germany; and Japan is trying to muscle the white man out of the Far East. Maybe even American man- and machine-power can't enable the Allies to win this time.

In this connection, we reproduce a passage from a book by the eminent English writer, Hilaire Belloc—The Cruise of the Nona, published in 1925, and sent to us with the passage marked by Mrs. Alice Roosevelt Longworth. Mr. Belloc was recalling the World War:

"The most comic part of the affair was the attitude toward America. We dared not insult America, for we were naturally as keen on getting American help as is a drowning man on catching a deck chair.

* * * * * * *

"In their ignorance many people came to believe that it was the duty of the Americans to come over and help, and, what was more astounding still, it was represented to them as a matter of life and death, not to us, but to themselves. The Americans were told—Heaven knows whether any of them believed it—that if the Germans, Austrians, Bohemians, Slovenes, Croats, Bulgarians, Turks, etc., won in their push against the English, French, and Italians, that if the half-baked won against the baked, the next thing would be a sailing of the conquerors over the sea for the rude domination of Scranton, Pa. Fiddlestick-ends!"

"But people did really talk like that. They shook their fingers at the United States, and said: "It will be your turn next."

That's the way the English think about us between wars.

Adjournment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN G. ALEXANDER
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, June 10, 1940

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I am being deluged with messages from citizens in my district and in fact from all over Minnesota, expressing opposition to the adjournment of Congress at this time, or as long as the war situation is as disturbing as at present.

I am glad to be able to report that the Republican Members of Congress are in almost unanimous agreement on this subject and have voted to oppose adjournment. The press has already been advised of this decision by Minority Leader JOSEPH MARTIN.

I am also pleased to be able to say that my conversations here with several Democratic Members indicate that they are also opposed to adjournment at this time.

For the benefit of those who are in doubt on the subject I submit the following typical letters which arrived among many others in this morning's mail:

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., June 6, 1940.

Congressman JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ALEXANDER: Now more than ever we need able statesmen at Washington. I know you to be such and I plead with you to stay in session during this time of war hysteria. We want no part in this war. I am afraid that if our Representatives leave Washington they may never be called back. I feel that our grand Republic is in danger, as well as the life of my sons.

With best wishes for your success, I am

MRS. A. J. LEONARD.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., June 7, 1940.

Hon. JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In the past you have shown your good will by supporting legislation which the people of this State asked for. With war pending, it certainly would not be wise to adjourn Congress at this time, as that would too easily pave the way for a dictatorship. Never do the citizens of the United States want to be ruled by a dictator. We treasure our freedom and respect our ancestors who fought for it too much for that.

My sincere belief as well as everyone else's is that this country should not become entangled in war. However, we do believe it vitally important to be prepared. Please do everything in your power to keep us out of war and to keep Congress from adjourning.

Sincerely yours,

LORRAINE MEUERS.

ROCHESTER, MINN., June 6, 1940.

Hon. JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR ALEXANDER: America must not be made the cat's paw of Great Britain.

Congress must remain in session to rescue this great Republic of ours from the ferocious jaws of the international plunderbund that threatens to destroy and devour the Nation completely—and will unless the elected guardians of our Government stay on the job and eliminate those who would sell our country for 30 pieces of silver—or gold, perhaps.

Yours sincerely,

S. O. SANDERSON,
Chairman, Minnesota Stabilization Council.

MINNESOTA DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION,
St. Paul, Minn., June 8, 1940.

JOHN G. ALEXANDER, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At the annual meeting of the Minnesota Daughters of the American Revolution a motion was passed, as follows:

"Resolved, That in view of the present world situation it is the desire of this body that the Congress of the United States should remain in continuous session, recessing from time to time, as the Congress may deem wise. Be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to each member of the Minnesota delegation in Congress."

Thanking you for your consideration of this matter, I am,

Very truly yours,

(MRS. T. J.) DOROTHY L. KENNEDY,
State Corresponding Secretary.

Mr. Speaker, why adjourn? Are we not being paid to serve 12 months in each year? I shall hope the administration will not press the matter further.

"We Do Not Want Your Blasted American Planes," Lord Beaverbrook Advises America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN McDOWELL
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, June 10, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS OF FULTON LEWIS, JR.

Mr. McDOWELL. Mr. Speaker, last Thursday night, immediately after the President's unprecedented order to strip our American defense system by ordering the Navy to sell 50 of its best bombing planes to the British and French, Fulton Lewis, Jr., made one of the most remarkable and significant broadcasts of his career. Fulton Lewis, Jr., is rapidly coming to be recognized as the outstanding radio news reporter in America, and his studied and seasoned judgment merits the careful consideration of every citizen in America who does not want to see his country swept into the maelstrom of a foreign war on the wave of an inspired hysteria by highly paid warmongers.

ARE WE TO INVITE ATTACK FROM JAPAN BY SCUTTLING OUR OWN DEFENSES?

In view of the attitude of English lords and leaders and their disdain for American planes during the long months which the war has already been in progress, it is small wonder that west coast citizens in California, Oregon, and Washington, as well as thoughtful citizens throughout America, are beginning to wonder whether a policy of stripping our own meager defense establishments and depriving this country of the few modern arms and airplanes which we have is not virtually sending an invitation to Japan and Russia to "come and get us" since we are exposing our vast resources and democratic institutions to the wrath of the world by releasing them for sale by private companies to nations now at war.

Mr. Speaker, I call your attention to this thought-provoking broadcast by Fulton Lewis, Jr., of Thursday, June 6, 1940:

Good evening, ladies and gentlemen, this is Fulton Lewis, Jr., speaking from the studios of WOL in Washington. There's one very hot flash of news that has just broken here. Fifty fighting planes of the United States Navy are on their way tonight for service with the allied armies in Europe. They are gathering at this moment at an airport in Buffalo, N. Y., being flown in from all sections of the country, and from there they will go across the Canadian border and become the property of the British Government.

It is not a direct sale by the Navy Department to the Allies. The procedure is that these planes are being turned back by the Navy Department to the Curtiss Co., of Buffalo, and in return for them the Curtiss Co. will supply the Navy later on with more up-to-date planes. It seems the new ones will have puncture-proof gasoline tanks and armor protection.

The Navy Department says that the transaction is distinctly to the advantage of the Navy, and what the Curtiss Co. does with the planes after they are turned back in is the business of the Curtiss Co.—not the Navy Department.

As a matter of fact, the plan is, however, for the Curtiss Co. to sell these planes immediately to the British Government * * * and they'll be rushed across the Atlantic to the Allied armies.

This, of course, is the program that has been proposed for some days by Senator CLAUDE PEPPER, of Florida. His suggestion has been that the President be authorized to sell any part of the planes or guns or other fighting equipment of the Army and Navy to the Allies in return for the unfinished orders which are under construction in this country for the British and French.

For more than a week Senator PEPPER has been promoting that idea, and on two occasions his resolution has come up before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. The first time it was voted down, 21 to 1; the last time—day before yesterday—it was 19 to 2.

Even this afternoon there was a sharp fight in the Senate when Senator PEPPER made his fourth consecutive daily speech on the subject, but apparently the resolution was not necessary, because from these developments tonight the President seems to have decided to carry out the program anyway.

It begins to appear that the British and French Armies will be able to replace the fighting equipment they lost in Belgium out of the surplus supplies that we have on hand left over from the World War; that is to say, it appears that they can if the things we have are any good to them.

Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau said today that he is in favor of the idea. It really is a decision for the Secretary of War to make, but the reports late this afternoon are that the War Department is agreeable—in fact, the War Department is supposed to have given its official O. K.—and inasmuch as the law gives the administration the power to sell any surplus supplies there would seem to be nothing in the way.

The present indications are that the Allies may be interested in a couple of hundred of the so-called French 75's; also, in several thousand old-type machine guns, and possibly in about fifteen or twenty thousand rifles.

Now, there is one story in the news today that seems to call for some very frank and honest and candid telling of facts, so we might just as well plunge in.

This morning certain news dispatches stated that the American Ambassador in London, Mr. Joe Kennedy, and the American Ambassador in France, Mr. William C. Bullitt, have been sending urgent messages to the President and the State Department here, and those messages have been urging that American airplane factories hurry up with their construction of fighting planes for the British and French Governments.

The President's Secretary, Mr. Stephen T. Early, was asked specifically about that today. He said that he does not know about any particular call to the President, but he does know that Mr. Kennedy and Mr. Bullitt have been sending numerous messages of that kind to the officials here in Washington; and with that confirmation from the White House those stories have been given great emphasis in the news today. The general picture has been painted that the Allies are gravely in need of these ships that we are building for them; that our own factories are unduly slow in turning them out. There is a lot of talk about the "bottlenecks of the aircraft industry," and the general implication is that the aviation industry is falling down and failing to keep up to schedule, and the Allies are suffering as a result.

Just for your information, nothing could be further from the truth, and in all fairness to the American aviation industry, those stories seem to call for a few cold, hard facts. This may step on the toes of certain individuals, and I suppose they'll be very displeased about it, but they'll just have to be displeased, because I think you're entitled to know the facts.

To begin with, more than a year ago—after Munich—there was one manufacturer of large-sized aviation engines in the United States who had enough foresight to see what was coming in Europe, and he made an offer to the British Government to build in Canada a large engine plant, which would have been ready for production at the time the war started, but his offer was turned down—flatly and unequivocally.

DON'T WANT OUR BLASTED PLANES

Last November, the famous Lord Beaverbrook, who was in charge of all British airplane production, came to the United States (this was 2 months after the war was under way), and he met a group of American plane manufacturers, and he told them:

"Don't for 1 minute get the idea that we are planning to buy any of your blasted planes." That is the exact quote as it was given to me by two of the men in that group. They said that Lord Beaverbrook told them that the British planes were far superior to those that were being made in this country; so were the British engines. He said that England could, and would, produce all of the planes and engines that she could use.

As a matter of fact, at that stage of the game, the French purchasing commission, in the United States, was actually placing orders for fighting planes. A great many of those ships already have been completed and delivered, and before the war was 6 weeks old, the French had signed a contract with American engine producers to build additions onto the existing engine plants. They signed a contract on the 10th day of last October, with the Pratt & Whitney Co. in Hartford, Conn.—about which I'll tell you more a little later—to build an additional plant. That additional plant was built immediately, and today it is turning out 300 engines a month for the French Government, and has been for several weeks.

About the first of February, the British began negotiating with Pratt and Whitney, to build a further addition, so they could get more engines, but they wanted to get a little lower price on the engines. There was haggling about this detail and that detail—all of them minor—and it was not until 2 weeks ago that they ever got around to signing the contract. They lost 4½ months, in argument and discussion. It's only in the last few days that the ground has been broken for that new plant. It will be 8 months before the first engine can be turned out, which means about the first of next March. If they had signed the contract back in February, without that delay, they could have had the additional plant in production, in less than 3 months from today.

There are certain manufacturers of airplanes, who build the finest types of fighting planes for the Army and Navy, with whom the British have been dickering ever since last November. In that case, too, it's the same general story, a matter of minor details, a question of whether they could get the price down a little lower. It's just a matter of a few thousand dollars in each case, and in several of those cases the contracts are still not signed. The dickering is still going on, in some cases for as long as 7 or 8 months, in other cases 3 or 4 or 5 months.

The French are getting their planes—the ones for which they placed their orders. It's quite true, they would like to be able to get still more, but on the other half of the story there are the cold facts. One of the complaints by the British has been that they would prefer to buy these planes on credit, instead of paying cash, which the cash-and-carry law requires, and that's a bit of background to go along with these stories that the American aircraft industry is falling down in producing planes for the Allied armies.

Now, that brings us around to the report which I promised last night to give you this evening—about what I was able to find out yesterday on this matter of the airplane engine industry being a bottleneck of the aviation industry in general.

That point, you know, was brought out by President Roosevelt in connection with his program to build the airplane production capacity of the country up to 50,000 planes a year. You recall his explanation that airplanes can be turned out only as fast as we produce engines to power the planes, and so the spotlight of the national-defense program was turned immediately on the airplane engine industry, as the key to the entire question.

There's been so much conflicting information and misinformation about the actual status of the engine industry that it's been impossible to know just what the facts really are and that's the reason I went yesterday to Hartford, Conn., to try to get a first-hand picture for you as to just what the real story is.

The Pratt & Whitney Co. in Hartford is one of the only two engine companies in America that are turning out airplane engines of the size required for fighting planes; the other is the Curtiss-Wright Corporation. There is a third company—the Allison Corporation—which is a division of General Motors, but that one is just getting started. The two big ones are Pratt & Whitney and Curtiss-Wright, and it was Pratt & Whitney to which I went yesterday.

First of all, by way of giving you a general picture, that plant is now turning out about 800 engines a month, which may sound like a very small number. You may picture the plant as one little medium-sized building, with a group of men using hand tools.

Get that thought out of your head, right now. The actual buildings of that factory cover 30 acres of ground—that's the actual ground space—and the daily pay roll is 13,000 men. Thirty acres is a good sized farm in some parts of the United States.

Almost everything is done by machinery, but not machinery as you generally think of it. These are machines as big as a house. The same sort of machines that are used in the big automobile factories, multiple drills as large as a summer cottage, that drill 25 or 30 screw holes in a crankcase casting, all simultaneously and automatically; the assembly line, just in itself, covers acres of ground; there are testing plants, automatic grinding machines for making gears; the whole production is mechanized from beginning to end.

As I told you before, there is one large new addition to the factory, built for the French, which is now turning out 300 engines a month, all by itself, and they have broken ground on another addition which will be even larger.

There have been stories that it would take 2 years to get actual production out of any new plants that the engine manufacturers might build. They told me yesterday that that probably is true, in the case of manufacturers who are not making this type of engine already and who would have to start from scratch, but they point out that they were able to get the French plant into production in less than 8 months, and they say they can do the same thing on further additions.

As for the machine-tool industry being a bottleneck for them, that seems to be true in a rather peculiar way.

The Pratt & Whitney Co., for example, does not make all of its own parts for these motors. There are certain parts, certain peculiar gears, for example, that are made for them by various small machine-tool companies, all through New England, and on some of those items there does seem to be a bottleneck. These little companies only have a capacity of so much per month, but that is being cured to a large degree and as fast as possible, because those little companies are now expanding, to be ready for increased orders, and by the time this new addition for the British is ready they probably will be able to meet the demand.

There does seem to be one more possible bottleneck from the machine-tool industry.

And that is that if Pratt & Whitney, for example, want to double their present capacity, and in order to supply the engines for a production capacity of 50,000 planes a year for the United States, both they and Curtiss-Wright would have to just about double their plants. In order to do that, it means they'll have to get all of these various types of machines about which I told you just now, to equip the additional buildings, and that seems to be a possible rub.

These machines have to be made individually. Each one is a special design, and the machinery is highly complicated. So far they've been able to get whatever they needed, but for any tremendous program, there might be a delay. That's the reason the President, here in Washington, has been concentrating his attention on expanding the machine-tool industry in every possible way.

As for personnel to operate the expanded plants there seems to be no serious problem, there the system is to train additional men all the time alongside of the experienced workers who are now operating the machine. You see this work is not the sort of work that takes years of training. The machines are so automatic that they merely require attention; they do all of the measuring and precision work themselves, and so it's easily possible to train the men to run these machines in the time that it takes to build and equip any new plant.

So there's the story, and it does not seem to be quite so black as it has been painted in some of the past reports.

One last thought. The heads of this engine industry insist that all I've told you applies only to expansion of the industry at the places where the industry now exists. You know, the Army and Navy want any additional facilities to be located in the Middle West, away from the exposed positions of Connecticut and New Jersey.

These engine manufacturers say that will be far more difficult, it will take far more time, and it will be far more expensive. They say, furthermore, that the reason they can do as well as they can in New England is because there is a plentiful supply of manpower there, emotionally and traditionally suited for precision work. If they moved to the Middle West, they would have to take their labor along with them in all probability.

Well, that's the top of the news as it looks from here. Until tomorrow evening—good night!

Changing Horses in the Middle of the Stream

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 10, 1940

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, changing horses in the middle of the stream is a great deal better than not getting across. England and France, when the test came, found it necessary not only to change their civil leaders but their military leaders. But they did not do it quickly enough to avoid disaster. It is regrettable we cannot change horses before Roosevelt gets us into war.

In both France and England politicians, backed by unthinking masses of the people, did exactly what the New Deal has been trying to do here in America—work less and spend more, waste instead of save, insist upon "the more abundant life." Then, when war came, they found themselves unprepared, just as we here in America are unprepared. They waited too long, and the next few weeks may tell the story as to whether they will pass out of existence as nations. If they do, it will be because, desiring to spend and waste what they had, they laid by nothing, made no preparations to meet the war cloud which they could plainly see arising in Germany.

In Germany, men and women, boys and girls, worked toward one end—to prepare themselves for conquest.

We are not seeking conquest. We do not desire war. Nevertheless, for the last year or more, the President has been steadily driving in that direction. He now tells us that war is imminent.

Well, he has done all that one man could reasonably do to provoke war. He has done all that one man could do, by favoring the Communists and John L. Lewis and the C. I. O. and by permitting his wife to entertain the Communists in the White House, to encourage the "fifth column" to keep us from being prepared for war; to bring about a condition where, if war comes, a radical change will have to be made here in America, in the operation of our industries, to enable us to meet the emergency, to prepare not for aggressive war but to defend our Nation.

He should at once get rid of those in his administration who have been trying, as they say, "to remake America." Last week, his Attorney General, Jackson, resigned from the Guild. Another one of his advisers, Berle, Assistant Secretary of State, did the same thing. Long has the Guild been charged with being Communist-controlled; with having communistic ideas. These two high Government officials, with the approval of the President, clung to that organization to the last minute, until they could no longer remain in it and escape the charge that they were not patriotic; that they belonged to the "fifth column." Their repentance comes rather late. Some doubt its sincerity.

The extent of the President's sympathy for the "fifth columnists," the manner in which he has aided them, his failure to adequately prepare, is shown by an editorial from the June 6, 1940, issue of the Sturgis Daily Journal, of Sturgis, Mich., which, because of its soundness, I here reprint:

PREPAREDNESS "ON ORDER"

A strike of C. I. O. workmen engaged in the construction of two cruisers and four destroyers in a New Jersey shipyard is a timely warning of the kind of cooperation this country will have from John L. Lewis and his followers in its belated efforts to prepare itself against possible aggression from abroad. A month's delay in the completion of these ships might make the difference between victory and defeat in a life and death struggle with invaders. To the extent that such a stoppage of work is tolerated this Nation is taking grave chances.

In a far lesser emergency another President of the United States, Calvin Coolidge, told striking policemen of Boston that "there is no right to strike against the public safety by anybody, anywhere, at any time." His forthright courage resulted in his nomination for the Vice Presidency and eventually resulted in his elevation to the Presidency.

Is John L. Lewis to have the power to dictate the speed and the extent of our preparedness? If so, this Nation will find itself in far worse condition than France and England were in when Hitler started his "blitzkrieg" against them.

In a nation at war such a stoppage of work on essential equipment would be rated as treason. Workers would be given orders to return to their jobs or else. In France or England today, as well as in Germany, such an attempt to interrupt production of war materials would result in the perpetrators facing the firing squad. The right to strike is a luxury that no nation can afford when the invader is on its soil.

France realizes too late the price that it is likely to pay for its new deal. A short 3 years ago Leon Blum, head of a so-called "popular front" government, was telling the people that he had brought about a new social order. Workers were told to work less, produce less, and divide more. Production was disrupted by sit-down strikes and hours were drastically reduced. The rate of aircraft production fell off as much as 40 percent. What wouldn't France give today for the airplanes that those workers could have produced if saner counsel had prevailed?

Too late, the French people awoke to their danger. They didn't give Premier Blum and his "popular fronters" a second term, let alone a third one. The French new dealers taxed and taxed, spent and spent, and brought the country to the very edge of economic ruin. By the time Daladier took over it was almost too late. Hitler was on the march.

President Roosevelt revealed in a recent fireside chat that the United States owns a few modern planes and antiaircraft guns and has "on order" many more. Planes and guns "on order" in France and England are not having much effect in stopping Hitler. Planes in the air and guns in the hands of trained soldiers are the only defense against mechanized hordes of invaders.

Under the New Deal regime this country has spent $7,000,000,000 in 7 years on the Army and Navy and the President admits that our defense is still "on order."

Surely this country will have the gumption and the grit to demand the ablest leadership that it can get, and recognize now that its gravest danger is from within, rather than from foes beyond the Nation's borders.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot change horses until November. It is regrettable that we cannot. But we can prepare for November, and all those who love their homes and their country; who do not want to see their husbands, their sons, their brothers, their fathers, sent to make war on foreign soil should gird themselves for that battle.

Not only that, but everyone should start working at once to see that the New Deal gets an overwhelming defeat at that time; that those who would involve us in foreign war, that those who from within would remake America, are thrown out of public office.

Our "Fifth Column"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. PARNELL THOMAS

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 10, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. J. PARNELL THOMAS OF NEW JERSEY

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me over the Columbia Broadcasting System, New York City, June 9, 1940:

The war in Europe today is a conflict of ideologies. Nations embracing the freedom and liberty of individuals are pitted against the dictatorships of the proletariat. An amazing but most dangerous sequence to this struggle in Europe, however, is the world-wide movement on the part of many persons residing in all lands to forsake their loyalty to nationality when confronted with the choice between nationality and ideology.

These persons make up the "fifth column," and both Stalin and Hitler maintain "fifth columns" in every land. Wherever the troops of the German Fuehrer have invaded foreign territory they have found a Nazi "fifth column" ready for instant cooperation to insure the success of the invasion. Austrian Nazis, Czechoslovak Nazis, Polish Nazis, Danish Nazis, Norwegian Nazis, Dutch Nazis, and Belgian Nazis have long since formed themselves into "fifth columns"—waiting for the coming of their ideological master. Polish Communists and Finnish Communists worked together with Stalin for the defeat of their own governments.

Both Stalin and Hitler have "fifth columns" in the United States. Stalin's "fifth column" in the United States is much the older, the more experienced, and by far the larger of the two. Only with respect to their common treason to the Government and institutions of this country are they on a par. Both operate with complete devotion to their foreign dictators and without the faintest trace of loyalty to the United States. In my opinion, membership in both is enlistment for treason.

Whatever its outward appearance, the "fifth column" must of necessity be engaged in conspiracy.

In its report to Congress in January of this year, the Dies committee declared that "the Communist Party of the United States is a foreign conspiracy masked as a political party."

In describing the Communist Party as a conspiracy, we are not guessing. It is not even necessary for us to arrive at such a description on the basis of a great mass of cumulative evidence. The fact is that the Communist Party itself has in the past frankly admitted is conspiratorial character. We need only let the party speak for itself.

Some years ago when the Communist Party was much younger in this country, it published a volume entitled "Lenin on Organization." The book bears the imprint of the Daily Worker Publishing Co. It appeared as volume I of the Lenin library. It is important here to bear in mind that Communists consider the writings of Lenin as authoritative.

Let us, therefore, look at what Lenin had to say about the nature of an "organization of revolutionaries" or a Communist Party as it is set forth in his book published by the American Communists.

"Such an organization," wrote Lenin, "must of necessity be not too extensive and as conspiratorial as possible."

Naturally, a conspiracy must restrict its membership drastically. A conspiracy aims to enlist a small, highly disciplined, and trained minority of malcontents. In the parlance of the Communists, this small minority has commonly been described as "the vanguard of the proletariat."

Being a conspiracy, the Communist Party is of necessity committed to many forms of illegal acts. In another one of his books which has been reprinted by the Communists in the United States, Lenin wrote:

"Revolutionaries who are unable to combine illegal forms of struggle with every form of legal struggle are very poor revolutionaries."

The same doctrine of the use of illegal forms of struggle is contained in the "Program of the Communist International." Like the writings of Lenin, the "Program of the Communist International" is accepted by American Communists as an authoritative expression of the principles of the American Communist Party.

One of the methods employed by the Communist Party to gain adherents and influence has been to set up innocent-looking "fronts" which Earl Browder described as "transmission belts." Among these Communist Party "front organizations" which serve as units in Stalin's "fifth column" in the United States are the American Youth Congress, the National Negro Congress, the International Workers Order, the International Labor Defense, the American Student Union, the Workers Alliance, and the League of American Writers. I could add a hundred more if my time permitted. Millions of Americans have been drawn into the Communist Party's zone of influence through their membership and activity in these organizations. Browder himself has estimated that nearly 2,000,000 Americans "go all the way with the Communist Party in its full program."

Naturally, a major part of the program has been to keep us soft, to see to it that as a nation we are economically unsound and, above everything, unprepared to defend ourselves. In fact, the Communist Party through its front organizations has done much to weaken the defense of America. One has only to read the program of the American League Against War and Fascism, which in 1937 was superseded by the American League for Peace and Democracy (recently dissolved), the leading transmission belt for the Communist Party, to get concrete proof of the antidefense propaganda so widely disseminated by Communist-front organizations. I shall now read from the program of the American League Against War and Fascism: "Article I—To work toward the stopping of the manufacture of munitions. Article III—To demand the transfer of all war funds to relief." In other words, this organization advocates the stopping of the manufacture of arms not alone for shipment abroad but also the stopping of the manufacture of arms for our own use. Then it recommends that we transfer the funds set aside by Congress for the Navy and Army to the W. P. A. or to some other relief agency. Article VII of the same document reads "To win the armed forces to the support of this program."

This, my friends, is a sample of what Communist-front organizations in the United States advocate. In effect, in my opinion, it borders on treason, and as a result of this propaganda and the vacillating attitude of our Federal administration, we, as a Nation, find ourselves less prepared for defense than at any time in our history. Is it, therefore, any wonder that Eugene Vargo, prominent Soviet economist, should have said only a few days ago in an article in the bimonthly paper, "Bolshevists," that "victorious proletarian revolutions in many countries and in their colonial holdings are maturing"? Or is it surprising that American newspapers of the past week carried the caption "Italy Laughs at United States Army"?

But the most serious aspect of this whole question of the "fifth column" in the United States is the fact that our own administration at Washington has given these un-American "front organizations" such shocking encouragement. High Government officials from the White House down have lent the vast prestige of their names to subversive outfits. There is not a front organization among those which I have named which has not had the blessing of our Federal administration. Address of welcome after address of welcome has been given to "red" guided assemblies by leading new dealers.

Ever since I have been a member of the Dies committee, I have observed the reluctance on the part of the national administration to cooperate with the committee. I have also observed a reluctance on the part of many of our high Government officials to avail themselves of important information on un-American activities given to and correlated by the Dies committee. Further, various high Government officials, whose duty it is to enforce the laws, have woefully neglected their duties when the statutes relate to foreign agents, sabotage, conspiracy, or deportation. The coddling of Harry Bridges by the Secretary of Labor, and the quashing by the Attorney General of indictments handed down by the Federal grand jury at Detroit against 17 Communists and Communist sympathizers, are typical cases.

Thousands of Communists or Communist sympathizers have been appointed to Government positions; many Communists and Communist fellow travelers have been appointed to key positions in our Government at yearly salaries ranging from $4,000 to over $6,000. Only the other day a prominent Communist sympathizer, according to testimony given to the Dies committee, was appointed to a key position in the Office of Education. Communist meetings have been held on Government property and in Government buildings. In some instances only Communists, or those approved by Communists, could procure employment on certain Federal projects.

The "fifth column" in the United States has flourished under New Deal rule. It has literally fed at the same trough. In some respects it is synonomous to the New Deal, so the surest way to removing the "fifth column" from our shores is to remove the New Deal from the seat of government. We must do this if we hope to rebuild our Army and Navy to their proper level. And I think we will all agree that both need prompt attention. As a member of the Military Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives, and as a World War veteran, I frankly admit that we are woefully unprepared, probably more unprepared than we were prior to our entry into the World War.

And no one will deny the need to look to our own security in these troublesome times. But to be secure, we must not only prepare to defend ourselves from without, but we must also guard against enemies from within. We must drive the un-American groups into the open, incorporate and license them, fingerprint the membership, and deport the deportables.

The President of the United States should forthwith call upon department heads to immediately discharge every Communist or Nazi presently employed in our Government.

If we, as a people and as a government, will show this amount of backbone, we will be accomplishing immeasurable good for this great Nation. We will likewise be saying in unmistakable language to the whole world that regardless of your foreign ideologies, we intend to retain for ourselves the representative form of government, with its infinite possibilities and with its guaranty of liberty, of freedom, and of democracy. And in a renaissance of patriotism, with a show of power, and with a firm resolve to go forward again as a united but proud nation, we can be a beacon light of strength and good will in a world of despair.

Roosevelt Commits an Act of War and Should be Checked

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS D. THILL

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 10, 1940

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, the country was shocked by Roosevelt's recent action in ordering that some of our modern airplanes be transferred to certain belligerents in Europe. Where one nation intervenes on behalf of certain belligerents and supplies them with implements of war from its own stock of armaments, a situation arises wherein the aggrieved nation may consider such intervention an act of war. In his treatise on International Law, volume 2, section 96, page 104—Longmans, Green & Co., 1906—L. Oppenheim states the following:

INITIATIVE HOSTILE ACTS OF WAR

Hostile acts of force initiative of war are such hostile acts as are considered by the other party acts of war, since, as has been stated above (p. 55) hostile acts of force may be committed by a state against another without war breaking out thereby, the passive party acquiescing in the act. For a war to commence by unilateral hostile acts of force it is at least necessary that the passive party declares, expressis verbis, or through unmistakable conduct, that it considers these hostilities as acts of war. Of what kinds of acts these hostilities may consist it cannot be decisively laid down. They may, to give examples, consist of occupation of a part of foreign territory, an inroad into a foreign country, the blockade of a harbor, an attack on the frontier, an attack on a man-of-war, the capture of a merchantman, and the like. And it must be specifically observed that the respective acts of force need not at all be intended to be hostile, provided they are hostile de facto. Thus acts of force by way of reprisals or during a pacific blockade or an intervention may be considered acts of war by the passive party, and thereby contain the commencement of war, although they were not intended as acts of war.

That a war initiated by acts of force without a previous declaration or manifesto of war is nevertheless war according to international law, nobody denies. But many writers assert that the commencement itself of such a war contains a violation of international law. If this were correct, many important, and in their results far-reaching, wars of the seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth centuries would have been begun with a violation of international law. But the very fact of these numerous wars having been commenced through hostile acts of force only shows that the practice of the states never adopted the alleged rule of the necessity of a declaration or a manifesto of war. This does not mean that a state would be justified in opening hostilities without any preceding conflict. There is no greater violation of the law of nations than that committed by a state which commences hostilities in time of peace without previous controversy and without having tried to settle the difference through negotiation. But after negotiation has been tried in vain, a state does not act treacherously in case it resorts to hostilities without a declaration of war, especially after diplomatic intercourse has been broken off.

Certainly, under the thesis presented by L. Oppenheim, Germany might consider Roosevelt's intervention an act of war, and this might mean the commencement of war with the Nazi Government.

Congress has not given approval to such transfer of our military supplies. In fact, Roosevelt's action can be construed as a grave injustice to Congress and to the American people. The following editorial from the Milwaukee Journal asks that Roosevelt be checked:

ROOSEVELT SHOULD BE CHECKED

President Roosevelt told his press conference Friday that he was asking Congress for authority to dispose of some Government guns and ammunition for the benefit of the Allies in Europe. This is not only asking for additional authority to send guns, but for a vote of confidence in his policy of sending Government warplanes. That moves the United States into the position of an informal ally of Britain and France.

Congress faces a serious decision. Whether Mr. Roosevelt plans now to state this country's case and explain his policy has not been told at this writing. He may only ask for this increase of power. The gravity is there, whether he explains to the country or not.

Sending the Allies a few hundred Government guns and a few thousand Government rifles, declared "surplus," is no more decisive an act than making available to them airplanes declared "obsolete." In fact, the airplanes are likely to be of much more help, if they are to be sent in such numbers as suggested by Mr. Roosevelt's offhand remark that planes can get out of date "darned fast." To make the planes available he has used a permission intended to make possible an up-to-date air force by trading in older planes, but never intended to give a President authority to send Government armaments to belligerant powers.

This is where the question becomes one of making war. Every plane, every gun, and every shell that our private manufacturers can turn out can be sent to any country which buys them, without any breach of neutrality. It is when the Government begins to aid with its own supplies that the Nation has intervened and the strategem of turning planes back to the manufacturer to transfer the material does not deceive anyone. A plane can become out of date very soon but still travel many miles on many missions. Motorcars are out of date, too, but we don't trade in a car as "obsolete" until its successor is ready for delivery. So much for the detail. The canvas is broader than that.

Is America ready to intervene? That is what Congress has to decide. Is it ready to vote the President powers never before granted except in wartime, including the power to make war without declaring it?

Congress has to say whether the country is ready for this. Congress may feel itself in a spot. Its Members may feel they must either vote the President every power he asks or else weaken our Government in the face of other nations.

As a matter of fact, this consideration amounts to very little in any practical way. For the administration would not be weakened in the eyes of any government so as to affect its course toward us. Hitler and his associates are not going to attack us sooner or any later because of this decision, but if and when he thinks it is a good time to do it. Britain and France are not going to be any less friendly. They are in a perpetual state of peeve toward us, in peace as in war, because we do not put all our resources behind them, financial and physical. Finally, no government on earth does not know that in case of defense the President—any President—would be voted, overnight, everything the country has.

Is the United States ready to intervene? Is Congress ready to vote the President power which thereafter leaves to him the decision as to whether and when we will intervene?

We do not think the country is ready for this. The public has not been asked. The President has not taken it into his confidence about the significance of the steps he has taken and the extent he proposes to go. Are we in the war now or not? Is it President Roosevelt's belief, as it is the belief of many, that war at some time is inevitable and that our policy should now be to begin our defense by supporting war on European battlefields?

Congress, if it votes approval now, must realize that hereafter it is out of the picture—that it henceforth becomes only an appropriating body. It is not in our conscience to say that the people of the United States are ready for that stage of dictatorship.

Monday, June 10, 1940

LETTER FROM GOV. SAM H. JONES

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

STATE OF LOUISIANA
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Baton Rouge, June 5, 1940.

Hon. T. OVERTON BROOKS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I believe that you would be serving the interests of the people of Louisiana if you would use your efforts to see that the bill making appropriations for the United States Housing Authority is passed by the House of Representatives at this session.

There is great need for additional housing in Louisiana, and there will not be sufficient funds to carry out this program fully unless this act is passed.

Very truly yours,

SAM H. JONES,
Governor of Louisiana.

War Hysteria

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT F. JONES

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 10, 1940

LETTER FROM THE PRESIDENT OF BLUFFTON COLLEGE, BLUFFTON, OHIO

Mr. JONES of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

BLUFFTON COLLEGE,
Bluffton, Ohio, June 3, 1940.

Hon. ROBERT F. JONES,
Congressman Fourth Ohio District, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am very much concerned about the definite drift toward war which it seems to me is apparent in this country. If we enter the war we are in definite danger of losing many of those things which we would be trying to defend. As I see it we are in much greater danger of ultimate loss of our liberties if we do enter than if we stay out.

Further advances in help for the Allies, short of war, are almost sure to eventually draw us into the conflict. Let us refrain from moving another step in that direction.

One of our greatest present dangers is from war hysteria. You could scarcely make a greater contribution to this country than in doing your best to replace war hysteria with cool, critical thinking on the part of our people.

Sincerely yours,

LLOYD L. RAMSEYER, President.

The Task of This Generation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBEN W. BARKLEY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 11 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT AT CHARLOTTESVILLE, VA.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered yesterday by the President of the United States at Charlottesville, Va.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

President Newcomb, my friends of the University of Virginia, I notice by the program that I am asked to address the classes of 1940. I avail myself of that privilege but I also take this very apt occasion to speak to many other classes, classes that have graduated through all the years, classes that are still in the period of study, classes not alone of the schools of learning of the Nation but classes that have come up through the great schools of experience; in other words, a cross section, a cross section just as you who graduate today are a cross section of the Nation as a whole.

Every generation of young men and women in America has questions to ask the world. Most of the time they are the simple but nevertheless difficult questions, questions of work to do, opportunities to find, ambitions to satisfy.

But every now and again in the history of the Republic a different kind of question presents itself—a question that asks, not about the future of an individual or even of a generation, but about the future of the country, the future of the American people.

There was such a time at the beginning of our history—at the beginning of our history as a Nation. Young people asked themselves in those days what lay ahead, not for themselves, but for the new United States.

There was such a time again in the seemingly endless years of the War Between the States. Young men and young women on both sides of the line asked themselves, not what trades or professions they would enter, what lives they would make, but what was to become of the country they had known.

There is such a time again today. Again today the young men and the young women of America ask themselves with earnestness and with deep concern this same question: "What is to become of the country we know."

Now they ask it with even greater anxiety than before. They ask, not only what the future holds for this Republic, but what the future holds for all peoples and all nations that have been living under democratic forms of government, under the free institutions of a free people.

It is understandable to all of us, I think, that they should ask this question. They read the words of those who are telling them that the ideal of individual liberty, the ideal of free franchise, the ideal of peace through justice is a decadent ideal. They read the word and hear the boast of those who say that a belief in force—force directed by self-chosen leaders—is the new and vigorous system which will overrun the earth. They have seen the ascendancy of this philosophy of force in nation after nation where free institutions and individual liberties were once maintained.

It is natural and understandable that the younger generation should first ask itself what the extension of the philosophy of force to all the world would lead to ultimately. We see today, for example, in stark reality some of the consequences of what we call the machine age.

Where control of machines has been retained in the hands of mankind as a whole, untold benefits have accrued to mankind. For mankind was then the master and the machine was the servant.

But in this new system of force the mastery of the machine is not in the hands of mankind. It is in the control of infinitely small groups of individuals who rule without a single one of the democratic sanctions that we have known. The machine in hands of irresponsible conquerors becomes the master; mankind is not only the servant; it is the victim too. Such mastery abandons with deliberate contempt all of the moral values to which even this young country for more than 300 years has been accustomed and dedicated.

Surely the new philosophy proves from month to month that it could have no possible conception of the way of life or the way of thought of a nation whose origins go back to Jamestown and Plymouth Rock.

And conversely, neither those who spring from that ancient stock nor those who have come hither in later years can be indifferent to the destruction of freedom in their ancestral lands across the sea.

Perception of danger, danger to our institutions may come slowly or it may come with a rush and a shock as it has to the people of the United States in the past few months. This perception of danger, danger in a world-wide area—it has come to us clearly and overwhelmingly—we perceive the peril in a world-wide arena—an arena that may become so narrowed that only the Americas will retain the ancient faiths.

Some indeed still hold to the now somewhat obvious delusion that we of the United States can safely permit the United States to become a lone island, a lone island in a world dominated by the philosophy of force.

Such an island may be the dream of those who still talk and vote as isolationists. Such an island represents to me and to the overwhelming majority of Americans today a helpless nightmare, the helpless nightmare of a people without freedom; yes, the nightmare of a people lodged in prison, handcuffed, hungry, and fed through the bars from day to day by the contemptuous, unpitying masters of other continents.

It is natural also that we should ask ourselves how now we can prevent the building of that prison and the placing of ourselves in the midst of it.

Let us not hesitate—all of us—to proclaim certain truths. Overwhelmingly we, as a nation—and this applies to all the other American nations—are convinced that military and naval victory for the gods of force and hate would endanger the institutions of democracy in the western world, and that equally, therefore, the whole of our sympathies lies with those nations that are giving their lifeblood in combat against these forces.

The people and the Government of the United States have seen with the utmost regret and with grave disquiet the decision of the Italian Government to engage in the hostilities now raging in Europe.

More than 3 months ago the Chief of the Italian Government sent me word that because of the determination of Italy to limit, so far as might be possible, the spread of the European conflict, more than 200,000,000 people in the region of the Mediterranean had been enabled to escape the suffering and the devastation of war.

I informed the Chief of the Italian Government that this desire on the part of Italy to prevent the war from spreading met with full sympathy and response on the part of the Government and the people of the United States, and I expressed the earnest hope of this Government and of this people that this policy on the part of Italy might be continued. I made it clear that in the opinion of the Government of the United States any extension of hostilities in the region of the Mediterranean might result in a still greater enlargement of the scene of the conflict, the conflict in the Near East and in Africa, and that if this came to pass no one could foretell how much greater the theater of the war eventually might become.

Again on a subsequent occasion, not so long ago, recognizing that certain aspirations of Italy might form the basis of discussions between the powers most specifically concerned, I offered, in a message addressed to the Chief of the Italian Government, to send to the Governments of France and of Great Britain such specific indications of the desires of Italy to obtain readjustments with regard to her position as the Chief of the Italian Government might desire to transmit through me. While making it clear that the Government of the United States in such an event could not and would not assume responsibility for the nature of the proposals submitted nor for agreements which might thereafter be reached, I proposed that if Italy would refrain from entering the war I would be willing to ask assurances from the other powers concerned that they would faithfully execute any agreement so reached and that Italy's voice in any future peace conference would have the same authority as if Italy had actually taken part in the war, as a belligerent.

Unfortunately, to the regret of all of us and to the regret of humanity, the Chief of the Italian Government was unwilling to accept the procedure suggested and he has made no counterproposal.

This Government directed its efforts to doing what it could to work for the preservation of peace in the Mediterranean area, and it likewise exercised its willingness to endeavor to cooperate with the Government of Italy when the appropriate occasion arose for the creation of a more stable world order, through the reduction of armaments, and through the construction of a more liberal international economic system which would assure to all powers equality of opportunity in the world's markets and in the securing of raw materials on equal terms.

I have likewise, of course, felt it necessary in my communications to Signor Mussolini to express the concern of the Government of the United States because of the fact that any extension of the war in the region of the Mediterranean would inevitably result in great prejudice to the ways of life and government and to the trade and commerce of all of the American republics.

The Government of Italy has now chosen to preserve what it terms its "freedom of action" and to fulfill what it states are its promises to Germany. In so doing it has manifested disregard for the rights and security of other nations, disregard for the lives of the peoples of those nations which are directly threatened by this spread of the war, and has evidenced its unwillingness to find the means through pacific negotiations for the satisfaction of what it believes are its legitimate aspirations.

On this 10th day of June 1940 the hand that held the dagger has struck it into the back of its neighbor.

On this 10th day of June 1940, in this university, founded by the first great American teacher of democracy, we send forth our prayers and our hopes to those beyond the seas who are maintaining with magnificent valor their battle for freedom.

In our, in our unity—in our American unity—we will pursue two obvious and simultaneous courses; we will extend to the opponents of force the material resources of this Nation, and at the same time we will harness and speed up the use of these resources in order that we ourselves in the Americas may have equipment and training equal to the task of any emergency and every defense.

All roads leading to the accomplishment of these objectives must be kept clear of obstructions. We will not slow down or detour. Signs and signals call for speed—full speed ahead.

Yes; it is right that each new generation should ask questions. But in recent months the principal question has been somewhat simplified. Once more the future of the Nation, the future of the American people is at stake.

We need not and we will not in any way abandon our continuing effort to make democracy work within our borders. Yes; we still insist on the need for vast improvements in our own social and economic life.

But that, that is a component part of national defense itself.

The program unfolds swiftly, and into that program will fit the responsibility and the opportunity of every man and woman in the land to preserve his and her heritage in days of peril.

I call for effort, courage, sacrifice, devotion. Granting the love of freedom, all of these are possible.

And—and the love of freedom is still fierce, still steady in the Nation today.

Editorials on President's Address at Charlottesville

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 11 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE NEW YORK TIMES

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Editorials Praise Roosevelt's Speech," appearing in the New York Times of this date.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of June 11, 1940]

EDITORIALS PRAISE ROOSEVELT SPEECH—MANY DECLARE HE SAYS WHAT PEOPLE THINK IN PLEDGING AID TO STEM NAZI TIDE

Editorial comment on President Roosevelt's address, in general, pledged that the people of the country were ready to back him fully to assist the Allied forces.

Following are excerpts from editorials gathered by the New York Times and the Associated Press:

HOLDS OUR WORK IS TO GIVE AID

From the New York Herald Tribune:

"President Roosevelt has revealed how far his efforts went to open some other solution to Mussolini than that which he has taken and to which he has consigned the people of Italy. They were futile, and Italians are now committed to a course which, whatever the outcome in terms of power politics, is bound to be disastrous for them. But since this has happened, we cannot undo it. We can only accept it as deeper proof of the conviction that, as the President says, 'victory for the gods of force and hate would endanger the institutions of democracy in the western world,' and, in his eloquent and moving words, that the only 'isolation' open to us is the isolation 'of a people lodged in prison, handcuffed, hungry, and fed through the bars from day to day by the contemptuous, unpitying masters of other continents.' Mussolini has tied his people to the wheels of Hitler's tanks; we can only, for our part, lend every material aid in our power to those still fighting for freedom and prepare ourselves as well and as quickly as we may to meet the test of a struggle for which no compromise is possible."

ASSERTS "COUNTRY IS READY"

From the Chattanooga Times: "Mr. Roosevelt understated the case when he asserted 'the hand that holds the dagger has struck it into the back of its neighbor.' The program called for by President Roosevelt with 'full speed ahead' will have to include compulsory military training and a brake on excess profits accruing from the filling of Government orders. It remains to fill in the details of the Nation-wide program of universal service which is implicit in Mr. Roosevelt's address. The country is ready for such a program."

SAYS PEOPLE BACK PRESIDENT

From the Cleveland Plain Dealer: "Mussolini has brought home to the American people the danger that threatens all free people. The people, more than ever, will back the President in giving aid to those embattled nations which are carrying on our fights."

HOPES IT'S NOT TOO LATE

From the Buffalo Courier Express: "Mr. Roosevelt served notice to this effect: Mussolini has thrown his sword into one side of the scales. Now America throws into the other side certain things which may outbalance the weight of that sword.

"It is the fervent hope of the American people that the scale may be balanced before it is too late."

ASKS BLUEPRINT FOR ACTION

From the Louisville Courier-Journal: "Mr. Roosevelt was in a realistic mood. His words were precise; his meaning unmistakable. Today obviously is done with pretense.

"What we need is a blueprint for swift, decisive action. Once the pattern is fixed, Mr. Roosevelt will find America ready to preserve its heritage."

HOLDS MAJORITY SUPPORTS HIM

From the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette: "This [speech] may not be neutrality in a strict sense, but the fact is the overwhelming majority in this country supports the President's position fully."

DECLARATION'S TRUTH "OBVIOUS"

From the Washington Post: "The truth and justice of Mr. Roosevelt's declaration is so obvious that no voice is likely to be heard in contradiction. But the present unanimity of American opinion only emphasizes the tragedy of the period, prior to September, when the President time and again drew much the same conclusion and the country failed to recognize its importance."

HIS JUDGMENT IS APPLAUDED

From the Memphis Commercial Appeal: "The President's speech showed well-considered judgment. Indignation was there, of course, but it was mild compared to the expressions heard on every hand. What form the assistance he pledged will take is our greatest concern. If we read his speech aright, the determination is there to meet the problem realistically."

HIS ACTION CALLED POPULAR

From the Des Moines Register:

"The Register believes that President Roosevelt has decided it (the matter of aiding the Allies) in the way that the vast majority of Americans wanted it decided. We shall be lucky, mighty lucky, if even this prevents a disastrous Allied collapse in the near future."

SPEAKS FOR OUR DEMOCRACY

From the Waterbury Republican:

"His (Mr. Roosevelt's) unreserved and vehement pronouncement of American sympathy with the Allies against the totalitarian governments rings in tune with our own democracy's reaction to what is going on in Europe."

"WHAT THE NATION THINKS AND FEELS"

From the Minneapolis Morning Tribune:

"If Mr. Roosevelt spoke too bluntly, he will no doubt be disillusioned by Congress. But we suspect that his address did little more than give official utterance to what the Nation thinks and feels."

ASKS SACRIFICE OF REFORMS

From the Boston Herald:

"The President said 'We still insist on the need for vast improvement in our own social and economic life.' The 'effort, courage, sacrifice, devotion' for which he called will be more readily forthcoming, more enthusiastic, if he himself will have the courage to sacrifice some of the reforms which he initiated in a period of peace."

Chinch-Bug Control

REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT K. GOODWIN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 11, 1940

Mr. GOODWIN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I introduced House Joint Resolution 568, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the sum of $500,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to combat the imminent menace of chinch bugs to the corn crop in certain States, in accordance with the supplemental estimate of the President contained in House Document No. 736, Seventy-sixth Congress, third session.

The sum asked for in this resolution is included in the Agricultural Department supplemental appropriation—

For the control of incipient and emergency outbreaks of insects * * *

In other words, chinch bugs.

A new generation of chinch bugs is now hatching. In 2 weeks they will be migrating to rich, succulent cornfields. The destruction they will cause must be viewed from an economic, social, and national-defense angle. If not checked, such a plague will bring hard times to our farmers, railroads, elevators, and businessmen.

Money many times in excess of the amount asked for in this appropriation will be necessary for the relief of these people if the pests are not destroyed now. We cannot wait for the money from the agricultural appropriation bill. To be of any benefit, we must have it now.

Mr. Speaker, this chinch-bug plague which now faces our middle-western farmers has been in the making for a long time. Its history reaches back into the late dry autumn of 1939 in a territory that embraces parts of five States—the section of our country commonly called the heart of America. Weather and crop conditions have been very favorable for chinch-bug life. The adult insects weathered the winter nicely, hibernating in the small-grain stubble and corn stover that was left in the fields. So you see the adult bugs were already present in great numbers and in good health early this spring.

Early this spring State entomologists of Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma, and Missouri reported that the bugs were present in major numbers—numbers so large that spring hatchings threatened a population of plague proportions. Entomologists of these States recognized the potential seriousness of the situation and met in a conference at St. Joseph, Mo., on April 10. This meeting was reported to me by the Honorable Mark G. Thornburg, Secretary of Agriculture of the State of Iowa. Mr. Thornburg told me that potentially the Middle West was faced with the most serious insect problem in its history. Many of us were genuinely alarmed at Mr. Thornburg's report and on May 7 I wrote Mr. Dante M. Pierce, publisher of the Wallaces Farmer in Des Moines, asking him to give me a first-hand report on the situation as he and his private investigators found it. I quote from the report of the well-known authority, Mr. C. V. Gregory, who is an official of that paper:

Regarding Mr. Goodwin's letter to you of May 7, he has been correctly informed about the chinch-bug situation. Potentially it is probably worse in Iowa this year than it has ever been. I am attaching herewith a map showing the infested parts of the State. There is nothing that can be done in a practical way to combat the chinch bugs in small grain. After the small grain is harvested, however, they move like an army on the march from the small grain fields into adjoining corn fields where the greatest damage is done. At the time they start to move into the corn fields they can be combated rather effectively by heading them off with a line of creosote which must be renewed daily for several days.

For a number of years the United States Department of Agriculture has been furnishing creosote without charge for distribution through the county agents. My understanding is that this year the appropriation for pest control is inadequate and that the policy of the Department is going to be to spend as long as it lasts and that will be the end of it. The probability is that the demand for grasshopper poison in the West will use up these funds before we need them to combat chinch bugs here in Iowa, which will mean that farmers will have to depend on their own resources to do the job unless the Department should see fit to change its policy and earmark a certain portion of its pest-control money for combating chinch bugs. There is another possibility, and that is that weather conditions may do a pretty good job of controlling the pests. For 2 or 3 weeks after the bugs hatch out in the spring they are delicate and tender, and during that period are killed rapidly by damp, cold weather such as we have been having so far this spring. The bugs are now hatching in the southern part of the State, and a continuation of cold, wet weather through May would probably reduce their numbers sufficiently so that damage would be relatively slight.

More recently the well-known Iowa secretary of agriculture, the Honorable Mark G. Thornburg, writes:

In regard to the chinch-bug situation, I wired you as to the extent of the infestation, as reported to us by the field men from the extension department at Ames. I have a letter from the county agent at Leon, which is in the southern part of the State, in which he states that some of the farmers are plowing up their small grain because of damage done, and in a few weeks the chinch bugs will be in the corn. The farmers are plowing up a few rows around their fields and are putting them in soybeans to protect the rest of the corn. As you know, the adults are laying eggs at this time, and the eggs will not hatch for 3 or 4 weeks; it is the second brood that will do the damage to our corn.

For your information, I learned last night from our State entomologist that chinch bugs are bad on Henry Wallace's farm, and that the entomologists advised them to plow their wheat under, which they are going to do next week, hoping to kill some of the bugs. Their barley, they think, will make a fair crop. This is being done to keep the bugs out of their hybrid corn.

I also have your letter in which you mention the recommendations of Mr. Hoyt, Chief of the Bureau of Entomology. I have taken this up with our entomologist, Dr. Carl J. Drake, who, I think, is very practical and who has had a lot of experience in field work, and he doesn't agree entirely with Mr. Hoyt on plowing up the infested area. He hesitates to put out information urging the plowing under of the corn at this late stage. However, we are very glad to get the information.

As you know, we already have stations for the distribution of creosote, but if conditions continue as they are, the little amount that we have in Iowa will soon be expended. If the Federal Department is going to help at all, it should be done immediately. An exact count of the infestation at Johnston Station, near the Secretary's farm, might help, and I will have a count made just as soon as I can get hold of the inspector. I understand there are three Federal men working in Iowa under the Extension department at Ames, and they, no doubt, are reporting direct to the Department at Washington.

Up to the present time nothing has been done to control this chinch-bug plague except to put a few trained entomologists in the field to observe the progress of the insects. A new generation of chinch bugs will be hatched within the next 2 weeks. They will then start to migrate into the rich, succulent cornfields which lie nearby. Unless this vast insect army is stopped, as it starts its march, hard times are sure to come to our farmers, our business people, our railroads, and our elevators. There will be no corn to sell; no corn to feed to our hogs or our cattle; no hogs or cattle to be shipped by truck or rail to markets; no grain to be shipped to our markets or handled by our elevators. The farmers will ultimately lack purchasing power with which to patronize the business people of their communities. That will be the result of the destruction of our staple crops. At this point let me say that money, many times in excess of the amount asked for in this appropriation, will be necessary for the relief of these people in the months to come.

It is a fundamental military rule that an army fights on its stomach. Well-filled larders of grain and meat are fundamental to our national defense. The destruction of a large part of 1940's cereal crop is a serious threat not only to our national economy but to our military preparedness. We are faced with an insect "fifth column" of terrifying proportions. Now is the time to prepare for this invasion. To wait on the general agricultural deficiency bill will be too late. We need this money now. To procrastinate or to "pull a Chamberlain" is to invite an economic catastrophe.

Gentlemen, I urge you to pass this resolution promptly, while there is yet time to save our crops.

America's Cliveden Set and the "Fifth Column"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 11, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. EMANUEL CELLER, OF NEW YORK

Mr. CELLAR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a radio address entitled "America's Cliveden Set and the 'Fifth Column,'" which I delivered Saturday evening, June 8, 1940, over Station WJZ, New York City:

At this juncture the primary threat to our national security is not a mere matter of guns, bayonets, and tanks. There are new methods of attack just as effective. There is the "Trojan horse"; there is the "fifth column." Both seek to betray the Nation, guileless and unprepared for treachery. Traitors, saboteurs, espionage agents, and spies are the provocateurs and the manipulators of the new strategy. They must be vigorously dealt with. They must be stamped out at the very threshold of their operations. Their poison spreads quickly. That contagion can so weaken a nation as to make military and naval weapons of a defending nation useless and the courage and fearlessness of its soldiery of no avail. Stark tragedy prevails in Norway and the Low Countries because of the diabolical cunning and treachery of the "fifth column."

It shall not happen here.

Couriously enough, the words "fifth column" were originated by the Spanish general, Quiepo d'Llano, in 1936 during the siege of Madrid. He was in charge of Franco's broadcasting. Four columns were marching under Gen. Emilio Mola against Madrid. General d'Llano reported the advance of General Mola, but added that the city would be taken by a "fifth column," meaning that at the appropriate moment insurgent Spanish sympathizers and spies in Madrid would help to overwhelm the city's defenders. Their main job was to sabotage and destroy all possible public services, like the electric-power houses, the telephone exchanges, the plants of the water companies, the sewage systems, and the airports. All media of communication were to be the objective of such sabotage, with the result that Madrid was completely disorganized from within, and its capture was made comparatively easy.

I say without peradventure of a doubt that this country is loaded with Nazi spies at this very moment. Companies of them are meeting in secret in New York City, on Long Island, in Detroit, in Chicago, in Philadelphia, in San Francisco, in New Orleans. I would like to disclose certain information in my possession indicating some of the activities of these vile creatures, but I dare not for fear that the disclosure of their nefarious practices would forestall their apprehension. I will tell the complete story in the not far distant future. Already the authorities have seized and questioned many of these saboteurs. The information unfolded would make your hair stand on end. Every instrumentality known to chemical science and all the tricks of the photographic arts, and the most ingenious inventions are at the command of these vipers in our very bosom. The Trojan horse approaches the ancient city of Troy and we stand well night like Laocoon, with huge snarling snakes entwined around our limbs seeking to destroy us. What are we going to do about it?

This so-called "fifth column," as pointed out by President Roosevelt and the Department of Justice, I repeat, is not made up of spies alone. There are the propagandists, the Bundists, the Nazi Turnvereinists, the Communists, and others under the direction of Moscow or Berlin. The aim of these groups, the President asserts, "is to create confusion of counsel, public indecision, political paralysis, and eventually a state of panic." We cannot remain indifferent. Indifference is dangerous. Indifference is fatal. One of the strongest weapons I know of with which to fight this invisible foe is the right to tap wires, which is now banned. In the interests of national defense, and particularly to destroy as quickly and as expeditiously as possible the network of Nazi and Communist spies that extends from Canada to Mexico, and from New York to San Francisco, I have offered House Joint Resolution 553, which reads as follows:

"Joint resolution to authorize the Federal Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice to conduct investigations in the interests of national defense, and for that purpose to permit wire tapping

"Resolved, etc., That the Federal Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice be authorized and directed to conduct investigations, subject to the direction of the Attorney General, to ascertain, prevent, and frustrate any interference or attempts or plans to interfere with the national defense by sabotage, espionage, violations of neutrality laws, or in any other manner.

"SEC. 2. The provisions of section 605 of the act June 19, 1934 (48 Stat. 1103), shall not apply to investigations authorized by the provisions of this joint resolution."

In a word, this resolution seeks to abrogate the former statute which prohibits wire tapping. It gives the right to the Federal Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice to conduct investigations, all subject to the direction of the Attorney General, to ascertain and frustrate any interference with our national defense by espionage and sabotage. The greatest weapon the F. B. I. can have to track down and punish spies, saboteurs, Trojan horses, and "fifth columnists" is the privilege to tap wires and to intercept all wired or wireless types of communications and messages.

I would be most loath to allow wires or short-wave messages to be tapped in times of normalcy or peace. But we are now in times of national emergency, and the restrictions now obtaining may have to be suspended. Just as in a period of war, the writ of habeas corpus may be abridged and certain inalienable rights temporarily suspended, so in times of danger and peril—although short of war—inroads must necessarily be made upon those rights if our democracy is to be preserved. We cannot minimize the danger of the thousands of Moseleys, Fritz Kuhns, Pelleys, Browders, and other Nazi and Communist sympathizers and spies in our midst. There should not be the slightest possibility of a Trojan horse. We should not be deceived as were the inhabitants of the old city of Troy. We must "beware the Greeks bearing gifts." If we are to deal adequately with these traitors who would stab us in the back, we cannot shoot powder puffs at them. We need heavy weapons to ferret out their dens of iniquity. We can only do that successfully by wire tapping. There may be abuses of the privilege of wire tapping, but that is part of the price we must pay for our national security and safety.

Under my bill all wire tapping must be under the authority and direction of the Attorney General. I have great confidence in Attorney General Robert H. Jackson. I have discussed this measure with Department of Justice officials, and they have agreed that if this bill becomes operative every separate wire-tapping operation would have to be authorized by the Attorney General personally in writing. Under the wise and humane guidance of Attorney General Jackson there will be no recrudescence of the evils of the so-called Palmer raids of the World War period. There will be no "blitzkrieg" on labor under the guise of a holy antialien crusade as was the case under former Attorney General Palmer.

Attorney General Jackson has approved the purposes of my resolution, and under date of May 31, 1940, he wrote me, as follows:

MAY 31, 1940.

Hon. EMANUEL CELLER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: This acknowledges your letter of May 27, requesting my views concerning the desirability of House Joint Resolution 553, which proposes to extend the authority of the Federal Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice to conduct investigations in the interests of national defense.

In compliance with your request, I have carefully examined the proposed legislation.

Section 1 of the joint resolution, proposes to authorize and direct the Federal Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice to conduct investigations, subject to the direction of the Attorney General, to ascertain, prevent, and frustrate any interferences or attempts or plans to interfere with the national defense by sabotage, espionage, violations of the neutrality laws, or in any other manner.

The objective desired to be attained by the legislation is clearly commendable.

Section 2 of the joint resolution would exempt the investigations authorized by section 1 from the provisions of the Communications Act, which were recently construed by the Supreme Court as banning the introduction in evidence in the Federal courts of information obtained by tapping telephone wires.

In a statement made by me to the press on March 15, 1940, the following observations are found on this general subject:

"In a limited class of cases, such as kidnaping, extortion, and racketeering, where the telephone is the usual means of conveying threats and information, it is the opinion of the present Attorney General, as it was of Attorney General Mitchell, that wire tapping should be authorized under some appropriate safeguard. Under the existing state of the law and decisions, this cannot be done unless Congress sees fit to modify the existing statutes."

The philosophy underlying the foregoing remarks, which were directed to the activities of the underworld, would seem applicable with even greater force to the activities of persons engaged in espionage, sabotage, and other activities interfering with the national defense.

With kind personal regards.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT H. JACKSON,
Attorney General.

There have been extravagant and unfounded charges made against J. Edgar Hoover, in charge of the F. B. I. It is charged that he was actively engaged in these so-called Palmer raids. This is utterly false. The late William J. Flynn was the man in charge. At that time Hoover was a special assistant attorney general, and he handled the prosecution of many cases. He had nothing to do with the arrest or so-called persecution of individuals. He simply handled the cases in the courts as they were presented to him. This was back in 1919. Mr. Hoover had nothing to do with wire tapping. This was wholly in charge of the said William J. Flynn. Incidentally, Hoover was appointed to his present position by Harlan F. Stone, now Justice of the United States Supreme Court, and who was at that time the Attorney General. Justice Stone is an outstanding liberal. He appointed Hoover to his present position as head of the F. B. I. only after a most careful investigation. If Hoover had been involved in any of these so-called Palmer raids or persecutions, certainly Justice Stone would not have appointed him.

Some have suggested that there be no wire tapping unless authority therefor be based on an ex parte order of a Federal district or circuit judge. I have considered this suggestion carefully. It would not be workable. In many States there is but one Federal judge. This is the case in Maine, New Hampshire, Delaware, Vermont, Utah, Wyoming, Idaho, and Kansas. It might be extremely difficult to obtain the signature of a judge in those States. Time would be of the essence. Action must be speedy to be effective. A judge might be ill or on vacation. Secrecy is also essential. There are eavesdroppers even in courthouses. There is an old saying: "Three men can keep a secret if two men die." Furthermore, it might be necessary in large States, like Montana, to journey 500 miles to the home of a Federal judge. In the interim the purposes of the investigation would be nullified.

The cruel experiences of the Norwegian and Low Countries resulting from the infiltration of the "fifth column" must give us pause. While there is no ground for hysteria and panic, nevertheless we must take stock and reflect on the possibilities of similar activities in this country. That espionage and sabotage can be practiced here by foreign agents with serious and detrimental effects on our national defense is apparent. Our experiences in the World War show us that "it did happen here." Many of us have vivid recollections of the tremendous Black Tom explosion during the World War which was later formally adjudicated by an international tribunal to have been brought about by German agents. Black Toms would be multiplied a thousandfold in another World War involvement. Many of us remember also the destruction by German spies of the international bridge between the United States and the Canadian borders over the St. Lawrence River. Our harbor defenses, airports, airplane factories, munition plants, military posts, navy yards, drydocks, waterways, power plants, telephone and telegraph exchanges, all these would easily be subject to the perfidious activities and depredations on the part of Nazis, and/or Fiscist spies and saboteurs. Some very disquieting testimony has been produced on the subject before the Dies committee. For example, refugees from the Netherlands, from Queen Wilhelmina down, have told amazing stories as to how thousands of apparently innocent Germans turned out to be advance agents of the Nazi Army. Nazi parachutists landed with lists of addresses of Nazi sympathizers and Nazi opponents in their pockets. There are just as many, if not more, Nazi traitors in this country who would destroy America even as their colleagues in Holland destroyed that peaceful country. To the surprise of the Dutch Army officers, it was discovered that the records of the Dutch Army and Navy uniforms had been stolen by Nazi spies. Thousands of Nazi parachutists, after landing, paraded through Holland in Dutch uniforms. Nazi domestics in Norwegian homes kept diaries and intimate records of conversations of their mistresses and masters, particularly when the latter uttered anti-Nazi sentiments. Often these records were complete with photographs stolen by these Nazi spy domestics from the albums in the homes in which they served. A high official of the State Department unfolded to me an amazing tale concerning parachutists who landed in Belgium. It would appear that Brussels, and other cities in Belgium, contained huge billboards and fences on which appeared poster advertisements of a so-called German coffee. At a certain designated place in these huge poster advertisements was a designated mark which could be torn. The tearing would dislodge a portion of the poster on the reverse side of which there was contained a list of names and addresses of Nazi sympathizers, locations of airplane factories, telephone exchanges, electric light and power houses, and other strategic places, all of which were marked for destruction by these Nazi sympathizers and spies and the parachutists.

It shall not happen here!

The best method of prevention is the right to tap wires and intercept private short-wave messages.

I cannot with any too great a degree of emphasis indicate to you the effectiveness of wire tapping. After the dreadful Lindbergh kidnaping in 1932 there literally followed a wave of abductions of children, accompanied by extortion. This plethora of kidnaping cases lasted from 1933 to 1935. But it was only because of the right to tap wires that all but one of these nefarious cases were solved and the culprits punished. The detection of espionage, like kidnaping in the old days, is impossible without the right of wire tapping. Be it remembered also that I have received the promise of the Department of Justice that the wire tapping will be used only for the purpose of leads. The actual recital of the conversation will not be used as evidence. It would be used primarily as a basis of application for a search warrant.

Every other country permits wire tapping. Frankly, to break down the vast Nazi espionage operations, particularly east of the Mississippi, involving women and even children, wire tapping is essential. Many of the State and Federal officials, including heads of departments, are innocent dupes of Nazi spies—including some designing females. Again in due time I will unfold an amazing story in this regard.

Wire tapping is indeed necessary to our national defense. It will aid the ferreting out of spies who have made their way into our arsenals, airplane factories, and munition plants. No honest individual can be hurt by such investigation. On the other hand, such investigation will do much toward tightening up our national defense and frustrating any plans to bore from within. The old saying, "A stitch in time saves nine," is applicable in this connection.

Incidentally, it will be necessary to increase the number of operatives employed by the F. B. I. At the present time there are only 927 of them. Of this number, only 150 are assigned to national defense. On July 1, 100 more operatives will be added for the purposes of national defense. And there is a bill now pending to increase by 500 the number of F. B. I. men who would be used exclusively for purposes of national defense. If this latter bill passes, there will be 750 F. B. I. men for national defense. This is outlandishly small for a country with a population of approximately 130,000,000. This is outlandishly small when we contemplate that the New York City detective force alone has over 2,000 members. Moreover, the F. B. I. receives regularly over 2,500 complaints daily concerning sabotage activities and "enemies within our gates." I would be willing to increase the F. B. I. to a force of at least 2,500. I wager there are over 50,000 suspects in this country—Nazis, Communists, and Fascists—who might well be the subject of investigation.

The President of the United States, with remarkable foresight, took steps last June to coordinate all investigative activity pertaining to espionage, counterespionage, and sabotage, by placing it under the control of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Military Intelligence Division of the War Department and the Naval Intelligence Division of the Navy Department.

In the interests of efficiency and national security, the President instructed that the F. B. I. was to act as a clearing house for complaints pertaining to national-defense matters and to handle them as they arise. At that time, I am confident, he foresaw the dreaded menace of the "fifth column" and Trojan horse, and took these progressive steps to fortify the internal security of the Nation.

When war broke out across the seas last September, the President on September 6, in a public statement, called upon all law-enforcement agencies to promptly turn over to the nearest representative of the F. B. I. any information in their possession "relating to espionage, counterespionage, sabotage, subversive activities, and violations of the neutrality laws." I here and now express my appreciation of the fine foresight of the President, and the splendid work of the F. B. I.

At all costs the internal security of the Nation must remain inviolate. This necessitates that every possible instrumentality of protection be placed in the hands of the skilled, trained investigators of the F. B. I., in order that they might more effectively carry on their duties. Equipment, manpower, and the learning of science must be marshaled on the common front of national defense.

No barriers must be placed before the F. B. I., because its job is difficult enough as it is. Every possible facility, such as wire tapping, should be utilized in combating the foreign foes within our midst who are engaged in espionage and sabotage. The G-men were deprived of a powerful weapon in their combat against spies and saboteurs when wire tapping was banned. Today, the situation is such that they should have permission to utilize the investigative technique of wire tapping. My bill provides just this. The present state of the Nation and the future maintenance of our internal security demand that the F. B. I. not be handicapped any longer by being unable to use this effective instrument of detection in its splendid work. For that reason, my bill authorizing the use of wire tapping should be promptly passed.

Cliveden is the name of the country estate of Lady Astor, situated in the Thames Valley. It was the headquarters of the so-called Cliveden set, which, up to a short time ago, sought to effect an entente cordiale with the Nazis under Hitler. Its members deceived themselves into the belief and hope that Hitler would be the bulwark against the rising tide of Bolshevism. It has been charged that this so-called social set which met at Cliveden influenced appointments in the British Government, including the British Cabinet. Undoubtedly, too, this Cliveden set had a strong effect on the foreign policy of Great Britain. And under Chamberlain, they gave it a pro-German slant. They sent Lord Halifax to Germany, who was then an avowed pro-German. They thwarted the efforts of Anthony Eden, who sought to prepare England against the rising Nazi tide. They aided in developing the closest relations between General Goering and the British Ambassador, Sir Neville Henderson. Untold wealth was and is at the command of the Cliveden set. The Viscount and Viscountess Astor own the Sunday newspaper Observer. The brother-in-law of Lady Astor, John Jacob Astor, owns the controlling interest in the London Times. These two papers sought to lull the British into a false sense of security. They endeavored to make the British actively dislike some of the French officials. Even Roosevelt's rise to bower was greeted with derision.

Viscountess Astor has denied that there was even such a thing as a Cliveden Set. She said it was all mischievous rubbish and slander started by the Communists. She cannot so easily disavow her responsibility. Even though all the charges against her are not true, some of them are true and damaging. Like Lady Macbeth, Lady Astor says "Out damned spot," but some of the stains remain.

In an article in the Saturday Evening Post of March 24, 1939, she says: "If we don't get appeasement, we will get war." She and England apparently are getting both. She said further: "Munich was neither a deliberate betrayal of democracy nor a pusillanimous sell-out to a bluffer." I say, subsequent events have proven it to be both. It would have been better indeed if Lady Astor and her Cliveden Set had kept their noses out of British politics.

There are many Cliveden sympathizers in our midst. They work under cover. They are all the more dangerous and their treachery is all the more insidious. There are Nazi Cliveden Sets in Yorkville, in the Borough of Manhattan, and in Ridgewood, in the Borough of Queens in New York City, and in Hoboken, N. J., and in Detroit, and in scores of other places. These traitors don't use the mails. They are too slick for that. Also, the mails are too slow, and fingerprints are left on the envelopes. These Cliveden and espionage agents come together from great distances. They use short-wave radio and telegraphic means of communication. All our efforts to smoke them out will be in vain, unless we can avail ourselves of the right to tap wires and intercept messages.

I and my colleagues in the House are anxious to get your reaction to my bill. Do you want F. B. I. agents to have the right to tap wires in the interests of national defense? Let me have your views with all possible dispatch. Address me in care of the station to which you are listening, or to my office in Washington, D. C.

"The Party of the Fifth Column," Part 2

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 11, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, in the Washington Daily News, June 10, appears an item entitled "Declare War at Once," and to which were appended the names of about 30 educators, lawyers, industrialists, and economists. Mr. Speaker, it was people of this kind who ran the Wilson administration and who are now running the New Deal and the Government of the United States. Their ability is clearly evident in a national debt that will be over $50,000,000,000 at the end of this month. And their Americanism is evident in that most of them are members of the "fifth column" that has given its blessings to the actual saboteurs and destroyers of our Nation's industries and our Government.

I grant that in this motley crew there are a few who, through ignorance, join hands and become pawns of these international wreckers, but, as we often hear, ignorance of the law is no excuse. However, the gentlemen who said, "Declare war at once," should now, in order to conform to their own advice, leave the United States on the first boat and defend their alien principles. There is nothing to tie them here, and the American people recognize the actual promoters and financiers of the World War, and therefore object to sacrificing any of their sons to fighting for the same motley money changers and munitions makers.

I am astonished at the ignorance shown by the majority in Congress which has in the past 4 years gone along with the head of the "fifth column" and the New Deal party. The action of the majority in Congress and particularly in the Senate is a farce which I shall credit to lack of actual knowledge of national and international conditions.

"Fifth column" activities are as old as international intrigue, and while I am not interested in the court procedures of the past, still, it is well to bear in mind that "What is past is prologue." Deception, intrigue, and murder to maintain power may be found in the history of Egypt and in the history of Rome, where poisoning was a royal art. Today, similar distorted mentalities deceive and poison the human mind in the press, over the radio, and in the portrayal of pictures that are a living lie and deception in themselves.

However, let us as I said forget the past, for, after all, our interest lies here in our own homes in America, now and in the future. Gold has been a lodestone of vice and a corruptive power in the hands of those who now own and control this valuable property. It began in the early history of this Nation, and in order that you may be served with opinions beside my own, let me quote from Save America First, a pamphlet:

AN ENGLISHMAN BECOMES OUR FIRST SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

Soon after making his gift, Robert Morris suggested to General Washington that he appoint a young man named Alexander Hamilton as aide-de-camp, saying that as young Hamilton was an expert financier he could render invaluable services in handling the finances of the Army. Hamilton, who had been born a British subject and trained in British banking and business methods, soon won the confidence of General Washington, and when 11 years later the general had become the President he installed young Hamilton as our first Secretary of the Treasury. It was rumored that the appointment was made on the advice of Robert Morris and Haym Salomon, but be that as it may, it is beyond question that Hamilton was better fitted for the office than any other man then available, as his later record revealed.

During his year as Secretary of the Treasury, Hamilton placed the national credit on a sound financial basis, following as far as possible, the plans and principles long since adopted by the Treasury Department of the English Government. But as later events revealed, Hamilton accomplished something of even greater importance during his year as Secretary of the Treasury—he formed substantial contacts and friendships with leading Members of Congress, who were later to repay his favors in a most substantial manner. After a year in office and without a word of warning to President Washington, Hamilton resigned, announcing his intention to devote his energies to private business. Since Hamilton had planned the Treasury Department and was the only man in America who understood its intricacies, his sudden resignation precipitated and spread throughout the Nation a loss of confidence in the Government's financial security. Immediately Government finances became involved and Government credit impaired, and when leading bankers and businessmen announced their loss of confidence, now that Hamilton was no longer in control, a wave of fear and uncertainty engulfed the Nation. Beyond question, this is exactly what Hamilton and his friends had planned and expected—to precipitate a break-down of the Nation's financial structure, as the first step of a conspiracy to gain control of the Nation's banking.

About 1 year after his resignation, and with conditions growing from bad to worse, Hamilton petitioned Congress for a charter for a national bank, urging that by no other means could national confidence be restored and the Nation's financial structure preserved. When first made the request was refused, but later as conditions grew worse, and his friends in Congress had done their work, the petition was granted, and Hamilton was given a charter for "The Bank of the United States," the said charter to expire in 20 years. Concerning the internal organization of the new bank, the following may prove interesting: In form and power, it was a duplicate of the Bank of England. Much of its stock was bought by English bankers. The gold which sustained its credit had been brought from England. In brief, the original "Bank of the United States" was little other than a branch of the Bank of England, as Hamilton had planned it should be, from the day he took office as Secretary of the Treasury. Patterned after the Bank of England, financed with English gold, and with much of its stock owned in England, the bank began its operations, and how did it operate?

It operated as surgeons usually operate, by "cuttitng out" something; and in a few years, the bank had "cut out" the happiness and security of most of the Americans in America. And this is how the bank operated:

It restricted its loans, (1) to Englishmen who had lately arrived to get in on the "ground floor" and who at once bought a controlling interest in existing companies, and when this was not possible, started similar companies in competition; (2) made loans to those merchants who would make their foreign purchases in England; (3) made loans to those American Tories of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, who had opposed our War for Independence * * *. In brief, this "Bank of the United States," restricted its loans, as far as possible, to those English, and pro-English Americans, who could be counted on to aid in placing the American people under the financial tyranny of Mother England.

As the inevitable result of this concentration of money and control of credit, it was but a few years until this crew of pro-English pirates had captured the American ship of state, together with most of the wealth therein contained. That such a result was inevitable was indicated many years later by Pope Pius XI. In his remarkable monograph, Forty Years After, published in 1931, Pope Pius XI said, "This power (concentrated economic domination) becomes particularly irresistible when exercised by those who, because they hold and control money, are able also to govern credit, and determine its allotment." It was the fact of "allotment" which made the tyranny of the Hamilton bank "particularly irresistible." For the bank's loans were "allotted" mainly to the English and pro-English. This system of concentrated money and controlled credit, Hamilton inaugurated in 1791; a system which in a few years had given a few men complete control of our banking, industry, and commerce, to the end, that Englishmen, and the pro-English Americans who had opposed the War of Independence, received most of the Nation's profits, while those who had fought and won the War of Independence, had been driven out of business and their properties foreclosed.

In brief, what England had lost at Yorktown and Saratoga, she had regained in New York and Washington: She had lost the battle with bullets, but won the battle with gold, and again the American people, as in the days of the Colonies, were the victims of English tyranny. True, they still retained their boasted liberties, the freedom of speech and assembly, but these were of no avail, for Hamilton could say with Rothschild, "Give me the power to control a Nation's money, and I care not who makes its laws." But here again, as in 1765, Mother England had overreached herself—too many Americans had been victimized by her greed, too many merchants and manufacturers had been driven out of business, too many farmers had lost their land, and too many workmen were walking the streets, while newly arrived Englishmen possessed their jobs; indeed, conditions had grown so desperate that even the Congressmen controlled by this Bank of the United States, were afraid for their lives and jobs. So it happened that in 1811, when the bank's charter was about to expire, and it was certain that Congress would refuse the petition for another 20-year charter, England, fearing the loss of her "racket," repeated her trick of 1776, and forced America into war—the War of 1812.

You may understand from this that the "fifth column" began operating in the early days of our Government and has continued to operate because Congress has failed to recognize the danger that lies in allowing private control of a property, gold, which represents national as well as international values. Congress has unwittingly extended this power, for in 1869 the National Bank Act was passed, an act for which the Secretary of the Treasury, Salmon P. Chase, is alleged to have said:

My agency, in producing the passage of the National Bank Act, was the greatest financial mistake of my life. This act has built up a monopoly that affects every interest in the country. It should be repealed, but before this can be accomplished the people will be arrayed on one side and the banks on the other side in a contest such as we have never seen before in this country.

Mr. Speaker, this is exactly what has happened, for such division has taken place. The international bankers, their stooges, pawns, and marionettes, comprise the real "fifth column," the war makers and those who furnish implements of destruction. Opposed to these are "we, the people," who still believe in the fundamental principles of this Government as expressed in the Constitution. I hope this is clear and understandable, so that those who are interested in this issue will be better informed of what I have selected to call the "invisible government."

If the President of the United States is sincere, if he has the slightest regard for his obligated duty, he should take care that the laws be faithfully obeyed. I want to remind him that the Constitution is the primary law of this Nation, and, unfortunately, the very law which he has apparently willfully and deliberately ignored. It is not too late to correct this error, and in justice to himself and in respect to the people he serves he should cut the ties that have bound our Nation to the international gold hierarchy and set the gold aside as a security for the people and the Nation that he is supposed to serve. If he fails to set this Nation free from this international "fifth column" of money changers, he may by such acquiescence be assumed to be adhering to the enemies of the United States, giving them aid and comfort, and the Constitution calls that treason.

Let us make no mistake. The international bankers are the actual power behind war and the undermining of all governments. You can see they began early in the history of our own Government, and they have now reached the point where they are actually in complete control of all the gold in the world. It is our duty to expose this, and in the exposure of it lies our greatest protection. Let us not forget the words of St. John, 8: 32:

And ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make ye free.

A Congressman Reports

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 11, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. EMANUEL CELLER, OF NEW YORK

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a radio address entitled "A Congressman Reports," which I delivered Thursday evening, June 6, 1940, over station WMCA, New York City:

Among the myriads of letters I receive, one in particular intrigues me. It is from my friend, Samuel Salzman, a very distinguished son of a very distinguished father. He speaks of the efficiency of the Nazis in reclaiming and putting to military use wastes of every description. He deplores the fact that we have made no organized effort to gather the vast products that go to waste in our country that could be readily used to help build up our defense machine and mechanism.

Mr. Salzman says, "There are probably from 20,000,000 to 30,000,000 men who shave every morning. Each one of them throws away his razor blade after he is finished. If there was some way to save these blades, you can readily see that in a period of a month almost 900,000,000 blades could be accumulated. In this way," he continued, "important quantities of steel can be gathered for munitions manufacture." His point is well taken, and I have asked the Ordnance Department of the War Department to consider this matter with a view to developing some entity to take advantage of the suggestion. It will be worthy of earnest study to develop an organization to handle the recovery of waste products that are now lost to the Nation and that might be used to great advantage in our armament industry. Iron, steel, and other useful metals may be rescued, e. g., from the tons and tons of used cars that are junked each year and which are now, unhappily, being sent, for rich profits, to Japan for that wily nation of Nippons to convert into life-destroying machines.

We are living in perilous times, and our emotions are apt to overcome our judgment. In our desire to checkmate and destroy "fifth columnists," we are apt to overshoot the mark. There is grave agitation at the present time for the registration and fingerprinting of aliens. It is strange, but true, that the great hardship from such regulation might fall upon citizens and not aliens. I am wondering if one were to stop, on any street in our great city, 10 citizens, especially if they were of middle age or older, and ask them to prove that they were citizens, whether more than half of them would not have great difficulty in producing the evidence. Fires, floods, and other acts of God have destroyed public buildings and places where, for example, final citizenship papers have been lodged or filed. Many old duplicate final papers have been misfiled or lost. In the old days midwives helped bring into the world annually thousands of babies. No records of birth, in most of those instances, were ever made.

Thus, the native-born will be greatly put to it if asked to prove their citizenship. Millions of natives, born in the Hinterland, or sparsely-settled sections, could not possibly prove their nativity because many towns, counties, and States in the old days never required the registration of birth certificates. How many of my listeners can now produce witnesses who were actually present at their births; yet the affidavits of such eye witnesses are usually required in the absence of a birth certificate.

The late Will Rogers, not so many years before his demise, sought to get a passport. He was sorely put to it to prove that he was a citizen because he could not produce his birth certificate.

There will thus be given opportunities for blackmail and dreadful persecution. The aliens will register and be fingerprinted and the evidence thereof will be proven upon demand. But, what of the native-born and naturalized who cannot produce documental evidence?

Socalled "fifth columnists" are not going to worry about the act. They will register. They will be too slick not to. Furthermore, be it remembered, that there may be far more saboteurs and spies, bundists, Gestapos, and Ogpu agents and Communists among the citizens rather than there are among the aliens.

Incidentally, 360,000 Russians, 365,000 Germans, 500,000 Poles, and 700,000 Italians will have to be registered and fingerprinted if the proposed bills pass the Congress.

Our beloved President has been accused by those who think only in terms of politics of being derelict in allowing our military machine to run down. Of course this charge is absurd. No one has sought to protect this country against foreign foes to a greater degree than our President. It is well, however, to point out that during the 7 years of the Roosevelt incumbency, and prior to the present Seventy-sixth Congress, not one Republican Member, either of the Senate or the House, came out in favor of increased armament. I have had scanned the RECORDS of the House and Senate from the Seventy-first to the Seventy-sixth Congress in an endeavor to find the remarks or speeches of Republican Members of the House or Senate which advocated the strengthening of our Army or our Navy or our airplane service; and, strangely enough, with three minor exceptions—namely, Senator Johnson of California, in the Seventy-second Congress; former Senator Robinson, of Indiana; and former Representative Goss, of the Seventy-third Congress—there is not a word. The Republicans have been strangely silent. In none of these Congresses from 1929 to 1938 was there any advocacy of any developing or increasing of our Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or airplane service. It does not behoove the Republicans, therefore, to make any charge in this regard against our President. In fact, we are all in the same boat. We have all been lulled into a sense of false security. But, above all, it lies not in the Republican mouths to complain.

We are all naturally interested in the third-term possibilities for the President. Frankly, I don't think Roosevelt wishes a third term, but circumstances may force him to a different conclusion. In fact, assurances were given to intimates of the President recently that he does not want a third term and would not accept one "unless conditions in Europe were so grave that no other course lay open." Frankly, the last few days have indicated to us that no other course is open. This may be deemed as fairly definite assurance that the President will accept a third-term nomination.

Furthermore, Democratic congressional cloakroom gossip indicates practically no opposition to another Roosevelt term.

War, doubtless, will be the foremost topic at the Democratic and Republican National Conventions. War dominated both in 1916, 24 years ago. "What shall be our attitude?" was the issue then as it will be in Philadelphia and in Chicago. The Democratic slogan in 1916 was, "Wilson kept us out of war," and thus he deserves reelection. This time the war presents a different background. It is not the question that Roosevelt kept us out of war, but will conditions permit us to remain at peace? We must all be prepared for the dreadful possibility that we shall be compelled sooner or later to fight in self-defense. Preparedness is our best assurance of peace. Which of the parties shall be the better suited to bring about the best possible preparedness? Which of the candidates shall be better suited to achieve national security? These will be the burning questions for the Nation to decide.

Thank goodness for the Monroe Doctrine, and President Roosevelt's interpretation of it, to wit, that Canada, despite its aid to Britain as a belligerent, will come under its protection. Consistent with such attitude of benevolent neutrality and to assure quicker delivery of planes to the Allies, Secretary of State Hull has properly interpreted the Neutrality Act to permit American pilots to fly American-made planes, bought by the Allies, to certain Canadian ports of embarkation. Heretofore, such planes had to be delivered at the Canadian border and pulled over the line by a rope. Three cheers for Hull. Realizing the importance of Canada, Secretary Hull has sent as our new Ambassador to Canada one of our most successful and experienced of career diplomats, Jay Pierrepont Moffat. He was with Sumner Welles in Europe.

Canada means a great deal to us. She is our best customer. We are her best customer. We need her badly for much of and many of our basic supplies, to wit: Nickel, radium, zinc, asbestos, platinum, and lead. The money we have invested in the Maple Leaf Colony is stupendous. I shudder to think of a British defeat. However, we may have to face many disagreeable, frightful eventualities. Canada may yet become the head of the new British Empire. However, I hope not.

Many young people are writing to me that they do not want to go to war. Neither do I. I loathe war and all that it implies. But war may come to us. What then? Shall we wait until it is too late? Shall we let our military machine run down so low that it will be absolutely useless? You cannot fight the Nazis with apples and powder puffs. You must have tanks and airplanes and bombers to do that. Remember, Hitler will not attack us directly, but will attack us indirectly. He would stab us in the back by way of Mexico or South America. If and when war comes to us a la Hitler, courage is insufficient. Millions of mere soldiers are not enough. Remember Belgium, Holland, Norway, France, and England. They made a terrible mistake. Shall we? The most modern of machines and weapons are essential. We are arranging for their preparation and manufacture now in Washington. The letters that come in from the young men and women prove that they are ignorant of the problem. It is a difficult question, I admit. In such a perplexity we must rely upon the experience of the Army and the Navy. We must not consult the pacifists, the isolationists, the Communists, the Socialists, or any American Cliveden set.

The recent utterance of Dr. Archibald MacLeish, Librarian of the Library of Congress, might well be read by my young communicants. Dr. MacLeish apologized for his sheer pacifist views expressed in the decade after the first World War. He now knows he was then wrong. He deplores the cult of rabid antiwar pleas, plays, and books by men like Latzko, Don Passos, Hemingway, and Aldington, which deluged America after that first World War involvement, and which writings he now claims is responsible for the wrong thinking which permeates a large section of the present generation of American young people respecting their patriotic obligations. The good doctor now holds that his own generation of writers and thinkers is considerably to blame for the widely prevalent state of moral disarmament among our youth. The works of those misguided writers and zealots have borne bitter fruits. They, incidentally, were responsible for the Arms Limitation Conference in 1921. When we look back and see how we and the Allies scrapped war ships which could not be used to advantage, we see how ridiculous were those post-war sentiments.

The President lives in the White House. Why is it called the White House? Because, prior to 1812, we were unprepared as we are unprepared now. After the Revolutionary War, there was a great antiwar hysteria. Everyone became a pacifist, with the result that Great Britain took advantage of that unpreparedness, entered our portals, and invaded the Capital. There was no resistance. We had no army to speak of. The British were able to burn the Capitol Building and much of Washington. The smoke was so great that the stone from which the White House had been built was covered with soot and black smoke. It was necessary to paint the stone white. Hence, the term "White House." The burning of our Capitol, and the ruin of our White House in 1812 should serve to remind us that nevermore shall we have a national defense that is inadequate for all purposes.

I am happy to note that the Civil Service Commission has stated that, as a matter of policy, it would not in the future certify to any department or agency for any position any person when it has been established that he or she is a member of the Communist Party, the German bund, or any communistic or Nazi organization. So far, so good. Now, what about the Communists and Nazis already in the Government service? They should receive the same dose. I am importuning the Civil Service Commission to segregate these traitors in the Government service, and, in common parlance, give them the "bum's rush." If the Civil Service Commission has no such power, we in Congress must give it to them. In ordinary times I would not talk this way. As a lawyer and a responsible member of the Judiciary Committee, I could not. Such discrimination might not be deemed according to Hoyle. But, in these times of stress and danger, certain rights heretofore deemed inalienable must be temporarily suspended. When the Nation is in peril, strange things must be done to protect it. We are in peril of the "fifth columnists" and Clivedens. There are many Kuhns and Pelleys out of prison. There are many Browders roaming around who should be in convict's stripes and lodged in Leavenworth, as Browder soon will be. It is for this reason that I say the Nation is in danger. The Government shall at least have the right to say who shall or who shall not be in its employ. Imagine bold spying Nazi Turn Vereiners or Browderites taking orders from Berlin or Moscow in positions of power in the Civil Aeronautics Authority, in the Chief Engineer's office of the War Department, at the Panama Canal Zone Board of the Navy Department, in the Bureau of Geodetic Survey in the Treasury Department. See how dangerous that would be? They could act as a pipe line of information to our enemies.

England's invulnerability to foreign attack has frequently been mentioned. No invader has set foot upon British soil for 900 years. In 1066 William the Conqueror crossed the channel from Normandy and captured Britain. Strangely enough, the invasion of England from Norway a little time before helped materially William's efforts, for the Norwegian invasion diverted the British soldiers to the north and thus weakened their forces in the south and aided William in his victory at the Battle of Hastings. In 1585 Philip of Spain, with his Spanish Armada, attempted invasion but was defeated by Sir Francis Drake. In 1759, the period of our French and Indian War, the Franch Navy was worsted in its attempt at invasion. In 1804 Napoleon assembled an army of 100,000 to cross from Boulogne. He failed despite aid from Spanish and French fleets. During the World War, the German cruisers bombarded coastal towns and zeppelins dropped bombs on London. However, our Revolutionary naval hero, John Paul Jones, was the only one who successfully invaded England. He raided Whitehaven, a British port on the Irish Sea. He captured its forts by surprise, spiked its guns, and raised the Stars and Stripes. He actually attempted to set fire to the ships in the harbor. He might have gone further, but was called off.

Let us turn back to some of the pages of our early history. Let us go back to the days of Jefferson. Louisiana at the beginning of his administration was a possession of Spain and was about to be ceded to Napoleon, who had captured Spain. But Jefferson said that Spain might have retained Louisiana quietly for years owing to her "pacific disposition" and her "feeble state." Jefferson felt, however, that Louisiana in the hands of the French, and particularly in the hands of Napoleon, would become a thorn in the side of America. Jefferson sent emissaries abroad, and Napoleon, primarily because he was sorely beset and needed money, was persuaded to sell us Louisiana.

The purchase was a stroke of genius for Jefferson, who excluded from North America any base for what Walter Lippmann calls 'the conquering revolutionary imperialism of Bonaparte." Jefferson did not rely upon the width of the oceans as do some of our pacifists. He relied upon the breadth of his diplomatic insight. He did not want any foreigners at our door. There may be many snide foreigners at our back door soon, particularly if Hitler wins. He, like Napoleon before him, seeks world dominion. There is Greenland, owned by Denmark. There is Curaçao in the West Indies near Venezuela and Surinam, commonly known as Dutch Guiana, owned by Holland. There is French St. Pierre and Miquelon, south of Newfoundland; French Guadeloupe and Martinique between Puerto Rico and South America. There is French Guiana in South America. There is Canada and Newfoundland, with Labrador a dependency of Newfoundland. There is Bermuda. In the West Indies there are the Bahamas, the island of Jamaica, the British Leeward Islands, the British Windward Islands, British Guiana, and British Honduras.

The mention of this vast domain of mainland and islands must give us pause. The State Department is giving serious attention to the possibility of the unspeakable Hitler laying claim to all, or part of, this territory. This thought occurred to me: Why ought we not offer France and/or England a suitable amount of credit for the transfer of title—say to Bermuda, the Bahamas, or Jamaica, St. Pierre and Miquelon, Guadeloupe, Martinique, and British and French Guiana? Such credit to be taken out in trade; that is, no money should pass, but the credit could be used in this country for the purchase of much-needed airships, supplies, and munitions.

Think about this, my gentle listeners. Let me have your reaction. Write me your views, addressed to this station or to me in Washington. President Roosevelt might well follow the example of Jefferson and purchase another type of Louisiana.

Reports have reached us of the unspeakable horrors inflicted by the Nazi troops dominated by the fiendish Hitler. They have made it a point to drive thousands of pitiful refugees in front of them. They forced them to go along certain designated roads and the Nazi troops advance alongside the refugees. The latter act as a sort of shield for the Nazis. Gestapos disguised themselves as refugees and mingled with them and prevented them from communicating with each other or with the French or the English. It is said that the columns of these unfortunates made easier the German advance. The Allies dared not shoot down these refugees. When a certain objective was reached, the command would be given and the Nazi troops mowed down scores of these homeless. They were also bombed by Nazi planes. The Nazis lifted the bodies of these refugees and piled them high as barricades or left the bodies in huge masses to impede the advance of the enemy.

This unspeakable brutality bears out the message that Sumner Welles brought back with him from Europe. He conferred with Goering, who said that Hitler, to gain his objectives, would smash every known precept of humanity.

A LETTER AND TWO DECLARATIONS OF LOYALTY TO UNITED STATES

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I insert in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter and two declarations of loyalty.

In these days when so much is said against the aliens and when some would legislate against them as a class merely because a few might be disloyal, it is very enlightening and comforting to receive such communications as these. These people are to be complimented for their very clear statement, which should set at rest any further discussion on this point so far as they are concerned.

SEINE AND LINE FISHERMEN'S UNION OF SAN PEDRO, Terminal Island, Calif., June 5, 1940.

Hon. LEE E. GEYER,
Congressman, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: This is to acknowledge receipt of your kind complimentary letter of May 31, 1940, in regard to our declaration of loyalty to the United States of America which has been publicly announced through the press.

At our general meeting held on the 16th day of May 1940 a motion was carried unanimously by the membership to instruct the secretary to publicly issue said declaration, to clarify all misleading propaganda against the alien fishermen on false grounds by some so-called professional patriots and as to the doubt of questionable loyalty of the citizens of Japanese extractions.

We have approximately 730 membership in our union, composed of aliens and citizens, the aliens who have resided in this country for number of years and have raised children who are citizens by birth, supported by them for livelihood as you know, and are all law-abiding peoples.

As it is already stated in the San Pedro News Pilot, I am a citizen by birth, served in the United States Army during the last World War and a member of the American Legion, employed in the United States Post Office at Hawaii for 11 years, served as a secretary of the Republican Precinct Club, Second Representative District for 8 years, and was candidate on the Republican ticket for the board of supervisors from west Hawaii in the year 1934.

Kindly rest assured that as long as I am here, I will look into all matters of alien controversy or investigations as to the subversive group of suspicious persons, and will be the first one to report to the Government authorities should I discover any persons who are detrimental to our beloved country for immediate arrest.

I am enclosing our declaration and one from the Nisei (second generation—citizens) Fishermen's Club of the Pacific which is our fraternal organization, two copies for your reference.

Thanking you for your many past favors rendered to the people and for your thoughtful consideration in this matter, I am

Faithfully yours,

KINZO WAKAYAMA, Secretary.

Wanted—A Military Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR.

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 11 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ARTICLE BY MAJ. GEORGE FIELDING ELIOT

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Wanted—A Military Policy," by Maj. George Fielding Eliot, the distinguished military expert, which supports the contention which I have submitted many times to the Senate, namely, that we must have a military policy thoroughly developed and well thought out if all the money we are appropriating is to be expended intelligently.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Herald Tribune of June 7, 1940]

WANTED—A MILITARY POLICY

(By Maj. George Fielding Eliot)

We have just had a terrible object lesson.

We have seen two great and rich powers taken by surprise, defeated in the first battle of a great war and placed in a position of the gravest jeopardy by another power far their inferior in material and human resources, but far their superior in immediate striking force.

We are a great and rich power, too. We have even greater resources, material and industrial, than either of the defeated ones. But we are weak when it comes to the translation of those resources into fighting forces, and we are weak very largely because we have no coordinated plan for defending ourselves. Of course, the Army has plans, and the Navy has plans. There is even a makeshift affair called a joint board, which occasionally gets together and does a little collective planning; but its members are all busy men with many other pressing duties. Nowhere is there an organization or an agency which has nothing else to do but to consider the broad general outlines of our national defense as a whole.

What we need is to formulate a comprehensive and intelligent military policy (using the word "military" in its broadest sense) which, taking into account our geographical position, our resources, our needs and the character of our people, our relations with other powers and our vital interests, will form the basis for all our organization and expenditure for national defense.

We do not have such a policy now, or anything resembling one.

We have, it is true, just chosen certain men to plan the industrial basis for our armed strength, to organize our resources to provide the material of war; but we have not chosen men to plan how this material is to be used, how our armed forces are to be organized, what purposes they are to serve—in a word, what we mean to defend, can defend, must defend—and how best to defend it. Such planning falls rather within the province of the soldier, the sailor, and the diplomat than within that of the industrialist, the economist, and the politician. It is obvious that neither the voting of great sums of money nor the organization of material and industrial resources will serve to keep us secure unless these moneys, these resources are translated into fighting forces, and unless these forces are of such size and are so designed, based, and organized as to give full support to our foreign policies and protection to our vital interests.

A single example will make this clear. We are now learning from the war in Europe certain most valuable lessons as to the employment of air power in war.

Yet we have no existing permanent means of making a continuing and comprehensive study of this subject. The Army can report on its own views, but there will usually be divergencies of opinion as between the General Staff and the Air Corps; the Navy can report on its particular problems relating to air power, but this is only part of the picture. What we must know is just what part air power is going to play in the whole, broad set-up of our defenses, what it can do, what it cannot do. What happens now is that the President in determining Executive policy, or congressional committees in making appropriations, must weigh half a dozen different recommendations and assertions and make decisions which may be vital to the safety of the country without the benefit of the sort of well-weighed professional study and advice which they should have at their disposal.

Surely it is clear as crystal that while losing no time in making a start toward the creation of instruments of war, we should also lose no time in determining upon a military policy which shall walk hand in hand with all other elements of state policy, in close and mutual support. Such coordination is the secret of the German successes; it is also the secret of our own national security in the midst of a troubled world.

We have never had a true military policy. In all our history, we have hastily and wastefully built up improvised defense forces after we started to fight, have somehow won through without disaster, and then have immediately allowed these forces to fall into decay until we are confronted with a fresh emergency. We can no longer do this with safety. Improvised forces, whether land, sea, or air, are worse than useless in modern war. We must stand or fall on what we have when the war starts, both in machines of war and trained men. The time limits of modern war have been so reduced that there is no longer opportunity to gird our loins after war has begun. Unless we can learn these lessons, so terribly taught by immediate events, we shall perish, and we shall deserve to perish.

We must plan, and plan now, to meet imminent danger, immediate emergency; but we must do more than that. We must plan for the future of America as well as for the present; for the safety of our children, as well as for our own. We must set up a permanent planning agency, which shall be concerned with the defense of the state, now and for the future, and which shall command such a measure of public confidence as to assure its own permanence.

We might call this agency the College of National Defense. It should be composed of a group of the most able, widely experienced, and progressive officers of the Army and Navy, with one or two of the best career men from the State Department, and at least one top-flight economist. In the beginning, the staff should be somewhat larger (because of the imminence of danger and the tremendous amount of pioneer work to be done) than it need be later. To assist in this work, we should call to the aid of the staff the best and brightest of our younger officers, at first to work as assistants, later on in annual classes as students after graduation from the Army or Navy War Colleges, or after completing certain special courses.

The primary duty of the College of National Defense should be to advise the President in his constitutional duties as Commander in Chief of the armed forces of the United States; its first job, the formulation of a military policy. It should prepare special reports as the President might require on specific subjects. Its help and advice should be available to the committees of Congress which are concerned with national defense. It should work in close collaboration with the new Council of National Defense, and with the State, War, and Navy Departments.

In initiating this plan, we can do little more than select the very best men available, on the ground of experience, intelligence, courage, and proven ability, and say to them:

"Gentlemen, you have a blank check. You may call in to assist you or to consult with you any officers of the armed services you need, any officer of the Foreign Service, any civil servant of the Government. You may have any money you require for research, travel, technical advice, and clerical help. Every item of information in possession of any Government agency is at your disposal. Time is of vital importance, that direction may be given to our efforts and our expenditures. What is required is a military policy for the United States and detailed plans to implement that policy."

Of course, such a policy and such plans would not be static and lifeless things. Constant revision of detail would be essential. Firmness in principle, flexibility in detail to meet changing conditions would seem the soundest approach to the problems.

One great and tremendous advantage would be immediately gained—the support of that public confidence which can be the only secure foundation for any continuous program of national defense. But to insure this the caliber of the men chosen to direct the college of national defense should be such as to leave no doubt either of their ability or their devotion. Fortunately, we have such men. We have, for example, Admiral William D. Leahy (retired), lately Chief of Naval Operations, and before that commander in chief of the battle force, whose gifts of character, intellect, and experience can be far better employed to his country's benefit in a time like this than as Governor of Puerto Rico. We have Lt. Gen. Hugh A. Drum, who was Chief of Staff of the First American Army in the World War, and has since been commandant of the Command and General Staff School, Deputy Chief of Staff, executive secretary of the Baker board for the coordination of our aviation policy. We have Brig. Gen. Frank M. Andrews, former commanding general of the General Headquarters Air Force, now in a position of great responsibility, it is true, as assistant chief of staff for operations and training, but whose knowledge of modern air forces and capacity for clear thinking could be made of even greater service. There are others of no less merit and ability in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Foreign Service. Let a group of such men as these be given full freedom, time, money, and help. This is no moment for precedent or for politics.

We are going to spend immediately $5,000,000,000 for the national defense. We are going to spend other billions in the future. These are large sums, but we do not begrudge them. They are needed.

Let us, however, make sure that for each dollar spent we get a dollar's worth of national security. Let us spend a little of this money in planning how to spend the rest. This will pay us rich dividends—in economy and in safety and as an investment in the future of America.

We are fortunate in that we have a little time in which to do these things; but we have no time to lose. The better we plan now the less of our freedom we shall have to give up in order to be safe.

Warren G. Harding

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS A. JENKINS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 11, 1940

ADDRESS OF HON. THOMAS A. JENKINS, OF OHIO

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address delivered by me at Marion, Ohio, on June 9, at a memorial service in honor of ex-President Warren G. Harding. This service was under the auspices of the Marion (Ohio) Lodge of Elks, and sponsored by the State officers of the Elks. It was supported and participated in by the Elks lodges of Ohio. President Harding was a member of the Marion lodge of Elks. He was made a member 50 years ago. All those members of that lodge who are yet living and who were taken in when he was were present at the meeting. This meeting was held at the beautiful Harding Memorial Monument erected at Marion in honor of their illustrious former citizen.

The address is as follows:

Mr. Chairman, brother Elks, and—as President Harding was so fond of saying—my fellow countrymen, this service furnishes an opportunity for those of you who were neighbors and friends of President and Mrs. Harding to show how highly you esteemed them. It furnishes an opportunity to those of us who are members of the Elks fraternity to show how proud we are to feel and to know that we were closely bound to Mr. Harding by ties of fraternal obligation and fraternal affection. It gives all of us a grand opportunity to prove our devotion to our country and its institutions and our loyalty to the flag by showing proper respect for one of our country's most illustrious dead.

A nation's standard of civilization is accurately tested by the customs of the people as they show, or fail to show, proper respect for their dead. Veneration for the tomb and reverence for their dead were characteristic of the strong nations of earliest history. This simple inclination of these unlettered ancients to keep fresh the memories of their dead is unmistakable proof that the natural instincts of man cry out for the eternal companionship of those he loves.

"Who hath not learned, in hours of faith,
The truth to flesh and sense unknown,
That life is ever lord of death,
And love can never lose its own!"

And with the hymn writer let us say:

"There is a scene where spirits blend,
Where friend holds fellowship with friend."

The people of Marion performed no small task when they assumed and carried out the colossal task of raising this beautiful memorial to the honor of their most distinguished citizen. This beautiful edifice and its grandeur symbolizes the respect which the American people feel for one of their statesmen.

In all generations nations have erected monuments as proof of their love and affection for their honored dead. No nation has surpassed ours in this respect. All over our land a thankful people have recorded the virtues of their forefathers in literature, in art, in song, and in enduring bronze and granite. The choicest treasure of an individual who has lived right is his memory of his life's experiences—"A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches." The greatest wealth of any nation is its national memories. When Greece was richest in treasures her greatest treasure was her culture. When Rome ruled the world her richest treasure was that which held her empire together—law and government. The national memories of our country are richer than our mines of gold, our fields of corn, or our cattle on a thousand hills. Our national memories are more ennobling than our great cities filled with the treasures of art and the trophies of war. In these days of wars and rumors of war our national memories, which inspire our patriotism, are a safer defense for the Republic than our strong, efficient armies or our swift, magnificent navies.

ISSUES IN HARDING'S CAMPAIGN

The administrations of all of our Presidents have been marked by some important and distinctive event or circumstance. Mr. Harding's administration was no exception in this respect. Some national political campaigns have been waged largely on a question of the personality of the candidates; others have been waged on some one or more important issue while the personality of the respective candidates may not have been given much consideration. Not since the days of slavery and secession was any campaign waged more completely on a great issue than was the Harding-Cox campaign of 1920. The issue of that campaign was a profound one. The leaders of one of the parties advocated the entry of the United States into the League of Nations. The opposite party, headed by Mr. Harding, opposed the entry of America into the League of Nations. Mr. Harding was elected on that issue by probably the greatest vote any President had received up to that time. This election on this issue was the outstanding event connected with the Harding administration. There are few people who would not agree that subsequent events have shown that the people were right at that time. Even today the people are almost unanimously opposed to the entrance of the United States into the present World War if the same can be avoided. Had our country entered into the League of Nations, we no doubt would have been required to act as the big policeman in all the international difficulties that have arisen and are now exemplified by the Great War. Instead of making the world safe for democracy, the great World War did more to destroy democracy and Christianity than any other event in the history of the world.

Soon after Mr. Harding's entry upon his duties as President, he began a program intended to encourage peace among the nations of the world. In his administration a great disarmament conference was held and the United States, in keeping with her promise in that great conference, proceeded to disarm and did destroy many of her battleships. Other nations did not keep their promise, either in spirit or in truth. The Hughes Disarmament Conference, at that time hailed as a great success, long since has passed into ineffectiveness. The Kellogg Peace Treaty, signed by practically every nation in the world, has long since been broken and thrown upon the scrap heap, and the League of Nations is itself impotent. In spite of all these failures of nations to keep their promises and in spite of the great conflagration which threatens to destroy the world, history will give to Mr. Harding and his administration credit for having taken a gigantic step in the right direction. It would seem that national prejudices are yet too strong and human nature is yet too perverse for the world to hope for world-wide and everlasting peace. Mr. Harding was a man of peace, but apparently the peoples of the world were not yet ready to fulfill the Biblical prophecy that the time would come when nations would beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks and that war would be no more.

Within this beautiful tomb lies the remains of a man who served in the United States Senate during the last World War. He knew the cross currents that the great war set in motion. He knew the hopes and ambitions of the leaders of the different nations involved, and when the war was over he knew how profound and sincere was the desire of the people that no longer should the world be scourged with war.

Let me give you a few excerpts from his inaugural address that will give you a fair appraisal of Mr. Harding as he entered upon his duties as President of the United States. Listen as we hear him say:

"The recorded progress of our Republic, materially and spiritually, in itself proves the wisdom of the inherited policy of noninvolvement in Old World affairs. Confident of our ability to work out our own destiny, and jealously guarding our right to do so, we seek no part in directing the destinies of the Old World."

The following language should convince anyone that the United States was sincere in her desire to cooperate for world peace:

"We crave friendship and harbor no hate. But America, our America, the America builded on the foundation laid by the inspired fathers, can be a party to no permanent military alliance. It can enter into no political commitments, nor assume any economic obligations, which will subject our decisions to any other than our own authority."

He appraised accurately the wishes of the people with reference to big armies and navies, and said:

"We are ready to associate ourselves with the nations of the world, great and small, for conference, for counsel; to seek the expressed views of world opinion; to recommend a way to approximate disarmament and relieve the crushing burdens of military and naval establishments."

He welcomed the countries of the world to imitate America when he said:

"When the governments of the earth shall have established a freedom like our own and shall have sanctioned the pursuit of peace as we have practiced it, I believe the last sorrow and the final sacrifice of international warfare will have been written.

"We shall give no people just cause to make war upon us; we hold no national prejudices; we entertain no spirit of revenge; we do not hate; we do not covet; we dream of no conquest; nor boast of armed prowess.

"If, despite this attitude, war is again forced upon us, I earnestly hope a way may be found which will unify our individual and collective strength and consecrate all America materially and spiritually."

With reference to preparedness, he spoke kindly but firmly when he said:

"I wish for an America no less alert in guarding against dangers from within than it is watchful against enemies from without. Our fundamental law recognizes no class, no group, no section; there must be none in legislation or administration.

"If revolution insists upon overturning established order, let other peoples make the tragic experiment. There is no place for it in America. When world war threatened civilization, we pledged our resources and our lives to its preservation; and when revolution threatens, we unfurl the flag of law and order and renew our consecration."

These are the words of one who must have loved his country. It must not be forgotten that President Harding died while serving his country. He was a martyr to this strenuous and exacting service.

TOMB OF UNKNOWN SOLDIER

Another important event transpired during Mr. Harding's administration, and although it did not have in itself any great political or economic problem, still it was so full of human interest that it was then, and will continue to be, a great event in the minds and hearts of the American people. Millions of people since the days of Harding have already found their way to Arlington Cemetery and have stood in awe as they realized that in the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier lies the body of a young man whose identity is known but to God. As they watch the sentry in his rhythmic march back and forth all day long their hearts are moved and they think the best thoughts of which they are capable. So long as people have respect for government and honor those who have given up their lives for the perpetuation of constitutional government, that long will the people visit this shrine of American patriotism and pay their tribute of respect to those who have given up their lives for the sake of their country and will dedicate themselves more thoroughly to the causes of liberty and freedom.

When Mr. Harding dedicated the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier, he was at his best. He made a great speech. The occasion gave his kindly nature a chance to empty its fountains of love and sympathy.

Let us appreciate Mr. Harding's sentiments honestly and take him at his word when we listen to what he said in that great speech. Here it is:

"This American soldier went forth to battle with no hatred for any people in the world, but hating war and hating the purpose of every war for conquest. He cherished our national rights and abhorred the threat of armed domination; and in the maelstrom of destruction and suffering and death he fired his shot for liberation of the captive conscience of the world."

Likewise he must have been sincere when he said:

"Ours are lofty resolutions today, as with tribute to the dead we consecrate ourselves to a better order for the living. With all my heart, I wish we might say to the defenders who survive, to mothers who sorrow, to widows and children who mourn, that no such sacrifice shall be asked again."

And again he said:

"Hundreds of mothers are wondering today, finding a touch of solace in the possibility that the Nation bows in grief over the body of one she bore to live and die, if need be, for the Republic."

He was expressing the hope that was in the heart of every American when he said:

"As we return this poor clay to its mother soil, garlanded by love and covered with the decorations that only nations can bestow, I can sense the prayers of our people, of all peoples, that this Armistice Day shall mark the beginning of a new and lasting era of peace on earth, good will among men."

The failure of Mr. Harding's prophecy was tragical. The cruelties of those in ancient times who studiously attempted to outdo each other in acts of human cruelty do not compare in total to the millions of soldiers and civilians who have been outraged and killed as the result of the actions of the madmen of Europe in the past few weeks.

The millions who have visited the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier and the millions yet to come who will visit and will read the beautiful inscription thereon will know that President Harding dedicated the monument and expressed the sentiments that are embodied in the beautiful inscription:

"Here rests in honored glory an American soldier known but to God."

My friends, and especially my Brother Elks, President Harding had the social qualifications that made him a great fraternalist. We are proud of his membership in our organization. One of the finest compliments that could be paid to any man is carried on the literature of one of your civic organizations here in Marion and it is especially appropriate in its application to Mr. Harding: "Loved most by those who knew him best" is a great tribute, especially when it comes of those who knew him best.

THE FLAG

All over the land these June days communities, societies, and fraternal organizations are observing Flag Day. The Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks by its ritual makes it compulsory upon the local lodges everywhere to observe Flag Day with appropriate services. I think this is the only fraternal organization among the great fraternities of the land that compels this observance. It shall not be my purpose to enter upon a eulogy of the American flag. These stirring times, however, encourage one in that direction. The toast of this great American fraternity to the great American flag cannot be surpassed for beauty of language or accuracy of description. Every Elk worthy of the honor of being an Elk swells with pride when he hears the Elks' Toast to the Flag. Let me recite it to you:

"The gentle breeze with lingering caress kisses the folds of no flag that can compare with it in beauty. There is no such red in budding rose, falling leaf, or sparkling wine; no such white in April blossom, crescent moon, or mountain snow; no such blue in woman's eye, ocean's depths, or heaven's dome, and no such pageantry of clustering stars or streaming light in all the spectrum of the sea and sky."

My friends, does the American flag mean as much to us as a people as it did in pioneer days or as it did in the days of the Civil War? In those days the patriots were not more patriotic than the patriots of today but there can be no question that there are hundreds today in our country who do not respect our flag. In the pioneer days there were few, if any. There were few even 20 years ago. At least, I do not remember up until about 20 years ago of ever having heard or seen anyone anywhere speak or act disrespectfully of our flag or of the country for which it stands. Since then I have been shocked at what I have heard and seen. In my work, when I was a member of the Immigration Committee of the House of Representatives and was a member of a special committee of Congress to investigate subversive activities, I saw and heard many things that caused me to wonder why we were not more strict in this respect. You can imagine the shock that any true American would receive to hear men sneeringly state, as I have heard while cross-examining witnesses before the committee, that if given a choice between service upholding the American flag and service upholding the red flag of communism they would take the side of the red flag of communism. This has occurred more than once in my experience. For more than a dozen years I have spoken at many places over this country, calling attention to this situation. I felt then that I was a sort of John the Baptist crying in the wilderness and that many thought that I was unduly alarmed. But today we see men who subscribe to a philosophy called communism holding high places in our Government. They will probably not openly speak against the American flag, but they are dissatisfied with American institutions and they conspire with those who would change our form of government and do it overnight. The "fifth column" has been at work in America for years, and there is more than one kind of a "fifth column." We pride ourselves on our education and our refinement, but skillful propagandists have reached into our schools, into our clubs, into our fraternities, and into our churches in a most clandestine manner. I am glad that the people are awakening, and I hope that no consideration and no quarter will be given to those who restrict their Americanism by any conditions or reservations whatsoever. I know that I am loyal to my country, and I think every other person should know his own conscience. Those who have the least disloyalty in their natures or in their make-up should be watched and investigated, and, if necessary, liquidated.

I am sure you will agree with me in an expression of these sentiments. I am for free speech but I am not for free treasonable speech. I am for free press but not for such filthy, unpatriotic, and un-American stuff as is flooding our papers and the mails written by those who would give their lives to see our land of liberty fall before the forces that scoff at righteousness, defame Christ, and deny God Almighty.

Ladies and gentlemen, let me read to you, and give you my version of a few lines of a familiar old poem:

"When Freedom, from her mountain height,
Unfurled her standard to the air,
She tore the azure robe of night,
And set the stars of glory there:
She mingled with its gorgeous dyes
The milky baldric of the skies,
And striped its pure, celestial white
With streakings of the morning light."

* * * * *

"Forever float that standard sheet!
Where breathes the foe but falls before us,
With Freedom's soil beneath our feet,
And Freedom's banner streaming o'er us!"

CONCLUSION

My friends, on behalf of this great fraternity under whose auspices we are here gathered today, let me thank those responsible for this meeting, and thank those who have given us their presence and efforts. And let me say that we appreciate your presence thus honoring a great American, and honoring the flag of the greatest country in the world, and honoring yourself by being here. My friends, let us together salute the flag in the service of which President Harding died a martyr to his duty, and let us pledge allegiance to the flag by reciting in unison:

"I pledge allegiance to the flag and to the Republic for which it stands—one Nation, indivisable with liberty and justice for all."

"Forever float that standard sheet!
Where breathes the foe but falls before us,
With Freedom's soil beneath our feet,
And Freedom's banner streaming o'er us!"

* * * * *

"In the beauty of the lillies
Christ was born across the seas
With a glory in His bosom
That transfigures you and me.
As he fought to make men holy
Let us fight to keep men free."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SHERMAN MINTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 11 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. CLAUDE PEPPER, OF FLORIDA

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD the very able radio address delivered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] on the American Forum of the Air on June 9, 1940.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The ruins of ancient Rome still bear the vivid scars of a battle fought in 312. In that battle Constantine the First gained the blessings of Christianity for the western world. From the eventful issue of that battle flowed the fresh waters of a new stream of learning, culture, and beauty, which bathed Europe in a new and dynamic spirit.

In 732, Charles the Hammer, in what is now France, hurled back the unchristian masses of Abdur Rahman—and the world remained a Christian world.

In France today another battle rages. That battle, too, holds in its bosom the same issue: Shall Europe and the western world, your world and my world, still enjoy the blessings of religion or shall the pagan gods of Woden and Thor take the seat of our Jehovah?

At the beginning of Godly time, Moses on Mount Sinai took Jehovah's commandments and, as they were then inscribed upon tablets of stone, they have since been impressed deep into the consciousness of the civilized world. Now, more than the Philistines of the ancient world, has the German Fuehrer challenged these commandments—challenged the first commandment of a sovereign God, the second commandment that dignifies man.

This issue, too, will rise out of this battle. Shall the Ten Commandments still live as the basic code of a God-fearing world, or shall pagan fantasy and racial vanity, by an apostate's sword, dethrone them?

Our own Declaration of Independence stirred the world with this straightforward declaration: "That all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, that among those are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Do men have liberty as an inalienable right? Is freedom the inheritance of all? That issue, too, will be settled by the crash of tanks, the clash of arms, and the heroic bravery of dying boys clinging to every clod of civilization's soil in France at this very hour.

Our standard of living, the kind of house we live in, the sort of food we eat, the clothes we wear, the picture show, the theater, the automobile, the travel we enjoy—that, too, out of the strange complexity of modern life will be determined by that battle, the roar of which so touches the heart of the world that we can almost hear it here, as its drama thunders through the consciousness of the earth.

The amount of money we take from public welfare, education, housing, the restoration of our soil, the replenishment of our forests, from disabled veterans, dependent mother and child, from the unemployed begging for the chance to work—that, too, is an issue in the outcome of this struggle. For all America knows that we cannot, rich as we are, carry incalculable burdens of armament, build illimitable ships, guns, airplanes, trucks, tanks, air bases, forts, without robbing Peter to pay Paul.

The taxes we pay, whether rich or poor, or moderately well-to-do—that, too, awaits the outcome of this bloody contest. The debt limit has already been lifted without ceremony. New taxes are now in process of imposition. We have, in the Senate in the last 3 weeks, voted appropriations approaching $5,000,000,000. It is not a question any longer of how much money to appropriate. It is merely a question of what is the capacity of our country to turn out instruments of defense for our people and our world.

Whether your son must grow up to be a soldier, whether the Reserves, the National Guard are called into service; whether conscription, maybe, comes back to take a man from every household; whether great citizen armies shall again man the borders of America's defense; that too, is being fought out by those who have laid their bodies and laid their lives, their hopes and dreams, the love they had for their beloved, in the pathway of Hitler's cruel military machine, as it lumbers ruthlessly on toward the heart of France, the heart of democracy, and the heart of religion.

Whether this Western Hemisphere is to be the land in which men, nourished in the vigorous atmosphere of freedom, shall reach through the persistence of their peaceful pursuits, the greatest heights man has ever reached, almost the hilltop of man's dreams, or whether this hemisphere shall be profaned by the hell of war and preparation for war by the infiltration of "fifth columns" or Trojan horses, by sabotage, by fomented strife, this also, they die for in France tonight. For that, too, will be determined by the hand upon which the dove of victory shall eventually light.

I have spoken no fantasies. I have spoken facts. I have not been a dreamer in seeing these unhappy issues. I have been a realist, speaking as well as I know how, painful, ugly, irresistible fact. Filled as my heart has been with the evil forebodings of the future, if the last democracy except ours is crushed and disarmed and made a Hitler vassal, I have for the last 3 weeks been begging my colleagues in the Senate that we act now to aid the Allies in methods, short of war, to crush Hitler in Europe and to keep the spread of war from America's shores.

Every word I have said, I have said as an American, thinking first and always of my country. If I knew that America could continue to be the America into which you and I were born, the America that we know now, the America in which we had hoped to die, I should not hazard any risk or call upon my colleagues for any action in a war 3,000 miles away, even if it contained an issue dear to the heart of every decent man, woman, and child, for I am not unaware of my duty as a citizen and as a Senator, to think only of my country and its safety, as against the welfare of every other people or person in all the world. But when I know what a terrible ordeal, how much sacrifice of blood from the holy homes of America is being borne on the wings of inexorable Time toward us, if we alone must stand against dictatorship or submit to the mailed fist of Hitler, which shall crush every sentiment we cherish, if it did not take our soil, I should be unworthy of the high office I hold if I did not speak with the earnestness of a troubled heart the convictions which move me.

When the American people thought the American Senate, by unanimous vote, was granting every requested appropriation for the national defense and therefore, was doing all in its power in the most effective way to defend America, I offered a resolution, which said in substance, that the President, as our trusted leader and Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy, should be authorized to sell, at a fair price, for cash, and delivered in this country, to the Allies, such war planes, parts and equipment as could be spared without imperiling our own defense, with the right in the President to replace such stocks from equipment of the same character in the process of construction in the factories of this country for the Allies and which could soon be delivered.

The Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate voted down this resolution 12 to 1. They said it would violate international law. I answered Hitler had murdered international law, as he has murdered the sons of neutral Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Norway, Luxemburg and the unoffending sons of every other victim of his unprovoked aggression. I said that the conscience of the world would not let a man whose hands were bloody with the death of decency the world over claim the benefit of a decent code of conduct prescribed for and by the decent peoples of the world. And I said that the Sir John Simons, the Chamberlains and the Baldwins and all the others who waited and quibbled about legalistic terms bore upon their souls the terrible price their peoples have had to pay for their blindness. And I said further that the one hope there was of international law ever coming back to the councils of men was to strike down the hand of Hitler, who had substituted force for law the world over.

Later I offered an amended form of that resolution, calling attention to the Kellogg Pact, under which Hitler's Germany, the United States of America, Great Britain, France, and other victims of the Nazi invasion in Europe had renounced in solemn terms war as an instrument of national policy, and that if we gave aid, short of war, in the mild form that I had suggested, to our fellow signatories to this solemn pact, against the unprovoked aggressions of another signatory to this reciprocal covenant, we should rather be upholding than breaking down international law and the most sacred form of international agreement-treaties among nations. By this resolution I proposed to allow the President, in his discretion, when he could do so without imperiling the national defense, to sell other instruments of war which might belong to this country to the Allies.

Again the Foreign Relations Committee, by a vote of 19 to 2, struck down this hope.

Finally I proposed yet a third resolution, which is now upon the table in the Senate, in which I called on the Congress to back up, with their confidence and support, the President in exercising the authority that he now has, under existing law, to give aid, short of war, to the Allies by the transfer of airplanes and other war material. Of course, I pointed out the existing law that permitted him to exercise the power which he is now exercising, as all of you know, and knowing, applaud. The President, as Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy, charged with the defense of our country, knows that the best way to strike down danger is where danger is, and that the best way to destroy a tiger is in his lair and not after he springs.

The President knows and you and I know that it takes 4 years to build a battleship, 2 years to build a cruiser or destroyer, 1 year to build a bomber. He knows that to fulfill the obligations of the Monroe Doctrine and to keep the war and the enemy away from the Western Hemisphere we have over 43,000 miles of coast line to defend, from Iceland in the North Atlantic, around the coast of North, Central, and South America to the Horn, and thence along the western shore of our continent to Alaska. He knows that there are two oceans and that our Navy is in the Pacific only.

He knows that a dominant Hitler would not wait for us to establish naval and air bases in South America; for us to mobilize and train a great army for the South American countries; to build armies, navies, air corps, and coast defenses for the Western Hemisphere; to clean out the cancerous "fifth columns" which have eaten into the vitals of every nation on this continent. He knows that it is closer from Africa to the bulge of South America by far than from the United States to the same point; that there is more than fear to sustain the probability that the dictatorships of the world are already working in close and intimate collusion as part of an evil scheme to dominate the wide world.

If we were engaged in war, it would be the duty of our Commander in Chief to use our forces to the best advantage.

Under existing law, therefore, when the President allows the trade-in of an old airplane for a new one of latest design, the exchange of old guns for the newest, he is making the wisest and best use possible of our armament, while at the same time, diminishing the burden of armament upon the back of the taxpayers of the country by the allowance he gets for the older materials.

The President has already taken the action the law allows him in these respects. I imagine tomorrow the Senate will reverberate with criticism against him from those who refuse to see the larger interest of our safety and security.

I have been heartened immensely by the thousands of telegrams, the many more thousands of conscientious letters which have poured in to me and to other Senators from every nook and cranny of our country, from rich and poor, farmer and laborer, man and woman—from the troubled heart of America. I feel in what has come from the homes and factories and the farms of America in this crucial time, a new spirit, a resurgence of the spirit that always lies under the outer crust of the American people. It is the spirit of God-fearing, patriotic men and women who love their church, whatever it be, who love their country and its institutions. I feel something of that same sentiment that moved the pioneers and those who fought not only for liberty in the Revolutionary War, but for freedom in the Civil War, for the deliverance of the Cubans; the spirit of those who fought in the war of 1914 to 1918, when another German military machine, which spoke of treaties as scraps of paper and who aimed at the mastery of the world, raised its ugly head the first time.

The response of our people, and the response I know our people are going to continue to give to the President and to communicate to the Congress, all that I have felt, moves me to breathe the words of that song which has so stirred the devotion of our people, "God Bless America, My Home, Sweet Home."

Sale of Supplies to the Allies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 11 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. ERNEST LUNDEEN, OF MINNESOTA

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD immediately following the address of the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], inserted in the RECORD at the request of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON], the address delivered on the same evening at the Willard Hotel, Washington, D. C., by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. LUNDEEN].

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In October 1939 the repeal of the embargo was debated on the floor of the United States Senate. It was said that the Neutrality Act was helping Hitler—a rather strange statement to be made by administration leaders who wrote the bill and placed it on the statute books.

EMBARGO DEBATE

They said we must repeal the embargo on arms and war materials so that we could be neutral and keep out of war. Yet these same people today who talked about neutrality then are now in consternation and panic over German victories and demand all the arms and ammunition, warships, and guns in our possession for the Allies—a blank check for the use of the world's two greatest empires. A strange brand of neutrality.

While we were debating the acquisition of the island bases on our Atlantic coast last Thursday we learned that the President had taken upon himself the right to furnish fighting planes for his favorites in the second World War.

STRIPS US OF OUR FIGHTING PLANES

In one breath Mr. Roosevelt says that we have no adequate defense and that he needs five or ten billion dollars to provide real defense, and in the next breath he strips us of our fighting planes, guns, and war materials and proposes to send thousands of guns, millions of rifles, and thousands of planes to the dearly beloved King of Great Britain and the Emperor of India.

Let us not be deceived. Damaged, deteriorated, and obsolete war materials are not acceptable to Great Britain, engaged in a death grapple with a scientific military people. The Empire demands the finest and best, most powerful and destructive weapons of war in our possession. Anything less than that is useless and would prove only an encumbrance and lead to sure and certain defeat.

BEST BOMBERS BEING RELEASED TO THE BRITISH KING

I make the charge that our best bombers and our finest aircraft are being released for service to the British King. There is no use to camouflage this bloody business into which we are being led, step by step, into final, total war.

Crusading for war by helping the Allies with everything short of war is sham and camouflage. Short of war means long on war. Short of war puts you into war, involves the Nation in empire intrigues and leads our hopeful youth into the bloody shambles of European battlefields. That is the certain and inevitable tragic end to it all.

WASHINGTON AND NEUTRALITY

George Washington said:

"Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike for another cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side."

These are the words of our first and greatest President. If I have to choose between Roosevelt and Washington, I will follow the advice of the Father of our Country.

Sunday's papers prominently display General Pershing's demand for compulsory military training—that is, conscription. It gives great space to Pershing's demand for unlimited American arms supplies for his Allies of World War days.

He asserted the Allies are "fighting a war for civilization," and are "holding our front line." I take this to mean that unlimited arms sales to the Allies means all the guns, all the ships, all the war planes, all the rifles and ammunition, and other war material the Allies can lay their hands on by means of their own money or by means of credit, which it is now proposed we extend them as we did in the first World War.

UNLIMITED ARMS AND WAR SUPPLIES TO THE ALLIES

If we give unlimited arms and war supplies to the Allies, how are we going to train our own Army. With cornstalks and broomsticks? Is there any Americanism in such a foreign-minded proposal?

Of course, I am not surprised that Sir John J. Pershing, knighted by the King, should make this demand upon America.

The United States cannot afford to give or sell any of its equipment. Army experts point to the shortage of officers, the lack of uniforms, and proper equipment for the American Army. They say we are short of uniforms. Yet it is proposed that we give these supplies to the Allies. We lack shoes, blankets, or even canteens for these men. The Army is short of guns for its own training purposes. "The sale of World War stocks to the Allies has depleted even outmoded supplies." The press reports today that many of our rifles have been recently sold to the Allies. Further than that, these experts say we have not enough military stations to house our conscripts, that there is a shortage in uniforms and tents.

SEVEN BILLION DOLLARS FOR DEFENSE IN 7 YEARS

Then what became of the $7,000,000,000 we appropriated for defense during the last 7 years?

A fine state of American defense. Now Congress is asked by some people to give unlimited supplies to Britain and France. Who is there that places the foreign soldier before the American soldier? Let them speak now before it is too late.

I take it that the Senator from Florida accepts the advice of Mr. Pershing and that he is ready to follow him in unlimited sales to the Allies. By the time these distinguished gentlemen get through with Uncle Sam he will be lucky if he has his shirt left.

If that is an American policy, it is of very recent origin.

The Senator maintains that after Hitler there is no international law, that it is scrapped and we need pay no further attention to treaties or conventions.

AFTER THAT UNCLE SAM WILL HAVE NO GUNS

May I say that after PEPPER Uncle Sam will have no guns, no warships, no ammunition, no airplanes, nor any other war materials—after PEPPER has poured all our defenses into the lap of the British King.

Today's Times-Herald quotes Lord Lothian as follows:

"BRITISH NAVY NEEDS SHIPS—LOTHIAN HINTS AT HEAVY LOSSES

"PITTSBURGH, PA., June 8.—Great Britain, ruler of the seas for centuries, is in need of naval destroyers as well as airplanes for its fight against Germany, Lord Lothian, British Ambassador to the United States, declared here today.

"His admission that England needs destroyers indicated the British Navy may have suffered greater losses than had been revealed previously.

" 'We need ships—naval destroyers—as much as we need planes,' Lord Lothian said in an interview here while en route to Washington, Pa., to address the graduating class of Washington and Jefferson College.

" 'We need guns, too—antiaircraft and machine guns. We lost almost all of our equipment in Flanders and the Germans now have seized many of the French manufacturing plants in the north, around Lille.' "

BRITISH PROPAGANDA—THE "SEVENTH COLUMN"

Now that the British lord hath spoken, it is up to us to comply with ships, naval destroyers, fighting planes, and other war materials. And this member of the British nobility is the commencement speaker at Washington and Jefferson College. Well, it's a good thing that Washington and Jefferson were not there to challenge the power of British propaganda.

And this is all in the name of democracy.

It seems to me that the nations which are referred to as democracies are empires—world-wide, far-flung empires. France is an empire. That empire has been won by conquest and aggression. The swords of the French imperialists are dripping with blood. They have acquired their territory by aggression. That empire extends into Asia, Africa, and America. It is not European alone; it is world-wide. France is an empire won by aggression and war, and everyone knows it, or should know it, and its territory exceeds the territory of the United States by 1,206,000 square miles.

THE FAR-FLUNG EMPIRE OF BRITAIN

The records show that Great Britain extends over 13,302,000 square miles of this earth—more than four times the area and extent of our mighty America. The far-flung empire of Britain, scattered over one-third of this mighty earth, upon which the sun never sets, was won by aggression and war. It was won by bloodshed, won by swords dipped into the blood of nations now enslaved by that empire; and yet we hear Senators and Representatives talk about defending these "democracies." If that be democracy, God save the word!

Anthony Eden said on the state of British democracy in 1928: "We have not got democratic government today. We never had it, and I venture to suggest to honorable members opposite that we shall never have it. What we have done in all the progress of reform and evolution of politics is to broaden the basis of oligarchy."

LET US SAVE DEMOCRACY HERE

We have a democracy here. Let us save that democracy. Let us attend to our own affairs and preserve and protect our own people, including our 12,000,000 unemployed.

If we enter another destructive World War, democracy may disappear from the earth. We may scrap our own institutions. We may ruin the work that our fathers and founders laid down in this country, which they have bequeathed to us, which it is our sacred duty to uphold, and which we are sworn to uphold.

DEFENDING BLOODY AND AGGRESSIVE EMPIRES

I am weary of hearing about defending democracies which are nothing but bloody, aggressive empires, which hold hundreds of millions of enslaved people under their imperial rule. We are still nursing our wounds from the last war "to save the world for democracy." We are still trying feebly to collect billions of unpaid war debts which the debtors solemnly promised to pay but never paid; and yet they have the nerve to come over here to us now and ask us again to defend their democracies—democracies, indeed!

America should not support or adopt any scheme of foreign policy, whether in the form of treaty, alliance, or league, which binds the United States to help maintain or impair the territorial integrity or the social, economic, or political institutions of other countries.

These are the principles which I am firmly convinced furnish our people and our Government the safest and wisest rule of conduct in the present grave emergency. I have full faith that they are the principles approved by the great majority of my fellow citizens. Practically all the Presidents of the United States who have spoken on this subject from 1789 to 1915 have laid down the same principle as the settled rule and guide for America's foreign policy.

LET US PERFECT THIS HAVEN OF LIBERTY

Let one people, one country, one flag, mean just that and nothing more. Let us act for ourselves. Let us perfect this haven of liberty. Proclaim to the nations that we will not serve others; we will not yoke ourselves with kings; we will not stoop before Europeans. We have but one hope, one desire; in our own hearts we place America first.

America first. Write it across the skies. Proclaim it to all the world. Standing here in the midst of a world crisis, we renew our pledge to our own independence, to our own liberty. We defy those who strive to yoke us like oxen in a mill. We serve notice on all foreigners: Hands off our Government. You shall not command us. You shall not control America in this hour. You shall not sacrifice our honor to glut your ambition. You shall not crucify the American people upon a cross of kings.

Why I Am An American

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. KING

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 11 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. J. REUBEN CLARK, JR.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am in receipt of a letter from Hon. Chauncey P. Overfield, secretary of the Utah Society of the Sons of the American Revolution, who is one of the leading citizens of Salt Lake City, in my State, enclosing a copy of an address delivered over station KSL, Salt Lake City, Utah, on May 29 last by Hon. J. Reuben Clark, Jr., former Ambassador from the United States to Mexico, on the subject Why I Am An American.

I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Clark's address may be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am an American because I believe in a government of laws and not of men, and in a national allegiance to high principle and lofty ideal instead of to a personal sovereign.

I am an American because I believe in a government with three distinct, separate branches, each mutually independent of the other, with no power of delegation or appropriation of rights or powers by any one to or from any other.

I am an American because I believe that government "must derive its just powers from the consent of the governed" and that branches of government and officers shall have such powers and such only as shall be given by the people; because I believe that the assumption by branches of government or by officers of rights or powers not specifically conferred upon them is usurpation; and because impeachment or other trial lies against any officer who so usurps rights or powers not specifically conferred.

I am an American because I believe in the greatest possible measure of self-government and because I believe in a federal system of government which keeps local affairs in the hands of local governments.

I am an American because I believe in a bill of rights which places wholly beyond the reach of lawful government certain matters affecting "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," and specifically the right of freedom of conscience and worship, the right of free speech and a free press, the right peaceably to assemble and petition government, and the right to gain and hold property without molestation except by due process of law.

I am an American because under our form of government the people of the United States have made a progress never before made by any other people in the world in an equal time during the whole period of recorded history.

I am an American because standards of life and of living of the entire American people are far beyond those enjoyed by any other people in any other part of the world, either now or at any other time, which is a living testimony and evidence of the kindly beneficence of our free institutions.

I am an American because this Nation has no scheme or plan of conquest, because it has a respect for the rights of other peoples and of other nations, because it promotes justice and honor in the relationships of nations, because it loves the ways of peace as against war, as shown by the repeated peaceful adjustment of its own international disputes, because it has conquered the land greed which so afflicts the nations of the world, as demonstrated in Cuba and the Philippines.

I am an American because my country abolished slavery after it had become deep-rooted and because men still are free to work, and are secure in the enjoyment of the products of their labor.

I am an American because I firmly and earnestly believe that the Constitution is an inspired document designed by our Maker to set up a government which would make sure and secure the rights set forth in the Bill of Rights, and particularly the right of freedom of conscience and worship.

I am an American because I believe that the destiny of America is to be the abiding place of liberty and free institutions, and that its own practice and enjoyment of these blessings shall be to the world a beacon light which shall radiate its influence by peaceful means to the uttermost parts of the world, to the uplifting of all humanity.

Connecticut Democratic State Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS T. MALONEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 11 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. FRANCIS T. MALONEY, OF CONNECTICUT

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a brief address which I made at the Democratic State Convention held in Hartford, Conn., on June 3, as I accepted renomination as a candidate for reelection to the United States Senate.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

With a feeling of gratitude that is beyond my gift of expression, and a feeling of humility that I cannot and will not attempt to explain, I accept the nomination as a candidate for United States Senator. If there is a way that I can properly show my appreciation of your confidence and friendship, it seems to me that I may best do it by my conduct in the coming campaign and in the Congress, if I am reelected. With a continuation of your cooperation, and the assistance of the people of our State, whom I have some reason to believe approve my record, I am confident of reelection. I renew my request for your help, and I ask the support of every man and woman in Connecticut who believes that I have the qualities and the experience and character that are so necessary to men who serve in the greatest legislative body in the world.

I shall not now review my record as a Member of Congress, but shall do it as occasion provides the opportunity in the days ahead. With my record I am not completely satisfied, because it always seems that we should be doing more—but of my record I am proud, for there is not a thing I have done that I would now undo, nor a vote I have cast that I would now recall.

I continue to have the same great pride in the leadership of President Roosevelt that I had when that leadership saved the Republic in the financial and economic panic in 1933.

I likewise have a pride in the accomplishments of our party during these long and uncertain years, and, while we have made mistakes, I am confident that we have those qualifications of leadership so vital in these days of world-wide darkness.

We are about to enter upon a political campaign that will call for the best that men possess. The seriousness of the times demands an especial care of what we say, for of greater importance than our political success is the need for a national unity of purpose. Fulfillment of that need requires a self-discipline and fairness and toleration. The campaign should be contested upon the record and devoid of animosity and personalities. On my record I am willing to rest my case.

Several years ago, when first nominated for public office, I stated in a speech of acceptance that I had no greater hope or ambition than that my public service would reflect a credit upon myself and my family and those who voted for me. From that day until this hour there has been no increase or lessening of my ambition.

Men elected to public office must ever be mindful that their duty is to all of the people, and that in the Congress men are the representatives of every person within their constituencies. I have never for a moment neglected that thought or duty, and without hesitancy I respectfully ask for the support of all of the people of my State who feel that I have the qualifications which they believe are necessary in their Representatives at Washington.

Taking the oath of a Senator seems to bring a humility that is complete, and is a solemn reminder of a tremendous responsibility. And now—as I approach the end of my term—I am not only willing, but anxious, that those who oppose us, or whoever opposes me, open the record and call the roll.

I shall ask that he or they point out what was wrong or what he or they would do differently. I shall ask if there is a man or a group or class on whom I cast disfavor or for whom I showed especial favor. My references are the working people of my State—be they the people on the farm or in the factory—and the manufacturers, and the bankers, and the veterans, and those who temporarily know or have known the distress of unemployment. I offer these references with confidence because I have endeavored to meet the obligations of my trust without a thought to race or creed or color or politics. I very clearly understand that the people of my State have given me an honor that comes to few men in any generation, and in my effort to convince them of my appreciation I have been unable to find enough hours in any day. If I am reelected—and I expect to be—I shall ask God's continuing help and direction in a work that is difficult at best—and impossible without His help.

In this brief and simple speech of acceptance I make little mention of politics and less of issues. I shall endeavor to be temperate and careful and fair in what I have to say in the months ahead. Indeed, much of what men now say will be drowned by the thunder of war. We are living in compartments of days, and no political opinion can be firmly fixed, no suggestion or fear can be regarded as too fantastic, and no idea scorned. Men seeking public office must pretty much be judged by their past and their record—as Patrick Henry declared "the future must be judged."

It is my opinion that in an hour of world crisis and peril it might be dangerous to "take" men who are untried and who have given no evidence of their industry, integrity, and judgment.

We are living in one of the saddest periods of history. In the years just behind us we witnessed the horsemen of distress and despair in the form of dust storms, hurricane, drought, and flood. As a powerful Government we went to the aid of those afflicted, just as we went to the aid of those affected by unemployment and sickness and otherwise in great need. By so doing we strengthened our national honor and brightened our national armor.

In the effort to do good the shock troops of righteousness sometimes trespassed on posted land. In the embargoes against unfair practices a little harm accompanied great good, but out of the experiences we grew stronger and we came to know each other better. A little while ago we had supposed the worst was behind us and that we were approaching social and economic tranquillity.

And then, out of the eastern and the western skies, came the crack of guns and the smoke clouds of war. The world rushed into a period of madness that has brought tens of thousands of orphaned children and another generation of broken-hearted widows and gold-star mothers. We find much of the world about us torn by paganism and barbarism, and lighted only by flashing guns and burning homes. Hate has magnified, and, paradoxical as it seems, love has intensified. This war is the opposite of the way of life which God directed, but God gave men an irrevocable free will and the charge to work out their salvation.

I cannot believe, and I don't believe, that this is the end of religious civilization. I want to believe, and I do believe, that we are more likely witnessing the beginning of the end of world madness. These men of ignoble ambition and with a lust for power will one day find their worlds come crashing about them.

Amidst all of the sadness and misery and the seemingly endless sorrow and despair stands the United States—the last great and powerful dwelling place or light and understanding. It seems that we are about to be called upon to lead the way back, though how or when we shall do it only God yet knows. We do know that we must be strong—that none will dare insult or attack us—and so strong that we can destroy any that might be that crazily ambitious. Not only must our arms and our Army be sufficiently strong, but we must be spiritually strong and completely united. Hatred must be banished and misunderstanding erased. Each of us must have the help of each other, and all of us must have the help of God.

As a nation we have earned the right to peace, and we have been taught to love and respect peace-loving people. Those in distress and suffering torture and terror have a moral call on such aid as we can give them without sacrificing our own people. There is a call to defend God's teachings and the dignity of man. May God give us the strength to hold high the torch of liberty and hold forth a strong arm of help.

May we ever be mindful of the sacrifices and the lessons of our own founding fathers and never forgetful that for us liberty is sweeter than life itself. May we ever cherish the ideals and institutions and traditions of the early patriots who made it possible for ours to be a great and powerful nation. May we keep faith with them. May God bless America.

Nomination of Hon. Francis T. Maloney

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DAVID I. WALSH
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, June 11 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY RICHARD JOYCE SMITH NOMINATING SENATOR MALONEY FOR REELECTION

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Richard Joyce Smith, a distinguished Connecticut lawyer, at the recent Democratic State Convention in Connecticut, in nominating the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY] for reelection.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We Democrats of Connecticut have come together at a time of utmost gravity. It is impossible for us to enter upon the deliberations of this convention without giving heed to the difficulties and dangers our country faces. The stirring message of the distinguished leader of the Senate uttered here last night has made a profound impression. We recognize our duty as Americans. We accept also our responsibility as the party in whose hands has been entrusted the Government of the country. Let us resolve to keep faith with our fellow citizens. Let us establish within our own ranks a united front, bent only upon achieving all necessary measures for the defense of the Nation and the preservation of our people's freedom.

As the party at the helm in these critical days, ours is a gigantic responsibility. But we have much to work with. Within the past 8 years we have reconstructed the spirit of our own people. The state of the Nation would have been less secure today but for the courageous leadership of our great and able President, Franklin D. Roosevelt. He alone among the statesmen of the world has properly appraised the growing forces of aggression, and it has been through his clear insight and his resolute will to act that during the past 8 years the foundation for the new program of defense has been laid.

Behind him, in support of him, and with him for renomination and reelection, a solid phalanx of citizens once more is forming throughout the land. We of Connecticut join that phalanx today.

Connecticut Democrats owe a special duty to the President at this time. The part that our State must play in the new program for national defense is vital. The genius of our people for precise craftsmanship and the highly developed industries which our skilled artisans have made possible constitute in many ways the key to the program. If Connecticut fails the President's objectives may not be attained. We must make certain, therefore, that Connecticut's important functions shall be prosecuted in full harmony and in complete accord with the patriotic aims of the national administration.

Because of this new task, it is fortunate that we had already determined to nominate our candidate for the Senate at this spring convention. We now have an opportunity to exhibit an early and a continuing solidarity; to begin our campaign at once and to prosecute it with unremitting vigor for victory in the fall—victory not only for our own party, but victory for a leadership in our Government that will insure strength and enlightenment for our national undertakings.

With these grave problems facing us, with the eyes of the country watching the response that Connecticut is to make to the President's call, I rise with pride and with confidence to renominate our able senior Senator, FRANCIS MALONEY, of Meriden.

What is it that entitles a public official to a renewed expression of the voters' confidence? What is it in a man that warrants his role as lawmaker in a democratic country? Certainly during these critical times no one should be retained in office as a matter of course.

The tests, so it seems to me, are basically three:

First. The candidate must be a thoroughgoing American. His mind and his heart must be imbued with an abiding faith in our country. He must be a courageous patriot, prepared to take an irrevocable stand against any force whether from within or from without our borders which may threaten the life of the Nation or the sacred principles of American liberty.

FRANCIS MALONEY preeminently meets that test.

Second. By his public acts and his private life, the candidate must have demonstrated that he is a man of honor, a man of the strongest moral fiber, a man in whose breast unceasingly beats the resolute determination to be honest.

FRANCIS MALONEY preeminently meets that test.

And Third. By his record, by his accomplishments, and by his convictions steadfastly held, the candidate must have demonstrated not only his ability and his conscientious sense of duty, but also his understanding of the needs and aspirations of those whom he represents.

FRANCIS MALONEY preeminently meets that test.

The love of country, the devotion to the principles of free government which the career of FRANK MALONEY exemplifies are not to be described by high-sounding words or flamboyant phrases; those qualities of patriotism are too much a part of the man himself. Every person who has had occasion to discuss problems of government with our senior Senator knows, as I know, that in each issue he has been called upon to face, his first and his last concern has been the ultimate welfare of his Nation and his State. With courage, with determination, even when expediency has seemed to point another way, he has held firmly to the course dictated by his patriotic conscience. Such is the man whom we Connecticut Democrats may proudly offer to the Nation's service in this hour when Americanism must be, above all other things, resolute and courageous.

I need not dwell long before this convention on the personal character of FRANCIS MALONEY. In every act and deed of his public and private life his character is eloquently portrayed. You may go back to his own city of Meriden, as I have done, you may talk with people of all stations of life—those who knew him as a boy, working hard to help his family—those who knew him in the Navy during the World War—those who have been associated with him in business—those who have been for him and those who have opposed him in his political career—and to all of them the name of FRANCIS MALONEY is an honored and a respected name.

Integrity and rectitude may be virtues with their own compensations—certainly FRANCIS MALONEY was a man of character long before he entered public life. But I say to you that in these days, when representative government is facing criticisms and questions not hitherto known, it behooves us Americans to consider well the kind of man we propose to place in office. On this score, our senior Senator stands forth without a blemish.

So I come again to the final test of the nomination I propose. FRANCIS MALONEY has been a Member of Congress for 8 years—2 years as Representative from the Third District, and 6 years in his present term as Senator. He took his first congressional oath at a time when this Nation was reaping the disaster that followed years of reactionary government. At that time he pledged himself to serve the people, and not the special interests. He has been true to that pledge. He has worked hard and continuously for legislation designed to improve the condition of the underprivileged, to help those who have suffered most from the economic upheavals of this generation, and to aid organized labor in the attainment of its just status in our industrial society. We have gone far during the past 8 years toward a realization of these sound objectives of Government, and our own Senator's contributions have been among the best. Eight years ago FRANCIS MALONEY was a champion of social reform. He remains a champion of social reform today. Eight years ago he was a friend of labor. He remains a friend of labor today. Eight years ago, 10 years ago, 12 years ago FRANCIS MALONEY was a liberal in Government. He is a liberal today, and 6 years hence he still will be a liberal.

These are important considerations. We must be on our guard lest the present emergency be seized upon by some groups to wreck the liberal program our party has initiated. We stand with President Roosevelt. FRANCIS MALONEY stands squarely with the President on the proposition that the new program for national defense can be carried out promptly without surrendering one essential part of any of the major laws our liberal Congress has enacted.

The position which FRANCIS MALONEY has won among his colleagues in the Senate and members of the Executive Department in Washington reflects honor and credit upon Connecticut. A careful student of legislation, an accomplished parliamentarian, and an eloquent speaker, his advice and counsel have been continuously in demand. He has been chosen for some of the most important and difficult subcommittees of the Senate. His work in those capacities has been pursued with unflagging energy and with unsurpassed effectiveness. The admiration and esteem in which he is held in Washington today are testimony of his brilliant career as Connecticut's Senator. His popularity among all his colleagues shows that they, like those of us who have known him at home, are readily won by his innate sincerity, his sense of fair play and his remarkable attribute of kindness.

But if Senator MALONEY has gone far in Washington, he has not done so at sacrifice of the problems of his own constituents. Most of the delegates at this convention know personally of his willingness to serve and his readiness to understand.

Probably no other Senator from Connecticut during a single term has done as much as he for the cities, the towns, and the individual citizens of the State. He remains a Connecticut man—a native son whose own life and own interests have been so intimately attached to Connecticut people, Connecticut places, and Connecticut institutions that he will always have a common touch with his fellow citizens here. He knows instinctively what they feel and what they strive for. He is bound to them by a loyalty rooted deep in his heart.

This, then, is the man I nominate—a courageous Connecticut patriot, an honorable gentleman, a friend of his fellow citizens, an able and enlightened statesman.

America faces the future with an anxious heart. No one dares contemplate how drastic may be the needed action during the next few years to defend our Nation and to preserve our liberties. Let us place strong and able men in the seats of our National Government—men of courage, men of action, men with clear heads and understanding hearts—men like FRANCIS MALONEY.

Our stalwart President Roosevelt needs the best that Connecticut can give him for the tasks that lie ahead. Connecticut's first service to him is to return FRANCIS MALONEY to the Senate. The President needs Senator MALONEY. He will be heartened to know that we of his party in Connecticut are united in our determination to renominate and reelect our senior Senator.

My fellow delegates, in a few hours this convention will have moved on into the glorious annals and the great traditions of our party. Before we meet again in the spring of an election year mighty tides in the affairs of mankind will have risen and receded, momentous events in the history of our Nation and our State will have taken place. Let us make certain that the record of this convention will be written in terms of a unified and enlightened understanding of our responsibilities.

Because we hold firmly and irrevocably to the principles of government for which the Democratic Party stands, we believe that a Democratic victory in the fall is essential to the happy outcome of the trials ahead. We believe this, not selfishly, not arrogantly, not because we ourselves want power, but because we are convinced that a government under the Democratic Party will have the healthy support of the common people of America, without which no government can survive a crisis. For that victory, for the people's victory, I give you as the leader in Connecticut our Senator and our friend, FRANCIS MALONEY.

Mr. Chairman, with the affection of deep friendship and with the pride of a Connecticut citizen, I nominate as Democratic candidate for United States Senator FRANCIS MALONEY, of Meriden.

Achievements of F. B. I.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 11 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

LETTER BY PAUL S. ANDREWS

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter to the editor of the New York Times by Mr. Paul S. Andrews, of Syracuse University, under date of May 15, 1940, and which letter was published in the New York Times on May 19, 1940, entitled "Achievements of F. B. I.—Americans Found to Owe Debt of Gratitude to Bureau."

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ACHIEVEMENTS OF F. B. I.—AMERICANS FOUND TO OWE DEBT OF GRATITUDE TO BUREAU

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

I should be grateful for space to say a word not so much in defense as in praise of J. Edgar Hoover and the Federal Bureau of Investigation. The Bureau under his leadership deserves the deep gratitude of decent Americans, of fathers and mothers no longer ridden by the fear of kidnaping, of banks and their thousands of customers and depositors. Since Congress gave the Bureau charge of bank robbery cases, this type of crime has been reduced about 75 percent, and as a result bank robbery insurance rates have been lowered between 30 and 40 percent in various States.

Businessmen and individuals, the potential victims of gangsters of the Dillinger type, should be glad that the Dillingers have found that robbery with violence is neither safe nor healthful. Prosecutors throughout the country and local police departments get big dividends from the fact that the Bureau of Investigation in its technical laboratory is using, and makes available to all, up-to-the-minute methods of crime detection. In its identification division, too, with nearly 12,000,000 fingerprints, it has the world's most effective means for the identification of criminals.

Its National Police Academy, training selected local police officers and sending them home again, has made instruction in modern crime detection methods available to nearly a hundred thousand police officers throughout the country. Still more, the Bureau, by cooperating in the inauguration of 183 police training schools in the United States, has served as a clearing house for information, services, and assistance in police training.

PERCENTAGE OF CONVICTIONS

Decent men and women everywhere who care deeply that the law shall be enforced, feel safer because the Bureau has been so thorough and efficient, and at the same time so fair, that out of every 100 persons taken into court by it and charged with crime, 96 have been convicted.

It has been stated, and I believe not contradicted, that no breath of scandal has touched the Bureau. Out of 52,000 convictions obtained by it in the courts, not one has been reversed for any alleged violation of civil liberties in the course of the investigation. Not one has been reversed on any charge of brutality, of third-degree tactics, of cruel or inhuman treatment.

On April 4 the United States Attorneys' Association passed a resolution praising Mr. Hoover and the Federal Bureau of Investigation for its fair and efficient investigations, for the valuable training and crime statistics, services provided to other law-enforcement agencies, for its high standards of ethics and conduct, and for its high regard for the preservation of civil liberties.

Last, but by no means least, of the Bureau's achievements is the fact that nowadays when our American children play "cops and robbers," every little boy wants to take the part not, as in the old days, of the robber but of a G-man.

OPPOSITION IS ACTIVE

There are powerful groups interested in crippling the Bureau. Mr. Hoover stated on April 18 that in the previous week the Communist Party of America issued orders for concerted action against the F. B. I., urging attempts to involve F. B. I. agents in situations where they might be accused of crime or improper activity. Every kidnaper, racketeer, gangster, dope peddler, secret foreign agent, would be glad to cripple it. Its work against these gentry will never be finished until we reach Utopia.

Not everyone realizes that in America 1 out of every 26 persons has been arrested for an offense more serious than a traffic violation; that every 21 seconds there occurs a murder, an aggravated assault, a burglary, a car theft, a robbery, or larceny. Not everyone knows that in this year of 1940 it is probable that in 1 out of every 17 homes crime will be a visitor—either some member will be charged with an offense or will have suffered a loss through crime.

Moreover, in September 1939 the Bureau was designated as a clearing agency for the investigation of espionage, sabotage, and other subversive activities. For 5 years before 1938 the F. B. I. investigated an average of 35 espionage cases a year. In the 12 months of 1938 there were 250 such cases; in 1939 the total had grown to 1,651 new cases. On March 14, 1940, Senator REYNOLDS stated in the Senate that the Bureau was then receiving 250 such complaints a day.

The Bureau does not shrink from fair and factual criticism. It welcomes it. But to have it crippled by the underground activities of criminal termites would amount to a calamity.

PAUL SHIPMAN ANDREWS.

Youth and Our Foreign Affairs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANTON J. JOHNSON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 11, 1940

Mr. JOHNSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, on last evening the President said in his address to the Nation:

Again today the young men and the young women of America ask themselves with earnestness and with deep concern this same question—what is to become of the country we know?

The youth of America is bewildered. We are all bewildered. On Friday, June 7, Robert Coddington, a Moline high-school honor student, delivered a most interesting commencement address. His subject was Youth and Our Foreign Affairs. It was most interesting to me because it represents the voice of one who might become cannon fodder in an unjustifiable war, or a patriot in a war of defense. As I interpret this speech, it is a plea for us of mature years to do nothing rash, but he is with us, rash or right.

Hang the expenses and taxes. We can pay them or invent "phony" money—but only God can make a Robert Coddington. Part of the speech of Robert Coddington on the subject of Youth and Our Foreign Affairs is as follows:

Undoubtedly one of the most important problems that must be faced by the youth of America—in fact, everyone in America—is that of our foreign policy.

The present generation was brought up in the colorful post-war period so recently ended, and to use a figure of speech, "Took its foreign affairs and funny papers in the same glance."

There is certainly no problem as to arousing public interest in our foreign policies today. The question is one of considering situations, aims, and means and confining the three effectively to steer the United States along any course it is deemed desirable to follow—and it is a question that America's youth must eventually answer.

But now let us examine the accomplishments of our elders regarding foreign affairs.

To begin with, it might be an excellent idea to find out just what our foreign concerns are. In a general sense there are three: First, defense, which consists in the protection of our shores, our nationals, and our property; second, trade and investment, which cover all our monetary and business transactions with the rest of the world; third, sentiment, which might be defined in this case as our unforgotten affiliations with the old countries and our national prejudices.

These three factors and associated problems provide considerable employment for Mr. Hull's State Department and are unavoidably dealt with according to two general rules which have been established by the American people through the course of our existence. They are: First, the Monroe Doctrine, which forbids any further territorial penetration into the Western Hemisphere by any European or Asiatic power; and secondly, a general isolation policy, which has as its basic idea, "Keep out of foreign entanglements and foreign wars."

As the result of popular demand for adherence to these principles our entire foreign policy, present and past, can be included under the head of one or the other; and they constitute precisely all our ancestors have bequeathed us in the way of established policy. On the general premise of noninterference—the United States with regard to Europe and Asia—has our Nation been built.

Now, how are these policies working today? Are they adequate to our needs? Do they express our real aims and desires? Those are pertinent thoughts and they lead us to consideration. Sticking to our original divisions, for the sake of clarity, let us find out what there is to be said for the Monroe Doctrine.

Now, this principle applies primarily to the Western Hemisphere. Adopted first as a defense measure against Europe, it has come to mean not only that but the United States' domination of Latin America and Canada through investments, trade, and the Navy. It has resulted in the establishment of naval bases as far east as the Philippine Islands and the construction of one of the greatest fleets in the world—for not only the protection of our own coasts but for the protection of North and South America and all the lands between.

The last two administrations have softened the military aspects of the situation by the adoption of a good-neighbor policy which strives to promote understanding, better trade relations, and cooperation through our bailiwick by the use of the helping hand. Loans, advice, and reciprocal trade agreements have all helped to better our interhemisphere relations enormously and to increase our trade balance to a not inconsiderable degree. At least Latin America does not seem to consider our domination as too unpalatable; and that is the main value of the good-neighbor policy.

There, in short, is the Monroe Doctrine of 1940. It secures us the riches of the Western Hemisphere. It is enforced by a mighty Navy which renders a foreign attack most doubtful. It provides security, protection, peace, prosperity for the United States.

What thinks the youth of America? The youth of America only hope that they may continue the intelligent and adequate maintenance of this Doctrine. And now—consider the other policy of isolation. Since the start of the latest European war the United States has been in the position of "interested neutral." We have forbidden our ships to traffic in belligerent waters, withdrawn war protection from Americans in war zones, and adopted a cash-and-carry neutrality arrangement which compels belligerents to pay cash for munitions and supplies and to transport them in their own ships. We have definitely refused to loan any more money to the world in general until past debts are settled. In short the United States appears to be "going to sit this one out." Congress caps the climax of 20 years of isolation begun at Versailles in 1920 by quietly reaffirming our continued intentions in that direction. The Nation's vast majority nod in perfect accord. We, in the United States, intend to remain strictly neutral in this second World War.

The youth of America is one with its elders in this desire to keep our Nation at peace. But there is a question in youth's mind—a doubt. Our studies have shown us clearly what happened in America just before our entrance into the last war—that sudden growth of war fever. Might it not happen again? There is every reason to suppose it might and, ladies and gentlemen, the question is put squarely to you as our elders—our leaders and guides.

The United States is in such a position from the standpoint of defense and sufficiency that war need never come—unless we desire it. And you, ladies and gentlemen, representing our citizenry will be responsible for any course we may follow as far as this war is concerned. Youth can do little or nothing. We will share your views—as we are part of you—and we will go as did our fathers in 1917 if you command it. You have educated us to consider the United States worth fighting for. But it is our plea that you will be very cool and calm and careful in the trying times to come—that you will think—and if you send us—you will do it in a cause worthy of America's future.

Remember youth must carry on after you have gone. Our Nation literally depends on your reactions to world events.

In conclusion, one can say that the youth of America believe that the past and present generations of American citizens have done a pretty decent job as regards our foreign affairs. We have prosperity, national security, and peace—the things the rest of the world are fighting for today—and have prepared and are preparing ourselves to keep them. We may chose our own course, but youth hopes and prays that the decisions our elders make for these troubled times will be the right ones for America.

We ask you again to give America's world problems your closest and most intelligent consideration.

Mr. EDWIN A. HALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from a recent issue of the Stamford (N. Y.) Mirror-Recorder:

[From the Stamford (N. Y.) Mirror-Recorder]

THE "FIFTH COLUMN"

One finds frequent mention in the press today of "fifth column" activities.

If there is a "fifth column" in the United States, where is it, and what is it? How does a "fifth column" operate?

"Fifth columns" got their name from an incident in the Spanish Civil War. A Franco general told of four columns of troops marching on Madrid, and referred to a "fifth column" of civilians in the city who would rise to aid the troops. Since then "fifth columns" have developed in Norway, in Holland and Belgium, in England and France.

MARTIN DIES, chairman of the Dies committee, tried for 2 years to convince the people of this country that groups within it were seeking destruction of their Government. This Member of Congress dug up evidence, paraded that evidence before the Nation, and sought action against subversive groups. His reward was given in the form of sarcastic criticism by President Roosevelt, ridicule by New Dealers, and an effort to eliminate the appropriation for his committee.

Today, however, President Roosevelt feels differently about Congressman DIES and his efforts. The President has just let newspapermen know that it is from the Dies committee that evidence of "fifth column" activity in the United States comes to light. Mr. Roosevelt is much concerned with that activity and wants something done about it. The Justice Department, through Attorney General Jackson, is asking Congress to give it jurisdiction over the immigration service so that G-men can keep a closer watch on aliens. The Attorney General proposes registration of all aliens. He wants registration of every privately owned firearm in the Nation.

For success of "fifth column" effort, according to members of the Dies committee, three conditions are necessary: (1) The presence of propaganda agents reporting directly to a foreign government; (2) an organized body of supporters, augmented by a larger unorganized group of sympathizers who will give aid or fight suppression of the "fifth column"; and (3) indifference of the country under attack to "fifth column" activities during the initial phase of their operation. All of these conditions have been present in the United States.

The Dies committee found Communists reporting directly to Moscow and under the control of the Russian Government. It found German Nazi representatives here paid by and reporting to the German Government. It found organized Communist groups in some large labor unions. It found Fascist adherents working within employer ranks, creating fears of labor and selling the idea that fascism would be preferable to democracy, because it offered a way to bring workers under strong Government discipline. Both in Spain and Norway, on the basis of available evidence, "fifth column" activity was centered in groups other than labor. The committee also found plenty of indifference on the part of this country to "fifth column" activities.

The "fifth column" here, as visioned by Mr. Roosevelt and the Justice Department, is not made up of spies. Rather it is made up of propagandists, of groups of sympathizers with other forms of government, of groups interested in fomenting racial hatred of sectional differences or class antagonisms. The aim of these groups, the President asserts, "is to create confusion of counsel, public indecision, political paralysis, and, eventually, a state of panic." As a result of these new techniques, armament programs may be dangerously delayed. Singleness of national purpose may be undermined. Men can lose confidence in each other, and therefore in the efficacy of their own united action.

The recognized problem in this country is to keep disruptive elements under control without abolishing or limiting too severely the essential personal liberties.

Post-War Writers and Pre-War Readers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 11 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. ARCHIBALD MacLEISH

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a speech delivered by Hon. Archibald MacLeish before the American Association for Adult Education, in New York City, entitled "Post-War Writers and Pre-War Readers."

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Two facts bearing upon the educational influence of the writer are worthy of present notice. The first is the attitude toward the contemporary crisis of the young generation in America. The second is the responsibility for that attitude of the writers of the generation to which I belong.

Much has been said of the attitude of the young generation—some of it critical, some of it in explanation. Certain journalists, irritated by the unwillingness of the young generation to see the world as they see it, have gone so far as to accuse that generation of cowardice or of indifference. These comments can be dismissed. You cannot indict a generation of cowardice, even where there is evidence of cowardice, and here there is none.

The essential characteristic of the attitude of the young generation in America is neither indifference nor lack of courage, either physical or moral. It is something very different—something John Chamberlain put with precision in the New Republic 5 months ago: "If I have the right to generalize from talking with 120 boys and girls in 4 widely separated regions and cities beyond the Alleghenies," wrote Mr. Chamberlain, "I should say that we have a younger generation which needs none of Mr. Stuart Chase's semantic discipline. The boys and girls tend to distrust all slogans, all tags—even all words." The characteristic of the attitude of the young generation which most disturbs their elders is their distrust not only of all slogans and all tags, but even of all words—their distrust, that is to say, of all statements of principle and conviction, all declarations of moral purpose.

Whether or not even so distinguished a journalist as Mr. Chamberlain was justified in generalizing from his conversations with four groups of boys and girls I do not undertake to say. I can only testify that within my own experience Mr. Chamberlain's statement would seem to have been true at the time when he made it and to be still true today. Denmark, Norway, Holland, Belgium, and the retreat to the channel may have demonstrated to young men and young women in America that the question is not whether we will choose to join or not to join the Allies—that the real question is whether the thing which has strangled the Allies will also strangle us, and when and what we can do about it. But the profound distrust of words and of principles which Mr. Chamberlain found last fall would still seem to characterize a considerable part of the young generation today.

That is one fact. It is a sobering fact. To my way of thinking, it is a more sobering fact than our lack of planes, our lack of antiaircraft guns, our inability to manufacture in adequate quantities an adequate automatic rifle, or any of the other weaknesses in our physical preparation. If the young generation in America is distrustful of all words, distrustful of all moral judgments of better and worse, then it is incapable of using the only weapon with which fascism can be fought—the moral conviction that fascism is evil and that a free society of free men is worth fighting for. If all words are suspect, all judgments "phony," all convictions of better and worse fake, then there is nothing real and permanent for which men are willing to fight, and the moral and spiritual unpreparedness of the country is worse than its unpreparedness in arms. For fascism, we will do well to recall, is not merely a superior mechanization of arms or a superior production of superior airplanes. Fascism is also a faith which is no less powerful because it is a negative faith in obedience, in discipline, in brutality, in death. A free people cannot fight fascism unless it believes with even greater conviction that freedom is good and that slavery is evil—that freedom is good and can be attained and that slavery is evil and can be opposed. A free people, because it is a free people, will permit the free expression of all opinions. But unless it reserves to itself the right to believe, and to believe with all its force, that freedom is worth having and worth keeping, it cannot keep its freedom long.

That is one fact. The second fact is this—that a large part of the responsibility for this state of mind in the generation of men and women now young belongs to the writers—belongs specifically to the best and most sensitive and most persuasive writers—of my generation who created in many minds this distrust not only of the tags, not only of the slogans, but of the words themselves. The war books of men like Barbusse, Latzko, Dos Passos, Ford Madox Ford, Ernest Hemingway, Erich Maria Remarque, and Richard Aldington were not only books written against the hatefulness and cruelty and filthiness of war. They were also books filled with passionate contempt for the statements of conviction, of purpose, and of belief on which the war of 1914–18 was fought. And they left behind them in many minds the conclusion that not only the war and the war issues but all issues, all moral issues, were false—were fraudulent—were intended to deceive. You can open the pages anywhere and find this.

Here is Dos Passos in a novel which became part of the essential experience of an entire generation—Three Soldiers: "So was civilization nothing but a vast edifice of sham, and the war, instead of its crumbling, was its fullest and most ultimate expression. Oh, but there must be something more in the world than greed and hatred and cruelty. Were they all shams, too, these gigantic phrases that floated like gaudy kites high above mankind? Kites, that was it, contraptions of tissue paper held at the end of a string, ornaments not to be taken seriously."

Here is Ernest Hemingway in one of the finest novels of our time, A Farewell to Arms: "I was always embarrassed by the words 'sacred,' 'glorious,' and 'sacrifice,' and the expression 'in vain.' We had heard them, sometimes standing in the rain almost out of earshot, so that only the shouted words came through, and had read them, on proclamations that were slapped up by billposters over other proclamations, now for a long time, and I had seen nothing sacred, and the things that were glorious had no glory and the sacrifices were like the stockyards at Chicago if nothing was done with the meat except to bury it."

These are the honest words of honest men; of writers of great skill, integrity, and devotion. They say what all of us after the war would have said if we could. They say what all of us who were in the war believed. But they are nevertheless words which have borne bitter and dangerous fruit.

For the inevitable and natural effect of these words upon the generation which read them in childhood was bound to be the effect we now witness. That generation was inoculated against any attempt in its own country by its own leaders to foment a war by shouting rhetorical phrases or waving moral flags. But it was left defenseless before an aggressor ready to force war upon us. Above all, it was left defenseless against an aggressor whose cynicism, whose brutality, and whose stated intention to enslave presented the issue of the future in moral terms—in terms of conviction, and belief. To suspect not only the tags, not only the slogans, but "even all words" is to stand disarmed and helpless before an aggressor whose strength consists precisely in destroying respect for the law, respect for morality, and respect for the Word.

The post-war writers whose work educated a generation to believe that all declarations, all beliefs are fraudulent, that all statements of conviction are sales talk, that nothing men can put into words is worth fighting for, and that there is a low-down to everything—those writers must face the fact that the books they wrote in the years just after the war have done more to disarm democracy in the face of fascism than any other single influence. Many of them have written other books since. Some of them—men like Hemingway and Dos Passos—have devoted themselves to the fight against fascism with all their talents and all their courage. But the fact nevertheless remains.

I ask leave to point out that I am not undertaking to judge these writers. I have no right to judge them. And if I did my hands would be tied because I felt as they did and wrote, insofar as I was able, as they were writing. But I do undertake to maintain that what they wrote, however noble it may have been as literature, however true to them as a summary of their personal experience, was disastrous as education for a generation which would be obliged to face the threat of fascism in its adult years.

What the moral may be, if there is a moral, I shall not attempt to say. Perhaps writers, having so great a responsibility to the future, must not weaken the validity of the word even when the deceptions of the word have injured them. Perhaps the luxury of the complete confession, the uttermost despair, the farthest doubt should be denied themselves by writers living in any but the most orderly and settled times. I do not know. But this I think I do know: That unless we regain in this democracy the conviction that there are final things for which democracy will fight, unless we recover a faith in the expression of these things in words, we can leave our planes unbuilt and our battleships on paper, for we shall not need them.

The labor we have before us is not an easy labor. Those who wish to see us weak will employ every means of deception, of misrepresentation, and of fraud to keep us so. They will suggest to us that we cannot defend ourselves against fascism without ourselves becoming Fascists. They will tell us that we cannot assert our belief in the institutions of a free society and our intention to defend them without becoming as nationalistic, as intolerant, and as savage as those who attack our institutions. They will tell us that we cannot make judgments of good and evil without becoming ourselves burners of books and regimenters of men's minds.

We can believe them if we wish. But if we do believe them, we will have lost not only our courage but our common sense. To say that liberty can be preserved only by refusing to believe in liberty enough to fight for it, is to say what no man in his senses thinks. And to argue that liberty worth fighting for is liberty already lost is to argue without history or understanding. The contrary is the truth. Only liberty which is strong enough to defend itself is strong enough to be truly liberty and truly tolerant. Only liberty for which men are willing to fight is liberty which can or ever could survive.

Hinds County (Miss.) Democratic Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THEODORE G. BILBO

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 11 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY M. NEY WILLIAMS

Mr. BILBO. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Hon. M. Ney Williams on June 4, 1940, at the Hinds County (Miss.) Democratic Convention.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, ladies, gentlemen, and fellow Democrats, the Democratic Party came into being as a defender of all the people and was founded on the great principle of equal rights to all and special privileges to none. In bringing this great party to the American people Thomas Jefferson dreamed of the benefits that would be enjoyed by a free people for centuries to come.

As time passed on this party proved to be the party that the people looked to for refuge from the special interests, as it stands for a government of the people, by the people, and for the people.

In the latter years of the history of the Democratic Party Grover Cleveland was called to the White House by the voters of the Nation, and his first term as President was to carry out the platform and principles of his party. The reforms made during this 4 years did not meet with the approval of big business and the special interests, and though a candidate for reelection, he was defeated. The next 4 years of Republicanism, with all of its favoritism to the few, caused the people to appreciate the preceding 4 years of true democracy, and Cleveland was again elected President of the United States. His two terms as President have gone down in history as great achievements of a great President of a great party.

The passing of Cleveland as the leader of democracy in the United States caused many to wonder who would come forth to lead this party of the people.

In 1896, at the Chicago convention, a young Congressman, William Jennings Bryan, was acclaimed as the nominee of our party and its leader.

His sympathies were with the common man, and his ideas of government were just 20 years or more ahead of the times. Bryan had the love of God and his fellow man in his heart, and though never elected President, he preached democracy so earnestly and so truthfully to the American people that today he is known as one of the greatest exponents of the Democratic Party.

His undaunted courage and his belief in the principles of democracy bound him to the American people, and he was loved and respected not only by his own party but by all parties and all people. He was so popular with his people that he was known as the Great Commoner.

In 1912, just as the world was facing an international war crisis, the Democratic Party offered to the people of the United States Woodrow Wilson for President. He was elected and reelected in 1916. Mr. Wilson was the war President, and by his wonderful mind and ability, he was able to command the American Congress and give proper assistance to the allied nations with manpower, materials, and money. He was a great war President.

The next great Democrat to enter the party as a national figure was Franklin D. Roosevelt.

In 1932, after 12 years of Republican rule, our people found themselves in a state of confusion and bankruptcy. Banks had either failed by the thousands and closed up, or they were in such critical shape that their usefulness was gone.

The railroads were on the brink of ruin, as they had no money to purchase new equipment, and their properties were decreasing in value every day.

Factories over the country had closed by the thousands, and this paralyzed industry.

Cotton was worth about 5 cents per pound, and corn about 20 cents per bushel, and other agricultural products were worth practically nothing.

Unemployment had run into the millions, and the American people wondered if the Democratic Party, through its leader, could save the Nation.

On the day of the first inauguration of President Roosevelt, he asked God to help him, and asked Congress to give him sufficient powers to relieve the existing emergency.

The existing emergency was relieved and the United States of America was saved.

President Roosevelt is truly a man of the people.

He has tried to provide for old-age assistance, better schools, better hospitals, unemployment, social security, good roads, abolishment of slums and better housing conditions for the poor, and many other things for the good of common humanity. He is now trying to provide the ways and means to keep his country out of war.

The critics of the President are against preparedness, but this same bunch want the protection of this Government.

Some of our beloved Democratic Senators and Congressmen have seen fit in the past to fight the President on some of his policies, thinking, of course, that the President would become unpopular and that they would grow in popularity, and some of them thinking that they were bigger men than the President; but God bless your souls, this bunch has been getting back in the political bed with Roosevelt for the past year so fast that the President can't get the cover tucked in the bed before another Senator or Congressman is trying to crawl in. I am happy to see them returning to the fold, and am also happy that they discovered the fact that the people have endorsed the President and that public sentiment is so strong for Roosevelt, that even his enemies in his own party cannot longer hold out against him.

This country is now in the greatest crisis in its history, and we need a man at the head of our Government who knows the people of the New World as well as the Old World.

Some Republicans and a few disgruntled Democratic Members of Congress said if Congress repealed the neutrality law that it meant that the President was immediately placing the United States at war with Germany. This was months ago, and we are still a nation of peace.

The Congress has just voted the largest peacetime appropriation in history for national defense, and this was done at the urgent request of President Roosevelt. Some critics say that this means we are going to war, but the President says that proper preparedness will help keep us out of war.

I believe the President is right. I believe that the United States with its exposure of hundreds of miles of coast line on the Atlantic, on the Pacific, and the Gulf of Mexico, should be the best prepared country on earth. The people of the Nation are so strong for this preparedness of the President, that members of all parties almost voted unanimously in Congress for the bill to provide the money for this armament program. In the midst of this crisis, why should we try some man of our own party, or some other party, to lead us through? The saving of the United States is nearer and dearer to the hearts of the people, than this sickly maudlin sentiment about a precedent of electing a man President for a third term. Roosevelt saved our country from the devastation of depression, and he will try to save it from the horrors of war. I believe that Hinds County should give its endorsement for a third term for Roosevelt, and that Hinds County should instruct its delegates to the State convention to vote solidly at the Chicago convention for a third term for President Roosevelt.

I thank you.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. DELANEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 11, 1940

ARTICLE BY H. I. PHILLIPS

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Sun:

[From the New York Sun]

THE SUN DIAL—THE "FIFTH COLUMN" WORKER

(By H. I. Phillips)

He takes all America has to offer with a smile and awaits a chance to return the favors with a machine gun.

He coils in the flag, hides in the quartet singing the National Anthem, and crouches behind the Bill of Rights.

He accepts your invitation to dinner and makes a mental blue print of your home so he can return and snatch the silver.

He lets you help him on with his coat while he plans to steal your shirt.

He lets you pay his golf fee while he figures out how much powder it would take to blow up the clubhouse.

He becomes your week-end house guest and spends most of the time estimating how good a target for bombers the children's bedroom would make.

He applauds America First programs and laughs himself to sleep over the fact his face didn't betray him.

He makes soap-box orations in a public park under police protection and denounces the system that protects him.

He takes off his hat when the flag passes, but he never removes his foreign collar, regardless of what passes.

He stands when The Star-Spangled Banner is played but eases his conscience by assuring himself that he was tired of sitting anyhow.

He looks like a man but performs like a rattlesnake.

He shakes your hand while his wandering eye measures you for a knife in the back.

He is the skunk that walks like a man, the hyena that waltzes like a patriot, and the rat that masquerades as a human being.

He not only bites the hand that feeds him, but eats the other hand for dessert.

He says, "It can't happen here," while planning to help the enemy do it.

He screams at the Dies committee as un-American, talks loudly about freedom of speech, demands that the Constitution remain uninfringed, and then goes back to his rat hole for a good long laugh.

He sips the wine of hospitality—and secretly plans to sock his host with the empty bottle.

He is the kind of rodent who would accept help from the good Samaritan, ask the Samaritan to wait for him in the corner drug store, and then bomb the drug store.

He renders evil for good, thinks the double-cross is the noblest work of man, and eats with his knife because he never wants to have to depend on a fork when the time comes to stab his host.

He would steal the pennies off a dead man's eyes, but prefers nickels.

He is a skunk in sheep's clothing, and that turns us to a libel suit from the skunk family.

Farm Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BURTON K. WHEELER

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 11 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM MONTANA FARMERS UNION NEWS

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a very able and interesting editorial published under the heading "Act now," in the Montana Farmers Union News of May 22, 1940.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Montana Farmers' Union News of May 22, 1940]

ACT NOW

With Congress chafing to adjourn, and with the tremendous armament program taking precedence over all other legislation, the outlook for the passage of the farm legislation sponsored by the farmers' union and supported by the Department of Agriculture appears less and less probable at this session. Except for the possible effect that failure to do so might have on the average Member of the Congress when asking for the farm vote, we may as well take the cynical view that what he is most vitally interested in is to retain his $10,000-a-year job; and if he hasn't openly opposed the farm bills, he is perfectly safe in going to the farmers with protestations of his fealty to their interests.

There is no way in which the farmer can know if he is telling the truth or not, but there is a way now, before the Congress adjourns, of demanding that the farm legislation be acted upon. And the farmers' militancy or passive acceptance of what now appears to be a lost hope can determine just who in Congress are honestly concerned to see the farm legislation passed.

Last month 20,000 farmers made history by their response to a call by the farmers' union for a mass meeting in St. Paul. If 100,000 farmers would sit down today and write just a letter to their own Representatives and to the particular groups of Members of Congress who have introduced the legislation and have acted as a sort of steering committee, demanding of them all that Congress do not adjourn until definite action has been taken on the farm legislation before adjournment; that this be made a special order of business before adjournment; that a roll-call vote be arranged for, which will put every Member of Congress on record for his vote on this question, then we will know where they all stand. And we shall be able to evaluate the extent to which influence for the passage of the legislation has been brought to bear.

If a sufficiently large and unequivocal demand is made, it may safely be said that the squirmings of the politicians in Congress will probably have the effect of an earthquake on the Capitol Building. There will be wailing and weeping about the "rules" preventing any such action; that the routine of legislative procedure must be orderly and cannot be upset; that doing so would establish a dangerous precedent of yielding to pressure groups and numberless other excuses presented.

Very well. Let us then ask them "how come" that the ordinarily dilatory (the Congressmen would prefer the word "deliberative") procedure under the rules was not in evidence in the action of Congress on the $1,500,000,000 armament program? This was certainly an appropriation that called for deliberation and cautious procedure, because, in the vernacular, "that kind of dough isn't hay" even to this country. But the few who tried to make themselves heard suggesting that thought be given to the question will probably be accused of all manner of unpatriotic impulses. But the cold fact stands out that the "rules of procedure" on legislation, can and are set aside and all considerations of economy are thrown out of the window, when the steel trust and all of the large major industries (outside of agriculture) see tremendous profits in sight.

The politicians will argue that protection of this country is of paramount importance, an argument with which we all agree. But let us not be stampeded. Let us analyze conditions somewhat.

Aircraft fighting machines have injected a new note into modern warfare. Even now, alarmists are suggesting that invading forces could be dropped from airplanes into this country, carried from some foreign aggressor. That it is immediately necessary to provide for such contingencies. Suppose we shut our ears for a moment and consider this possibility on a factual basis.

Where might this attack come from? Japan? Japan is about as busy as it can be in China. It is short of raw metal materials. If America stopped shipment of scrap iron and metals generally to Japan, her show in China would be over very shortly. England, France? They do not appear to be in a position to defend themselves from Germany alone. Their source of supply of planes appears to be the United States. Germany? Germany is "spreading itself out so thin" and taking in so much territory that even if it should win a so-called victory tomorrow, it would be short of effective German population to police much of the conquered territory and would have to return it or blow up trying to maintain its advantages.

Moreover, all of these countries are exhausting themselves at a tremendously accelerated pace because war is no longer, mechanized as it is, a matter of attrition. It is speeded up to a tremendous tempo by advantages of mechanization. But news dispatches of today show clearly that even machines manned by men must have a base within easy and sure reach. Tactical requirements of the highly developed mechanized German Army compelled securing bases in Holland and on the English Channel, a half hour away from England before attacking.

The development of a war economy and the concentration of all efforts of this country on the production of armament isn't going to help the small farmer to stay on his farm and make a living for himself and his family in peace and comfort. It is not going to increase materially the purchasing power on which the farmer depends by increased employment in industry. This is definitely demonstrated by conditions in England and France at the present time. There is no decrease in unemployment to any marked degree. There is an increase in hours of labor and decrease in amount of wages paid. And tremendous increases in profits for the munitions industries.

It is not to your interest as farmers to docilely submit to what appears the inevitable. If we are going to drift into a war economy, you are strong enough to get your share of its profits if you demand it. But you've got to make yourself heard and not let yourself be fooled.

If the Northwest Farmers Union becomes vocal enough and militant enough, and don't approach the Members of Congress as humble petitioners but as sovereign citizens demanding your rights, you will get a prompt hearing. Otherwise you will get nothing now and less in the next session of Congress—if any.

I Am Concerned

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEE E. GEYER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, June 11, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. LEE E. GEYER, OF CALIFORNIA

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I extend in the RECORD an address given by myself over KFVD on June 6, 1940, as follows:

My friends, this is Congressman LEE E. GEYER reporting by transcription direct to you from the Nation's Capital in his weekly broadcast.

Several times I have stated that I would not discuss the international situation lest I might in some way add to the wave of insane and unjustified hysteria sweeping over the country. I have received so many requests to make that subject the topic of conversation in one of my early broadcasts that I have decided to devote the time today to it.

I do not speak as an expert nor do I speak as one who deems his opinions of more value than those of my hearers. I merely give you the benefit of conclusions I have reached from being exposed to the atmosphere of official Washington. Let me say at the outset that I believe in adequate preparedness and that I am convinced that preparation that was adequate 10 years ago no longer meets the requirements of our country against such an onslaught as has been going on in Europe the last few days. I do not mean by this that I expect an invader, but that we should have adequate protection for the same reason that we have fire insurance on our homes. If the fire does come, we will then appreciate the protection we have supplied ourselves. But this is not the angle that really concerns me most. I am concerned as to what will result from the state of mind of the public that is developing along with this armament program.

How far will the public allow the officeholder desiring to cover up past misdeeds to go in inciting neighbor against neighbor in a search for an imaginary member of the "fifth column"? Men in law-enforcement positions are already using this technique to retain themselves in office. Will the waving of the flag and the chasing of straw men keep our incompetent and vicious characters in the position to continue to prey upon the people?

Then there are the "outs" who desire to become the "ins." They, too, are forming organizations of self-styled patriots whose real purpose is not to safeguard our democratic way of life but whose sole aim is to defeat some of our faithful public servants by spreading falsehoods. They are seizing upon the present state of mind to place into office either themselves or someone of their particular choice. This because they are either paid cash in hand or because they wish revenge for having not received some coveted appointment. Will the voters really look at the records of their officeholders when it comes to forming their opinions, or will they be swayed by the emotions?

I am also concerned as to what is going to happen to our social and labor gains of the past 7 years. Will labor unions be broken up with the open-shoppers using the time-worn cry of "alien agitator"? This has been used effectively when there was no war hysteria. What will happen now? Will the Wagner Labor Act be practically destroyed in its effectiveness? Already those who were responsible for the antilabor Smith committee are licking their chops in anticipation. They are saying boldly that we cannot have our defense program held back by labor troubles fostered by "fifth columnists." Real enemies to our Nation must be eradicated. But let's be sure they are enemies. What will happen to the wage-hour bill? Will sweatshop conditions return? The industrial lords in the poll-tax States are again hoping for 5-cent-an-hour labor.

What about civil liberties? Will we forget entirely that the first amendment to the Constitution declares: "The Congress shall pass no law abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, or of religion, or of the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." Will this portion of the Constitution to which certain elements give such eloquent lip service be entirely set aside? Already HAMILTON FISH, one of the oldest Republican Members of the House and by that reason an important member of the Rules Committee, has declared: "The Congress needs no reason for deporting a man. It is enough if we don't like the color of his eyes."

Under the present whipped-up hysteria will people be silenced because they dare to speak against our going into war? Will our people, exercising their right of peaceable assembly, be raided by self-appointed defenders of democracy while those who are sworn to defend the provision of the Constitution under which they are meeting stand by and secretly encourage it?

What about the freedom of worship? Already the hooded hordes are riding. They are again attacking Jews and Catholics, who have among their members some of the finest of our American citizens. Will our people be allowed to publish what opinions they might have, even though it might differ from that held by the majority? Will the trade-unions be allowed to picket and distribute handbills? These practices have been declared exercising freedom of press and assembly and hence are protected under the Constitution.

What about the alien? Must they all suffer because there might be a few who are enemies? The flood of alien bills introduced into the Congress is alarming. Already one vicious one has been passed, but the President in his good sense and wisdom vetoed it. Let the Congress beware the oppression of minority groups, for this is an insidious cancer that rapidly eats into the body politic until no minority group is secure.

We are all members of some minority group, either racial, religious, or political. Hitler rose to power by stepping on the necks of one group after another. He took them in stride—trade-unionists, Catholics, Masons, Jews, and, finally, all whom he classed as aliens. The process has already started here. Yes; I am concerned for our unemployed. The Congress just passed a bill that contained a pitiful pittance. A mere drop in the bucket. The excuse given by many for refusing to increase the amount was that we needed the money for defense. It seems to me the best defense a democracy can have is to keep its people happy and contented, with everyone having a job at a decent living wage.

It was Lincoln who told us that "the best defense lies not in bristling guns and armaments, but in the spirit of our people." This armament program will take up a very small part of the slack in unemployment. The work will be largely done by machinery, it will require special skills, and it will be located in a comparatively few places. The bulk of the money voted for defense purposes will go for material which means those who already control the wealth of the Nation will but increase that which they already have. It is no wonder that the representatives of the large corporations are swarming Washington with patrictic offers of assistance.

No, I fear we have pushed the needs of 11,000,000 people into the background because our people have kept their ears tuned to the radio and their eyes on the headlines.

What about two very splendid bills that are being petitioned out of committee, having as their objective better pensions for our senior citizens. Can these people subsist on news from abroad? Do they thrive on statistics as to the number of airplanes shot down or the number of people safely evacuated across the English Channel?

What about our schools? Will we again go through what we did before the last World War? Will we shorten school terms, overcrowd our classrooms, pay teachers less, and cut down on equipment? Will we again have teachers fearful of teaching the history and geography of foreign countries lest they be discharged as members of the "fifth column"? Will we again teach hymns of hate and cut from our music courses the works of some of the great masters?

Another concern. What about paying for this preparedness program? Are we going to go into this vast financing program without overhauling our money system? No wonder certain financial interests are strong for the program. As to the tax source. Will the load be saddled on the consumer and those least able to pay? Or will we tax securities now exempt, high incomes, and excess profits coming as a result of the preparedness program? We of the progressive bloc have bills providing for the last-mentioned tax program, but as yet are unable to get them out of committee.

Yes, I am concerned about the effect of this war on our people, even before it ever reaches the stage of threatening to take us in. The entire picture is already changing. It is doing something to us. Something to our people. Even the tone of my mail is undergoing a change and a Congressman's mail is always a good barometer as to the thinking of the people.

Friends, I don't want this little talk with you to be construed as objecting to a program of physical preparation against a possible invader. As I stated before I feel it would be national suicide to ignore this important precaution. The object of this thinking out loud with you is to get all to see the picture as I see it developing in the Nation's Capitol. We can all do our part to keep conditions as nearly normal as possible. Let us insist that there shall be no black-out in the rights and privileges guaranteed under the constitution to all our people. If democracy is to continue in the United States, we must protect it at every turn. We cannot preserve it by destroying it bit by bit. Keep your letters rolling in to your Congressmen stressing this point and demanding no entry into the world war.

Perhaps next Thursday I will discuss the war itself in its more direct relation to us. Will you be with me?

Dr. Robert R. Moton

OF
HON. JAMES M. MEAD
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, June 11 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

EDITORIAL REFERENCES TO DEATH OF DR. ROBERT RUSSA MOTON

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD three editorials which comment upon the death of Dr. Robert Russa Moton, who succeeded Booker T. Washington as president of Tuskegee Institute and who served for 19 years in that capacity. I have selected these editorials from the pages of the New York Times, the Evening Star, of Washington, D. C., and the Birmingham Age-Herald, of Birmingham, Ala. They speak eloquently of the career of this unselfish, devoted figure, who sought always to create better understanding and an increased racial tolerance.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of June 3, 1940]

Dr. Robert R. Moton is dead, but the idea of education to which, as president of Tuskegee Institute, he gave 19 years of his life goes on. Emanating from the mind of General Armstrong, whose objective was "to teach the Negro to lift labor out of drudgery and toil by putting thought and skill into it," continued and developed by Booker T. Washington, consolidated by Dr. Moton and guided today by Dr. F. D. Patterson, the program, while making normal adjustments to keep courses in line with current events, still falls within the original pattern. "We shall prosper," said Booker Washington, "in proportion as we learn to glorify and dignify labor and put brains and skill into the common occupations of life."

In this continuity Dr. Moton's work will live. But in the passing of the man himself, "calm, unostentatious, unpresuming," with his great qualities of mind and heart, Dr. Moton's friends and all members of the Negro race must feel a deep spiritual and human loss. It will be met by a people who under the Tuskegee idea "found a way to industry, integrity, and thrift," and they will meet it with that fidelity of which Dr. Moton spoke at the dedication of the Lincoln Memorial 18 years ago Memorial Day. "No group in all our country has been so loyal," he said. "Whether bond or free, the Negro has served alike his country's need."

[From the Washington Evening Star of June 4, 1940]

There are many famous names which must be mentioned in any definitive history of the Negro race in America, and among the number that of Robert Russa Moton should be included. He was the protégé of Booker T. Washington at Tuskegee Institute and succeeded him as president there is 1915. But he also was closely associated with the pioneer work at Hampton, where he had the guidance of Brig. Gen. Samuel Chapman Armstrong and of the Reverend Dr. Hollis Burke Frissell. From these friends, as well as from the most gifted and distinguished leader of his own people, he acquired a practical philosophy for the advancement of the colored community in the United States.

"You and I," Dr. Moton told his students, "belong to an undeveloped, backward race that is rarely for its own sake taken into account in the adjustment of man's relation to man, but is considered largely with reference to the impression which it makes upon the dominant Anglo-Saxon. The question which the Nation must face, and the Negro as a part of the Nation, must soberly and dispassionately consider, is the mutual, social, civic, and industrial adjustment of two races, differing widely in characteristics and diverse in physical peculiarities, but alike suspicious and alike jealous and more or less prejudiced each toward the other. I believe that, unless democracy is a failure, it is entirely practicable for the white and the black races of America to develop side by side, in mutual helpfulness toward each other, each making its own contributions to the wealth and culture of our beloved country."

This surely is an honorable doctrine. From it vast good already has come. No other race anywhere, at any time, has made more rapid or more convincing progress in health, wealth, culture, spiritual evolution. It is evidence of the essential strength and vigor of the African stock in the New World that it has prospered, and it likewise is testimony to the elemental liberality of the white majority that its growth has been aided so generously and so consistently.

Dr. Moton was a bridge between his people and their neighbors. He will be remembered by both groups for his services to the ideals which they share.

[From the Birmingham Age-Herald of June 5, 1940]

ROBERT R. MOTON

The people of Alabama, white and black, unite with a vast company extending throughout the land in grateful homage to the good and greatly useful life of Robert R. Moton. Dr. Moton, the successor of Booker T. Washington at Tuskegee Institute and for 19 years its president, died last Friday night at his home in Gloucester County, Va. He had been forced by ill health to retire from active work at Tuskegee in 1934.

Robert R. Moton was descended from a member of an African tribe who was captured by the chief of other tribesmen and at length sold as a slave in Virginia.

This great man's mother and father were slaves. He himself was born on a Virginia plantation in 1867 just after slavery had been abolished.

It is said that members of the family in which his mother and father served encouraged young Moton to further his education. He enrolled in Hampton Institute, at Hampton, Va., in 1885 and was graduated in 1890. It was from Hampton that Booker Washington had been graduated and it was through Hampton that Dr. Moton's long and close friendship with Dr. Washington developed.

After his graduation young Moton had remained at the institute and soon became commandant of cadets. Sharing Dr. Washington's views on educational and racial problems, Dr. Moton became a protégé of the pioneer leader and long was associated with him in his lecture tours and other work.

It was in 1915, following the death of Dr. Washington, that Dr. Moton was chosen for the presidency of Tuskegee.

In addressing his students at that time, he said: "I believe that, unless democracy is a failure, it is entirely practicable for the white and black races of America to develop side by side in mutual helpfulness toward each other, each making its own contributions to the wealth and culture of our beloved country."

Dr. Moton's whole life, emerging from the shadow of slavery, was devoted to the service of that ideal and to a lofty exemplification of wise ways of advancing its realization.

He believed that the two races could go forward together. He saw his deep faith justified in notable and successive forward steps in racial relations. He himself was one of the foremost contributors to that heartening progress.

Here in Alabama, of course, there is special recognition of his service, widespread sorrow over his passing, because it was in this State that much of his most significant work was done. He valiantly and steadfastly carried forward his labors at Tuskegee despite the poor health which at length compelled his retirement.

He sought his great goals ever through the means of understanding, good will, and cooperation. His high accomplishments as a mighty testimony both to the man and his methods.

The President's Address at the University of Virginia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. RANKIN
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, June 11, 1940

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I asked for this time merely to answer the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOLLES] who made the statement a moment ago that President Roosevelt, in his address last night, had "declared war against the world." The President did nothing of the kind. The President is trying to prepare this country to defend itself. If he expressed his indignation last night at what took place in Italy yesterday, I am constrained to say that he expressed the indignation that is felt by the people of this country; but that was not a declaration of war. [Applause.]

The President realizes his responsibilities. He and the American people resent with indignation seeing a nation pounce upon a helpless country when it is down, or seeing the leader of a nation, when he thinks the battle is won, move in, or swoop down like a vulture, to feast upon the remains. [Applause.]

With reference to the adjournment of Congress, I want to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOLLES] that I am willing to stay here just as long as it is necessary; and I believe a great majority of the Members on our side of the House feel the same way about it.

You Members who think the President was severe in his statements last night should read the following editorial from this morning's New York Times:

[From the New York Times of June 11, 1940]

MUSSOLINI AT WAR

With the courage of a jackal at the heels of a bolder beast of prey, Mussolini has now left his ambush. His motives in taking Italy into the war against the Allies are as clear as day. He wants to share in the spoils which he believes will fall to Hitler, and he has chosen to enter the war at the precise moment when he thinks that he can accomplish this at the least cost and risk to himself. This is the end of all these weeks and months of hesitation, all this eager watching, all this cautious sniffing of the air, all this splendid courage held in leash so carefully for some sure sign of the weakness of the victim. Fascismo marches when it thinks that it smells carrion.

It is questionable whether any other statesman in our time has done a greater wrong to his own people. For it is the overwhelming testimony of those who know Italy best that, given a free choice, uninfluenced by the gigantic official propaganda to which they have been subjected, the Italian people would have chosen to remain at peace. It is true that they dislike Britain. It is equally true that they believe themselves to have been unfairly treated by the French. But they have a cultural unity with France that is more profound than all political disagreements. In their traditions, their manner of thinking, their heritage of law and culture, they are part of that western European world of which France is a part—and of which the Nazi Germany of Hitler has never been, and could never be, a part. Even in the case of the British, their dislike is certainly no greater—it is in many ways considerably less, since it is not compounded with the same fear of a great alien power at the Brenner Pass—than their instinctive dislike and distrust of the Germans.

Given a wiser leadership, given a clearer view ahead, given an opportunity to follow their own natural inclination and desires, the Italian people could readily have remained at peace. They could have been a stabilizing rather than a destructive force in Europe. They could have continued to serve as the custodians of western law and Latin culture. They could have conserved their strength to help build a new order on the smoking ruins of a broken world.

Unfortunately this was not to be. By every artifice of propaganda, by every pressure that dictatorship can bring to bear, by every goad he could apply, Mussolini led the Italian people away from peace, away from the position of respect which they could have held so easily, away from their own best interests. For it does not seem believable that participation in this war can be in Italy's best interests. It does not seem believable that the people of Italy can profit from this cynical adventure into which they have been led. It does not seem believable that out of it can come gains for them great enough to compensate for the losses they must suffer, morally and materially. It is possible, in the event of a final German victory, that they will be awarded the jackal's share of the killer's spoils; it is much more likely that the killer, having slain his prey, will turn upon the jackal. It is still more likely—it is certain—that in the event of a German defeat and the destruction of the Nazi system Italy will find herself at the war's end friendless, bankrupt, and dishonored.

If there was ever a decision made by one man, and not by a whole people, it is the decision that now takes Italy into the darkness of night and makes her a moral enemy of every democratic people. If that decision had to be made, if the Italian people had to be led upon this tragic course, it is at least fortunate, from our own domestic point of view, that the decision was made by a dictator and not by his people. For there are great numbers of Americans of Italian ancestry—fine, loyal citizens of the Nation which they or their forebears adopted as their own—who can in all justice lay the responsibility for this crime at the door of Hitler's accomplice, a traitor to the true interests of his country.

Acquisition of Island Outposts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 11 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE WILMINGTON (N. C.) STAR

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be published in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article in the form of an editorial from the columns of the Wilmington Morning Star of Wilmington, N. C., issue of Saturday, June 8, 1940, entitled "These Outposts Needed."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wilmington (N. C.) Star of June 8, 1940]

THESE OUTPOSTS NEEDED

The time is appropriate and even pressing for the United States to contemplate the advisability of acquiring Dutch, French, and British islands and continental possessions in the Western Hemisphere as a defense measure.

A gracious thing for France and Britain to do, in the circumstances, would be to cede theirs without delay. As for the Dutch, the Government of Holland is still functioning in England and its decisions would command respect. A sale to this country could not well be put aside.

The strategic value of these lands is shown by a glance at the map. British, Dutch, and French Guiana are at the eastern tip of Venezuela. The Windward and the Leeward Islands, under British and French flags, stretch northward above Trinidad, a British isle, off the northeast Caribbean shore of Venezuela. Just above Venezuela are the Dutch West Indies. In the Caribbean off Cuba and southwest of Haiti, is Jamaica, a British possession. At the gooseneck of Mexico and Central America is British Honduras. With these areas under control of the United States, the Carribean and the Gulf of Mexico could be made safe against alien entry both on the water and by air. North of Cuba and perilously near Florida's toepoint are the Bahamas and Nassau. Further north in the Atlantic, almost directly off the North Carolina coast, is Bermuda. Their possession would be invaluable in event of attempted invasion. The Panama Canal, the southern Atlantic seaboard, the Gulf coast, would be protected if we possessed them and adequately equipped them with naval, military, and air bases.

So far as France and England are concerned, relinquishment of their possessions would go a long way to discharge their unpaid war debts and establish credits so greatly needed now for the purchase of war needs. Holland has nothing to lose and much to gain by a sale.

Senator ROBERT R. REYNOLDS was laughed at when he proposed acquiring even a part of these lands. War, then, was an academic theory in most minds.

REYNOLDS was charged with imperialism. But recent events in Europe have turned men's minds to thoughts of an American invasion and provisions for its prevention. How better could we prevent it, in addition to building impregnable continental defenses, than by extending our defense lines to these outposts? It is a matter the Federal authorities ought to include in the program for making America safe for all time now being drafted.

Fixing the Blame

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES W. TOBEY

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 11 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

EDITORIAL BY DAVID LAWRENCE

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an editorial appearing in the current number of the United States News, fixing the responsibility for the present condition of our national defense.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the United States News of June 14, 1940]

FIXING THE BLAME—WHY WASN'T AMERICA TOLD OF THE INADEQUACY OF HER DEFENSES? WHAT DID POLITICS HAVE TO DO WITH OUR COURSE? THE PRESIDENT SHOULD RENOUNCE A THIRD TERM AND PUT AMERICA ON A WAR BASIS FOR DEFENSE

(By David Lawrence)

American public opinion has shifted so rapidly in the last few weeks that many observers regard the change as phenomenal. But it isn't. The change from a state of indifferent isolation to a state of alert awareness of the dangers that face American security is the result of a simple and natural process—the conquest of fallacy by truth.

For several years now we have been fed fantastic propaganda about the origin of war. Sincere though misguided men among us, so-called liberals have been insisting that only munitions makers bring on wars. Or else the contention has been seriously advanced that profiteers contrive in diabolical ways to involve our sons in war.

The blame for the present plight of France and Britain must be placed on those statesmen who refused to face the truth and to drive fallacy to the wall. We in America contributed our share to the debacle. Even the Senate of the United States by its widely publicized munitions investigation gave credence to the doctrine that munitions making makes wars. All over the world the charges and counter charges were exploited. And what was the result? The democracies including ourselves stifled the making of munitions by private industry and coincidentally failed to build up the Government plants which were urged so eloquently as the proper alternative.

What powder-making factories do we have today? We haven't a first-class plant available to make munitions. We have been misled just as were the British and French before 1937. It takes a long time to build up a supply of munitions and to develop the technique of munition making. Only last week a few of the "educational orders" designed to give private industry the stimulus for an expanding production were let by our Government. This should have been done 2 and 3 years ago.

INDIFFERENCE TO SECURITY IS INEXCUSABLE

The same group of men who smeared the private munitions makers smeared also a President of the United States on the ground that he dragged America into war to protect our credits and trade. This libel on the character of Woodrow Wilson was widely disseminated so as to bolster the theory that wars are made for gain and not for the defense of ideals or human liberty.

Public opinion became antiwar but at the same time public opinion became antidefense. Indifference to security is inexcusable. The names of the men who have been responsible for failing to permit America's defenses to be built up should be written plainly on the tablets of American history so that this generation may know who it was that conceived the plot to weaken the war defenses of democratic nations.

BLAME FOR OUR UNPREPAREDNESS MUST BE FIXED

It is not too late to institute an inquiry into what influences were at work in the United States between 1934 and 1940 to sap the economic vitality of the Nation on the production side and to frustrate the granting of the requests of the Army and the Navy for new weapons and adequate supplies.

The blame for unpreparednes must be fixed and fixed soon. America today has very few airplanes, hardly any mechanized weapons for the Army's use, and not enough transports or patrol vessels to take care of contingencies on our long sea coasts. Why have our defenses been neglected?

Certainly the facts about the world situation have been known to our Government. Our military and naval intelligence representatives abroad have told their superior officers in Washington for 3 years just what Germany has been doing. President Roosevelt has had detailed reports from diplomatic representatives of the United States stationed in foreign capitals. The danger that faced the democracies has been well known to the President. Why did he fail to tell the American people so that the Congress would respond by appropriating the necessary sums to build up our airplane industry for defense purposes?

The most commonly advanced explanation is that if Mr. Roosevelt had attempted to arouse the nation, he would have been called a "warmonger" and that he would have been refused by Congress the grants of funds. But this is no answer. Leadership based on revelation of the facts may fail temporarily, but if the debate is begun soon enough truth will in time prevail.

What would have happened had Mr. Roosevelt tried in January 1937 to advise the people of the United States of the need for enlarged defenses? He might have been balked by public opinion for the time being but if it were clear to the people that Mr. Roosevelt wanted nothing for himself, that he had no third term ambitions, the people would have accepted his argument as a disinterested expression.

Mr. Roosevelt even in 1938 and 1939 had nothing to lose by urging preparedness—nothing except possibly a third term. And many a fair-minded person will say that as between a political loss for oneself and the development of a policy which in the long run looks to the protection of the people against foreign aggression, the doubt should have been resolved in favor of an uncompromising campaign for national defense.

Ambition has ruined many a statesman in history. Consideration of self has beclouded the vision of many a would-be leader of democracy. Conversely, the heroes of centuries of human achievement have been men who have cast aside all thought of self in the sacrifices that bring spiritual rather than material compensations.

We are on the verge of war. No man can foretell how soon we will realize that all democracy faces a threat of extinction and that we must recognize a state of war exists now against our own democracy. These are not times when wars are declared. They simply happen overnight and only the democracies insist on taking time for the formalities while the aggressors bomb airdromes and render defenses impotent.

The President's duty is very plain. He must sacrifice his political ambitions for the good of the Nation. He might well consider the recommendation to the Congress of a program putting America immediately on a war basis. At the same moment the President ought to announce that he will respect the American tradition and refuse to run for a third term.

NATIONAL UNITY CANNOT BE BUILT ON DISTRUST

A change in the presidency is not likely to cause any dislocation in industry especially if Mr. Roosevelt will appoint now or give power to men already appointed to accelerate the industrial production of the Nation for defense. Whether another Democrat is chosen—and there are many capable leaders in the Democratic Party—or whether the country chooses a Republican, the fact remains that at this of all times democracy must prove the worth of its institutions. In the middle of a critical period, Britain changed prime ministers last month and so did France.

If America is to go into war, it must be with a leadership that is freed from the handicaps that would face a third-term President. National unity cannot be built upon foundations of distrust. And unhappily industry today does not feel that the President is as concerned about the national defense as he should be or else he would not be temporizing with advisory councils and insisting on maintaining the restrictions and barriers that have hamstrung industry for the last 7 years.

ALL POLITICAL AMBITIONS MUST BE SACRIFICED

Mr. Roosevelt cannot do the job of directing industrial operations himself. He must delegate authority and do so promptly. He must also tell the people the truth about the need for a modification in the restrictions imposed by the New Deal on business management and industrial production. If this is not done, it will be said with emphasis on every side that the administration is more interested in saving the New Deal than in saving America.

To attain the desired end—national unity—the third-term issue must be disposed of by the President himself. To refuse a third-term nomination would, to be sure, disappoint the selfish politicians and parasites who infest Washington and who have imposed long enough on the good nature of a generous-minded President.

But to refuse a third term would put the name of Franklin D. Roosevelt alongside that of George Washington and Thomas Jefferson. The excuse of a war emergency, offered by the proponents of a third term, is a shallow one. To surrender the democratic process in the face of a challenge to democracy itself is to misconstrue the innate capacity of the American people to govern themselves and to give their lives and their properties for an ideal.

The time has come for men in public life to raise the quality of statesmanship by sacrificing the political ego for the common good. Only by such an example can the thousands of men young and old in our midst be encouraged to make the supreme sacrifice of self. For such sacrifices will have to be made if the women and children in our cities are to be protected from the bombs that can be so readily dropped by aircraft operating from nearby ocean bases left unprotected by the defeat of Britain and France.

Will America learn the lesson of her neglect of defenses of these last few years or will historians fix the blame for America's downfall on the blindness and selfishness of her political leaders of today?

Unemployment and Youth

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PIUS L. SCHWERT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 11, 1940

REPORT OF THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON UNEMPLOYMENT AND YOUTH

Mr. SCHWERT. Mr. Speaker, it has been a privilege for me to join with the unemployment-conference group of the House of Representatives during the past 3 months. This group was divided into various subcommittees, and I was assigned to the Committee to Study Unemployment in its Relation to Youth. Our subcommittee submitted its report some time ago. Many of our suggestions have already been undertaken; but I believe the report of the subcommittee to be well worth the study of every Member of the House, and I therefore append hereto the report of the Subcommittee on Unemployment and Youth which we submitted to the whole Unemployment Conference Committee.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND YOUTH

We of the Committee on Unemployment and Youth believe that keeping the youth of our Nation engaged in some regular activity is one of the most important questions of the day. Check-ups on the matter of unemployed youth indicate that young persons between the ages of 16 to 24, who are out of school, able to work, and desirous of obtaining employment, but unable to find it, constitute about one-third of the total youth population. This unemployed group seems to be almost equally divided between girls and boys. About one-fifth were found to be under 18, two-fifths between 18 and 20, and two-fifths from 21 to 24 years of age. About a quarter of the group had left school at completion of the eighth grade and a fifth on graduation from high school. The unemployed young persons who had never had work had a better education, measured in terms of school-grade attainment, than the others who were without jobs. The unemployed youth had been out of school from a few months to 10 years or more. Almost all who had never had work, and a large proportion of the others, had left school at a time when they were faced with the fact of scant likelihood of their getting a job. Even so, 75 percent of them had left without completing high school. As far as this group is concerned, it seems likely therefor that programs emphasizing a return to school for regular high-school or college courses would be acceptable in a very few cases.

One of the first matters to be considered for the youth and its engagement in some activity would naturally be the question of education and the guidance of our youth. It is our belief that in times of economic stress more, rather than less, education is needed. We therefore agree with the report of the Educational Policies Commission in many of its recommendations. We believe that every American child should receive a minimum of 10 years of education, said education to include the fundamentals and in addition some instruction in mechanics and mechanical skills. Having made 10 years of education the minimum, we desire to report that we agree with the New York State suggestion, which was that education should continue to that age where a boy or girl can get a job and keep it. This would entail possibly 15 years of education, and it should be arranged so as to give our youth more vocational guidance and business training than they are today receiving. Any child needing financial assistance to secure the 10-year minimum education should receive that help, whether it be in the nature of transportation, medical care, food, shoes, or any services of that kind. In addition any child showing capability to use further training to good advantage should receive similar assistance to proceed beyond the 10-year minimum to the 15 years above mentioned.

We have naturally considered and worked for the field covered by the N. Y. A., which has been of such great assistance during recent years in the matter of keeping our youth in school. We believe that this assistance should be continued—that it makes our youth appreciate the value of an education, at the same time teaching them to use their hands in support of themselves. These N. Y. A. grants are of great value in the conservation of human resources. The boys and girls that receive this training are the leaders we must have for the future. Cooperative part-time programs in diversified occupations in connection with education should be established in more of our communities; and it must be remembered that the Government is already advancing a part of the money needed in this type of work. We believe that the Government should give whatever grants-in-aid are needed to enable the States to provide adequate education to all the children of our land.

The C. C. C. is another governmental project which our committee heartily endorses for the benefit of the youth of the country. It takes these lads off the street corners, out of pool halls and other places of that type. It allows them to receive the benefits of regular hours of eating and sleeping, as well as the advantages of outdoor life. While thus assisting them physically it accomplishes improvements for the community in which any camp is located and allows these lads to assist in the support of their families. Our suggested changes for the C. C. C. would be to have certain camps include a specified number of hours per week for military training and to have other camps devote a specified number of hours each week to vocational training, the choice in each case to be made by the enrollee.

Turning to the farm: Organizations such as the 4–H clubs and cooperative groups of that nature, to properly instruct our youth along agricultural lines, aid all youth interested in agriculture. Here again we must call attention to the fact that wages that can be paid by the farmer cannot be compared with those paid by industry. Thus it is only natural that many of our younger people frown on farm work, forgetting the fact in many cases that they are benefited by the outdoor employment and, what is more important, that their employment usually includes their keep (board, room, laundry, on any other sort of job are, indeed, big items). In view of the special character of the agricultural problem the committee feels that measures should be taken toward organizing general and vocational education for young agricultural workers. This could be handled very well in the schools of the rural districts. And the committee also feels that the Government should encourage the creation and development of agricultural cooperatives.

With the personnel and employment managers of industry requesting and demanding skilled labor for the past 10 years or more it was only natural that there would come a time when no more skilled labor would be available. I know from personal experience that for many years these employment managers have been asking for a certain type of worker, with so many years' experience, and that they were not willing to take any mechanically inclined youngster, or one who had had vocational training, as an apprentice. For this reason we have now reached the point above named, and the Youth Committee believes that the real means of furnishing this Nation with skilled labor is now through the medium of the youth. We, therefore, favor the installing of every possible phase of vocational training in our schools, in the N. Y. A. program, and in the C. C. C. camps, to assist in properly supplying us with youth who have a foundation and who with a little additional experience would rapidly become skilled laborers. There was a time in the past when an applicant for a position was appreciative of his opportunity of serving as apprentice at a somewhat lower wage than others in the plant. This same applicant in those days advanced along the line until after about 4 years he was rated as a mechanic or as a skilled laborer rather than as an apprentice, and his wages were treated accordingly. During recent years there has been no apprenticeship in most plants, and youth entering industry has demanded the same pay as the skilled workers in that industry. This should be broken down, and apprenticeship should be properly and justly handled so as to assist in bringing about a proper number of skilled laborers. The next step would naturally be to have industry cooperate and use these lads who have taken vocational training at various places, giving them an opportunity of putting their training into practical usage. We believe that this would not only assist the youth unemployment question, but at the same time it would assist industry; and there would not be a shortage of skilled labor. The only other method would be by regulation of apprenticeship, such as above referred to as being in existence some years ago.

Our recommendations therefore are:

1. A minimum of 10 years' education and raising the school-leaving age to 16 years of age, at the same time prohibiting employment of children under 16 years of age.
2. Continued education for children showing capability to use same to good advantage, to a point reaching 15 years of education.
3. Financial assistance to children needing same during these years of education.
4. Establishment of cooperative, part-time programs in diversified occupations in various communities.
5. Continuance of the N. Y. A. and the giving by the Government of grants-in-aid needed to enable States to provide above adequate education to all the children of our land.
6. C. C. C. camps to include a specified number of hours per week both for military training and for vocational training—choice to be made by the enrollee.
7. Measures toward organizing general and vocational education for young agricultural workers.
8. The Government to encourage the creation and development of agricultural cooperatives.
9. Further development of vocational education.
10. Regulation of apprenticeship, providing (1) regular promotion of apprentices, (2) progressive increase in wages, (3) adjustment of number of apprentices to trained workers in the same enterprise, and (4) recognition of the principle of equal pay for equal work.

We believe that a careful study of all of the above recommendations will meet with the approval of the entire membership of the Unemployment Committee of the House of Representatives.

Respectfully submitted.

An Appeal to the Conscience of America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WARREN R. AUSTIN

OF VERMONT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, June 11 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ARTICLE BY THOMAS E. BURKE

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "An Appeal to the Conscience of America," by Thomas E. Burke, who is the general secretary-treasurer of an organization of skilled workers known as the United Association of Journeymen Plumbers and Steam Fitters of the United States and Canada. This article was published in the official organ of the Journeymen Plumbers and Steam Fitters for June 1940.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Journeymen Plumbers and Steam Fitters Journal for June 1940]

AN APPEAL TO THE CONSCIENCE OF AMERICA

(By Thomas E. Burke)

Western civilization today is confronted with the gravest crisis in its history. What appeared at first to be the outbreak of a second World War has now become a vast nihilistic revolution. Its leaders are a fanatical group of irresponsible dictators, using all of the vast powers of modern science and machine to achieve their goal. The objective of this revolution is not only the destruction of the liberty of free peoples and small nations, but, also, the annihilation of religion, culture, and those concepts about the dignity of man which underlie the modern world and give meaning to life.

This scourge of ruthless destruction is sweeping over Europe like an uncontrolled forest fire. It shifts now this way or that with every change of wind. But today even the wind is not left to chance; it is manipulated by a propaganda of hatred and base deception, culminating in such activities as the so-called "fifth column" penetration. Daily it is becoming clearer that the struggle which is now raging is not between the Allies—England and France—and the Nazis, but rather it is a death struggle between civilization and barbarism. No one who believes in a God-centered world, in the inviolate dignity of the individual and the right of people to govern themselves, can contemplate without deep apprehension the progressive envelopment of even one small nation under a condition of anarchy.

Mankind stands appalled at every succeeding act of revolutionary might. Civilized nations refrain from descending to such counter acts of destruction which imitate the ruthlessness of these nihilistic dictators. For these men and their deeds stand condemned before the bar of public opinion. A catalog of their actions is a record of disaster.

They have ruthlessly and cruelly destroyed one small nation after another and placed them under the oppressive hand of the monster's yoke.

They have prevented the members of an ancient race from worshipping God according to the dictates of their own conscience.

They have desecrated the churches, seminaries, and religious orders of one great branch of the Christian church in lands now under their domination.

They have closed the schools and colleges of peaceful people under their domination lest the truth prevail.

They have destroyed the great labor movements and cooperative societies that brought great beneficial results to the workers, both from a political and economic standpoint for over a hundred years. They have destroyed those that bpposed them and placed thousands of suspects in concentration camps to starve and die.

They have incited domestic insurrection within the borders of peaceful nations and used such insurrection as an excuse for invasion.

They have ruthlessly invaded the ancient kingdoms of Denmark and Norway by treason and treachery. And have previously invaded, like a thief in the night, the progressive Republics of Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland, and Finland, and now as we go to press these cowardly monsters have invaded the peaceful and progressive kingdoms of Holland, Belgium, and Luxemburg with their deadly weapons of destruction and without a moment's notice. The murderous villany of these reptiles, these insane madmen, has never been equaled in all human history. They and their hirelings and sympathizers must be destroyed, or they will destroy every priceless treasure of progress and liberty that has taken thousands of years to secure. They have made the Gestapo, the concentration camp, and the firing squad the kind of rule that they will impose on all they bring under subjection.

Today America, the greatest and most powerful neutral in the world, stands upon the threshold of an historic decision. She cannot avoid making a decision at this time upon which the destiny of the world will largely depend. The destruction of one neutral after the other is a threat to all neutrals. But more than that many of these small neutrals had the temerity to rely on their traditional neutrality in the belief that America would never let freedom down or desert the moral rights of small nations to self-determination.

The wanton destruction of life and property has now so shocked the moral conscience of man everywhere that from all corners of our land there has come a ground swell of public demand that America dare to speak and act in this hour of grave crisis in behalf of human destiny and civilized intercourse between nations. America is called at this hour to defend their spirit of brotherhood among peoples of all races, creeds, and nations that are now being attacked by insidious propaganda and hatred.

No sane person believes that this nihilistic revolution is the considered or collected will of the German people; it is rather the objective of a small group of irresponsible usurpers and buccaneers who have seized control of the military power of an ancient people. They are prepared to use the military power not only to oppress and terrify their neighbors, but to terrify and suppress all who protest within the state.

Our appeal then to the conscience of America rises above any political divisions or narrow partisanship; it springs from the pressure of no group or class in our society; it rests upon no race, creed, or color. Rather, it represents the inherent tradition and spirit of freedom-loving pioneers who made this country a land of liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal in the sight of God.

It comes from American labor that loves this land and its great traditions and knows history and the stupendous sacrifices made in bloodshed and untold suffering endured down through the centuries by mankind and especially the common people, to bring to us the democratic way of life and the freedom and liberty we enjoy today. And which are the basic fundamental principles on which our great movement is founded to maintain and preserve them in perpetuity, no matter what the cost in blood and treasure. We would not be worthy of the name of men if we allowed this great legacy of liberty and freedom, so dearly bought by the heroes and martyrs who gave their lives to secure it and passed it on to us to perpetuate, if we failed in our duty to preserve it for ourselves and posterity.

Therefore, in this hour of deepening world crisis that has upset the peace and tranquillity of all peoples and our own in particular, it is a duty we owe to them to dare to have a purpose firm and dare to make it known.

First, it is our belief, based on common sense, that the Congress of the United States should take such constructive action immediately as will make it possible for our country to defend our ideals of civil liberty and government resting upon consent against any attack from within or without.

Second, that the Congress of the United States should provide the fullest measure of economic cooperation for the Allies, other than war, so that we may play our part in putting an end to international anarchy.

Third, that the Congress of the United States should provide the fullest measure of economic cooperation to all of the nations of the world as soon as this nihilistic revolution has been ended and the civilized rights of all peoples are restored and government by law is substituted once again for a government by violence in the world.

At such a time in the world and in the face of such a situation, perhaps the gravest that we have faced in centuries, it would not reflect either the spirit or the genius of labor did we not express our convictions and appeal to the conscience of our great country to look forward across the horizon, not behind, to take account of its responsibilities as the most powerful neutral in the world, and then determine what course of action will best assure the perpetuation of the democratic way of America and also give aid and support to those who are valiantly committed to that way, in whatever part of the world they may dwell.

Pay-Up Day Is Here

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BEN F. JENSEN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 11, 1940

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, when I look at the tax bill we have before us today, it is obvious the American people need not speculate any longer as to just when pay-up day will come, because it is here right now in this bill, and more to come, I fear.

This bill alone will extract in the next 5 years an estimated $7,000,000,000, which will in the final analyses come from the pockets of the real backbone citizens of this country, mostly from the pockets of the farmers, laborers, and small-business men, who are already burdened almost to the limit.

This $7,000,000,000 will in the main leave the channels of trade so far as its circulating value is concerned, as all tax dollars do, thereby affecting the whole economic business and financial structure of our Nation, which in itself has the most detrimental effect on national defense for which this very taxing bill is supposed to provide funds with which to buy, especially since the great planners and spenders have already almost bankrupted our Treasury with a deficit of $48,000,000,000 staring us in the face within a few short months.

Of course this bill will pass just as it was written by the New Deal powers, because it has been brought to the House under the gag rule, in other words, it is "take it or leave it." What else can any Member of Congress do now but to vote for it, because we want defense, and plenty of it. But you know and I know and the American people know that if this administration had made good use of the $7,000,000,000 they have spent for national defense the last several years, there would be very little necessity or reason for passing this tax bill today had our President and his servants refrained from meddling in the quarrels of other nations, as has been their practice for years.

Mr. Speaker and ladies and gentlemen of the House, here is a case where the innocent must suffer with the guilty, we must all swallow this bitter pill, prescribed by a doctor who has proven he cannot handle our case. Let us hope and pray that even though his medicine will not cure our economic ills that at least it will not destroy our fine American youth on the field of battle.

Defense and Preparedness Revenue Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MILTON A. ROMJUE

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 11, 1940

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House of Representatives, while it is never a pleasant duty to enact measures providing for taxation for the raising of revenue, yet we all know that it is necessary that such be done when an occasion or circumstances arise that require it.

The suggestion made to the Congress by President Roosevelt calling for a program of national preparedness and for the furnishing of revenue to defray the expenses thereof unquestionably is proper and a commendable move, especially is this true in view of the conditions existing at the present time throughout the world.

International banditry is stalking the world, and it is indeed wise that the United States is taking appropriate steps to protect our own American people from any assault or invasion. This is a time when the people of the United States should be as much united as possible, and it is the duty of all American citizens to stand loyally by and cooperate in that which is for the best interest of our people and our Government. This is no time for people to put their party above the Government's interest. In normal times no one should find any particular fault with what might be considered normal criticism.

In the main, Republicans as well as Democrats are willing and anxious to cooperate with President Roosevelt as Commander in Chief of our country, but there are some who cannot refrain apparently from sniping at the President, harping and criticizing almost every move he makes. Some Republican politicians have criticized President Roosevelt, saying that our country should have been better prepared before this. While I have always favored and shall continue to favor all adequate measures calculated and intended and necessary to make our country positively safe from any attack from whatever source, I do not blame President Roosevelt nor the American people, because no one apparently anywhere expected a madman to unleash himself in such bitter fury against every nation almost with which they come in contact.

I recall very well that during the administration of the Republican Party, which was in power from March 4, 1921, until March 4, 1933, some things happened to weaken the strength of our governmental defense. While I am not criticizing any Republican President, as I am confident he and his party did what they believed to be best at the time, but it was during President Calvin Coolidge's administration when the Republican Party was entirely in control of the management of our Government, they scrapped 30 of the United States Government fighting ships and sent them to the bottom of the sea. The same were valued at $279,256,000 and were made a total waste. So the Republican leadership in one fell swoop sunk $279,256,000. Now our Government, under President Roosevelt, is compelled to replace these, and Congress is required to enact legislation to provide the revenue in order to pay for these replacements and build our Navy and air forces and other defense forces more strongly than ever before. So those who criticize President Roosevelt for not being more prepared at this time do so for political reasons. Nothing that President Roosevelt could recommend or do would meet their approval, but they do not say anything about these 30 naval vessels that they sunk in the seas. Would it not have been better even if the United States Government at the time desired to get rid of any of these fighting vessels for them to have been sold to some smaller or minor nation and put the money received therefrom into the United States Treasury? Suppose, for instance, small nations like Holland and Belgium, neither of which has wronged anyone in this generation, and yet they have been ruthlessly trampled upon and without justification or reasonable cause. Their civilians have even been ruthlessly murdered. Anyway, these 30 vessels which under President Coolidge's administration were mostly sent to the bottom of the sea, could have been sold for many millions of dollars, and had that been done it would have made it unnecessary to raise the amount of revenue that is now required.

Files of the American Potash and Chemical Co. Case

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEE E. GEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 11, 1940

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, sometime ago I inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a portion of the column of the Washington Merry-Go-Round. This insertion had to do with the files of the American Potash and Chemical Co. case. On May 10, the Merry-Go-Round again discusses this subject.

In order that injustice be done no one, and that the record be complete, I am inserting in the RECORD today the May 10 article. The article follows:

NOTE.—The Washington Merry-Go-Round is in receipt of a photostatic copy of a letter from Charles Fahy, general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, stating that while the files of a case in which Edmund Toland, counsel of the House investigating committee, had previously been connected, had been secured by one of Toland's aides, they had been returned that same day and now are intact in the possession of the N. L. R. B.

If Congress Quits

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 11, 1940

ARTICLE BY MARK SULLIVAN

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Mark Sullivan from today's issue of the Washington Post:

IF CONGRESS QUITS—EMERGENCY NEEDS

(By Mark Sullivan)

About Congress, the question is: Should it go home next week, as Mr. Roosevelt wishes, or should it remain here, with perhaps recesses of a few days at a time, such as would accommodate Congressmen who wish to attend the national conventions of the two parties?

The most obvious argument for Congress remaining here runs thus: Emergencies are certain to arise. They cannot be foreseen—they will spring up suddenly, out of turns the war in Europe will take, out of actions by the dictator governments of Europe. To these emergencies, our Government must adjust itself, and must do it instantly. As to many emergencies, the President does not have the power to act. He can only get the necessary power by action of Congress. If Congress is there, and if a step proposed by the President has general support, he can get the necessary power from Congress in a few hours.

If, on the other hand, Congress is not here, dangerous situations will arise, some emergency will have happened, action by our Government will be necessary. With Congress not here, there will be temptation upon the President to act without authority, to exceed his authority. That way lies distortion of our form of government. That may lies excessive expansion of Presidential power. That would be the path toward one-man government. That we do not want.

There is a third possibility, a third way of providing for the situation. It has not been suggested yet, at least not publicly.

But it is likely to be suggested. If the plan of having Congress go home makes headway, someone will make this proposal. The proposal will be that Congress, just before adjourning, pass a blanket resolution, conferring discretionary powers on the President. Then, as emergencies arise, with Congress away, the President could take such action as he wishes.

But that way, too, is the path toward expansion of Presidential power. That, too, would be a path toward one-man government. That we do not want.

What is so far said here is the most obvious argument for Congress remaining in Washington. It speaks for itself.

There is an additional argument for Congress remaining here, not so widely understood, but equally strong.

There has existed, during this administration, ever since its beginning, on the part of a group not large in numbers but strongly entrenched, an effort or desire or tendency to take the United States into a changed form of society. To give a name to what the new form would be, would run risk of inexactness and would excite disagreement. Some think that the new form, once brought about and operating, would ultimately not differ materially from communism. Some who would resent the word communism, would agree to the word socialism. The official term for the only Communist government existing in the world includes the word Socialist—the official name of Russia is "Union of Soviet Socialist Republics."

But to use either socialism or communism as the term for what some desire or anticipate in America, would run risk of inexactness. Also it would encounter the dialectical objections of those who believe in the new order. They would deny that the thing they wish is either socialism or communism.

There is a third word that might be used. The proposed new order could be called "collectivism." Hardly could the advocates of the new order deny that word as the description of it. If they should deny it, they could be refuted. Some of them have themselves used that word.

But let us dismiss all the words. Let us just say that there exists an attempt or wish or tendency to bring about a new order, which would include, among other features, a great increase of power for the Government over the individual. It would include also an immense centralization of power at Washington, and, within the centralization at Washington, an immense increase of power for the executive branch of Government.

That the new order is desired, or being attempted, or comes as a tendency, is common knowledge. It is taken for granted; offhand allusions are made to it. Evidence of it is in the records of investigations by committees of Congress.

To those who wish to bring about the new order, or who think the new order is desirable, or who think it inevitable in the present state of the world—to all such the war is opportunity and justification. In war, at any time, there is a strong tendency toward centralized power and toward one-man power. It was present during the Great War. It was practiced under President Wilson. But under Wilson it was practiced as an emergency condition only. Wilson, being a strong believer in our constitutional form of government and in individual freedom—Wilson, as soon as the war was over, surrendered all his war powers, turned back to Congress all the extraordinary power he had been granted.

The tendency toward centralization, and toward expansion of executive power, natural in time of war or defense against war, should be guarded. For guarding it, the presence of Congress in Washington is indispensable.

Adjournment Unthinkable

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD B. WIGGLESWORTH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 10, 1940

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, the proposal to adjourn the Congress is a proposal, in my judgment, which is utterly without justification. With Europe on fire, with momentous problems confronting us, decision in respect to which may affect the destiny of 120,000,000 Americans for years to come, the proper place for Congress is in Washington and not scattered in the 48 States of the Union. This sentiment is reflected in letters which all of us are receiving. It is reflected in editorial comment on a broad basis. I believe it to be the sentiment of the Nation as a whole. I trust that the Congress will not be placed in the position of abandoning its post of duty at this time of great emergency. The following excerpts from the recent pages of the Washington Post, New York Times, and Boston Herald are typical of newspaper comment in this connection:

[From the Washington Post]

SHOULD CONGRESS GO HOME?

Mr. Roosevelt is at this moment doing a strange thing. He makes it plain that he wants Congress to go home soon. To suggestions that Congress should merely adjourn for the national conventions, and return between and after the conventions, Mr. Roosevelt shows obvious dissent. His attitude is that Congress ought to go home after caring for a few pending measures. To make their going more justifiable, he has said that if need arises he will call them back.

Yet Mr. Roosevelt must know that any day, almost any hour, conditions will arise that will call upon him for action of the highest importance, and action, which in many cases he cannot take without new power from Congress. Mr. Roosevelt and the United States are obliged to adjust themselves from day to day to emergencies created by dictators—Hitler, whose summoning of his Reichstag is confined mainly to occasions when he wishes it to serve as background and stooges for a speech to the world; and Mussolini, whose parliamentary body sometime ago obligingly voted itself out of existence.

That, under these circumstances, Congress should be away from June until January is almost unthinkable.

* * * * * * *

It is inevitable that either (a) Mr. Roosevelt must get from Congress an enormous grant of discretionary power; or (b) Congress must remain in session to give him specific powers as need arises. Neither Congress nor the country is willing to give Mr. Roosevelt a great grant of discretionary power.

[From the New York Times]

CONGRESS MUST STAY

If the leaders of Congress have not abandoned in their own minds all expectation of an early adjournment, it is time for them to face the fact that the course of events and the interests of the American people simply do not permit of such action. At one of the most critical moments in the world's history, at a time when there is work to be done every day to strengthen the bulwarks of this democracy, it is unthinkable that the institution through which the will of the American people is expressed should shortly go into hibernation for a period of 7 months—subject only to the President's call to meet in special session—abandoning both its obligations and its opportunities.

It is the patriotic duty of Congress to remain in session now, for one reason, because the various defense measures already on its calendar must not receive slipshod attention in a hurried drive to get away from Washington. But that is only a beginning of the responsibilities of Congress. There will be other defense measures the need of which cannot now be foreseen but on which action will be imperative long before snow flies again and Congress meets next January. There is the increasingly critical problem of defense finances that ought to be met without delay; the wholly casual and inadequate "token tax" which is now in view must be supplemented with a far more adequate and more carefully considered tax program, and the sooner we begin the better. There is the need of a defense force which is adequate in manpower as well as matériel; the case for a democratic system of universal compulsory military training has now become overwhelming. Above all, in the great crises which lie ahead, in the dark hours that may bring news which will profoundly shock this country, it is proper that Congress should be continuously in session, so that it may share the responsibilities of the Executive and speak with the voice of the American people.

The right course of action is plainly to recess for the two conventions and then come back to work. That will be hot and uncomfortable. It will spoil many summer plans. But the American people have every right to expect patience, fidelity, and intelligence on the part of their chosen representatives in such a crisis as we face today.

[From the Boston Herald]

LET CONGRESS REMAIN

Whatever doubts there may have been about the advisability of having Congress remain in session, ready to deal properly and promptly with any issue which may arise, have disappeared in the last few days. There is terrific pressure on the White House from the people and our foreign spokesmen to take steps which would be equivalent to a declaration of war without the slightest necessity or provocation. Immediate aid to the Allies is essential, of course, but also essential is an absence of hot-headed action which would commit us irrevocably. There can be no better provision than an informed Congress, constantly on the alert, a Congress which would play somewhat the same part as the Parliaments of England and France, to which the leaders report periodically and to which the people look. The Republican Members of the House have formally declared for such a policy and no valid opposition to it has been voiced yet.

The President is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and as such he must exercise his discretion constantly. But we are not at war. There is no reason to believe that we cannot keep out of war while exercising our undisputed rights as a nonbelligerent. There is no compelling necessity for relaxing the safeguards against war, and one of the best of the protective devices is a Congress which, while not intruding on the Executive department, will insist that its own prerogatives must not be ignored.

The extent to which Congress has cooperated with the President and, most of all, the speed with which it has legislated, are ample evidence that the Senators and Representatives will not hinder prompt action when promptness is imperative. Their desire to do everything to aid this Nation by aiding the Allies legitimately is not less than that of the President.

The people will feel less apprehensive if Congress sits in Washington just as long as the domestic effects of the war cannot be foreseen. The crisis may come in a few days or a few weeks or may be deferred for the rest of the year. But in any event, there will arise problems as momentous as any which have confronted us since Sumter was fired on or the South and the North laid down their arms. Decisions must be made which will affect our destiny for years to come. The open arena of Congress is the proper place for a deliberate discussion of them.

Anti-Third-Term Slogan—"If We Draft Roosevelt, Roosevelt Will Draft Us"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 11, 1940

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, a short time ago the newspapers were filled with reports of the fist fights which enlivened the State Democratic convention recently held in Texas, at which convention the delegates were pledged to the Honorable JACK GARNER for President.

It was rumored that these fist fights were held because some of the Jack Garner anti-third-term patriots erected in front of the convention hall a sign which stated, with more truth and bluntness than poetry or finesse, "If We Draft Roosevelt, Roosevelt Will Draft Us."

ALL MOTHERS WHO HAVE SONS OF MILITARY AGE, PLEASE NOTE

Confirmation of the truth of the slogan seems to be found in President Roosevelt's recent statement that he approved of an editorial in the New York Times calling for universal military training at this time under the force of conscription.

America Girds for Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK E. HOOK

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 11, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. MARVIN JONES OF TEXAS

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by Hon. MARVIN JONES of Texas and broadcast over a coast-to-coast network of the National Broadcasting Co.'s blue network Friday, May 24:

In these days, when "there is war in the skies," it is amazing that an announced candidate for the Presidency of the United States should attempt to divert the attention of Americans from the grave danger that threatens democratic civilization. Senator Taft, in his speech at Topeka, Kans., on May 18, accused the New Deal of attempting to rivet attention on the war situation in order to divert attention from what the Republican candidate termed "its domestic failures." The people of America know that it is not the New Deal, as stated by Senator Taft, that compels our attention to the European situation, but the dreadful news by cable and radio that comes from Europe.

Republican Candidate Taft stated at Topeka, "Under the cover of war the New Deal domestic program is sneaking on." And this he said on the day following the thunderous response of the Congress of the United States to President Roosevelt's call to all Americans to grid ourselves to protect our liberty and the Nation. The Roosevelt recovery program has achieved a remarkable record of rebuilding, conserving, and improving our natural, agricultural, and human resources. We are no longer the beaten and prostrate Nation that was turned over by the Republicans in early 1933, but stand today a vigorous, united, and powerful people that can bend tremendous energies and vast wealth to the task of maintaining peace, or if our shores are menaced, to prosecute war victoriously.

Our farmers today are mobilized into a force of nearly 6,000,000 volunteer cooperators in the New Deal farm programs advanced to cope with our farm problems. Through thousands of A. A. A. committeemen chosen by farmers at nonpartisan elections in every agricultural county, each farmer has a democratic voice in carrying out the farm programs in his locality. With our farmers working together, American agriculture stands prepared to meet whatever demands may arise.

Thomas Jefferson, the founder of the idea of American democracy, early in the past century, concerning the efforts of Bonaparte to partition the earth at his will and to devastate with fire and sword, urged the union of all in resisting enemies within and without, and stated, "If we do not act as a phalanx * * * our Nation will be undone." Thomas Jefferson had small use for those who would cause dissension when "total war" in Europe threatened democracy in his day.

As chairman of the agricultural committee of the House of Representatives, it has been my privilege to take part in the great program directed toward the rehabilitation of our agriculture and the conservation of our natural resources. I have confidence in the judgment of American citizens acting as the final jurors to decide whether or not the New Deal agricultural program has achieved to a large degree the fulfillment of the promises to American farmers made by Franklin D. Roosevelt at Topeka, Kans., in 1932, when he spoke as the Democratic Presidential candidate.

Speaking at this same city in the heart of America's bread basket, Republican Candidate TAFT advanced no program for agriculture and conservation except to say that he would look to his Republican advisors from the various States to aid him.

The Republican Party leaders and aspirants for the Republican Presidential nomination are trying desparately to win back the farm vote. They know that without the farm vote they have no chance to elect a Republican President and a Republican Congress. And farmers are not going to be deceived again by the promises of a political organization that for more than half a century lured them into supporting its candidates for national office. Farmers have had their eyes opened to the empty promises of that party which until 1920 had never recognized that there was such a thing as a farm problem.

The facts show that it is utterly impossible to rely upon any promises the Republican Party, in its desperation, may make to you. I am going to prove this by reviewing the record of that party. I am going to show you what the Republican Party promised the farmers and how it has always and everlastingly and deliberately failed to keep its promises. It has failed the farmer because it has no sympathy with the farmer. It believes farmers are easily deluded and can be told anything and promised anything. You remember that the Republican candidate for Vice President in 1928 told an Iowa farmer that he was "too —— dumb to understand." But the Republican Party found out in 1932 that farmers are not quite so dumb as the Republican Vice Presidential candidate in 1928 thought they were.

Let me review rapidly Republican Party promises and failures since 1920, the year the Republicans for the first time came to understand that there was a farm problem, and discovered, too, that "the farmer is the backbone of the Nation." For 50 years it had believed that the farmer was not worth mentioning. In 1920 the Republican Party leaders, alarmed at the gathering storm, thought it worth while to recognize the farmer, and in its platitudinous way it promised to do something for him. What it did was to pass an emergency tariff bill raising rates on imports that in no way helped the farmer. It followed this legislation by enacting the Fordney-McCumber tariff bill, which still further boosted rates and paved the way for the Smoot-Hawley bill.

In 1924 the Republican National Convention pledged itself "to place the agricultural interests of America on a basis of economic equality with other industry to insure its prosperity and success," and President Coolidge from the White House declared "something must be done for agriculture." What was done? Republicans in Congress, with the help of Democrats, passed the McNary-Haugen bill in 1927, and Mr. Coolidge, who had said "something must be done for agriculture" vetoed it, because his Secretary of the Treasury, with his ear turned toward Wall Street, said it was "economically unsound." Again in 1928 the Congress passed the McNary-Haugen bill, and when Republican and Democratic leaders visited the White House to plead that it be signed, the Republican President told them, "Go see Mellon." Fine chance the McNary-Haugen bill had getting past Mr. Mellon. The McNary-Haugen bill would have helped agriculture at that time before European countries had turned to nationalistic policies. The condition of agriculture steadily grew worse, and in 1928 farm leaders went to Kansas City and, almost on their knees, begged the resolutions committee to give them an effective farm plank. For their pains they were virtually driven from the convention doors, while the platform committee proceeded to declare that "the Republican Party pledges its strength and energy to a solution of the farm problem." And what was its solution? The Smoot-Hawley tariff bill. And then the Republicans gave us the Federal Farm Board, another stupendous blunder that did exactly the opposite of what it was supposed to do by accumulating farm surpluses instead of controlling them and cost the taxpayers almost half a billion dollars.

After 12 years of control the Republican Party's promises to the farmer amounted exactly to zero. Yes, less than zero, for in 1932, the last year of the Hoover administration, agriculture was in the worst condition ever known. Farm prices were the lowest since before the Civil War, and farm income had shrunk to the lowest on record—four and three-quarter billions.

In 1932 corn sold for 10 cents a bushel, wheat at the lowest price in 300 years, hogs for $3 a hundred, and cotton for 5 cents a pound. Agriculture was prostrate and farmers desperate.

Republicans now assert that the New Deal administration has done nothing for agriculture, although one of the leading aspirants for the Republican Presidential nomination, Mr. Dewey, announces as his farm program eight objectives, all of which a Democratic administration has already initiated and is carrying out. The Republicans endorse almost every objective of the New Deal farm program, but claim that if entrusted with government they will administer the program in a better way.

They assert that the farmer is no better off today than he was before the Democrats took over the reins. Of course, they are meticulously careful to avoid any reference to the dark days of 1932.

Let us recount some of the things which the recent administration has done for agriculture in the little more than 7 years it has been in power.

Within a brief period after President Roosevelt entered the White House, the Democratic Congress had enacted and the President had signed the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1933. Almost immediately farm prices increased and a better feeling existed throughout the country.

The farm program has been attacked on every side. It was attacked in the courts. It was attacked in the press. It was attacked in the forum and on the air. The tariff barons call the program a subsidy, forgetting that under the tariff system the American people pay billions in subsidy to the beneficiaries of the tariff. And yet, through it all, the farmers somehow have won out and have grown stronger in the face of adversity.

Much of the opposition was from the enemies of agriculture, some of whom looked upon the program as a good political target, and others thought they saw a chance for business advantage. They had misled the farmers so often they felt they could do it again, but this time they have not succeeded, and the farmer support has grown stronger through the years.

Every year more farmers have participated in the program until in 1939 6,000,000 farmers took part in the various wings of the program. The opposition has cried "wolf" too often.

One of the advantages of the farm program has been the increase in farm income and farm buying power. Cash farm income has doubled. Purchasing power has nearly doubled. Retail sales to farmers are twice as great as in 1932. Smokestacks that rusted in idleness are active again. Soil conservation and soil building have become a reality in the vast farming areas of our country. Forest conservation has made great strides in the last 7 years. A great amount of erosion-control work has been done on hundreds of thousands of acres.

Alongside soil conservation has gone human conservation. Through rehabilitation loans more than a half-million destitute farm families have again become self-supporting and have been given a new hope. Nearly 800,000 farm homes have been refinanced at the lowest interest rates that have prevailed in this country. This has enabled literally hundreds of thousands of farmers to save their homes.

The production credit corporations have furnished current credit to the farmer at the lowest interest rates that ever prevailed in this country. The same thing is true in the financing of cooperatives.

At the beginning of this administration about 10 percent of the farm homes had the benefit of electricity. Most of these homes were located near the great industrial centers. Now more than 25 percent of the farm homes of the United States have the benefit of this fine labor-saving commodity, and the lines which have been financed stretch into the distant communities far away from the busy marts of trade.

Some of the critics charge that the farmers have been "sold down the river," but they fail to tell when this was done or who made the sale. The sale was made when the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill was enacted in 1930. Coming as it did, it began the slow process of destroying our world trade, thus leaving the surplus-producing farmer stranded.

For several years we have been buying surplus farm commodities and distributing them to low-income groups. I am rather proud of the fact that Senator TOM CONNALLY and I were joint authors of what is known as section 32, which provides the funds for distribution of these surpluses both at home and abroad. Under this provision and under supplemental funds made available for the same purpose, the so-called stamp plan has been put into effect. This plan serves a triple purpose: It tends to assist in the handling of the surplus. It furnishes supplies for the low-income groups. It also stimulates work through regular channels from the tillage of the soil to the final work of distribution of the finished product.

Compared to the situation that existed in 1933, agriculture has made remarkable progress. The tillers of the soil are still short of equality, but they are on the road, and we propose to help them stay on that road.

The national farm program is part and parcel of our national life. It is thoroughly justified as an offset to the tariff, in which the surplus-producing farmer can have no part. In the years to come it will be even more vital to our national welfare than it has been in the past.

The farmers have demonstrated that they can manage their own affairs. The program has been handled largely through committees of farmers in the great stretches that constitute rural America. So long as the details of the program are handled by the farmers they are assured of a sympathetic administration.

Every dollar that has been paid to the farmers has gone back into the channels of trade. It has stimulated business activity everywhere. The program is being improved from year to year through suggestions made by the farmers themselves and by those who are working with them. It is no time to turn back. It is no time to surrender the progress that has been made. Any changes that are to be, any improvements in the program, should be made by those who are friendly to the cause.

Farmers, which do you prefer—the political party of broken promises or a political party that promises and performs?

Amendment of the National Labor Relations Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABE MURDOCK

OF UTAH

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 11, 1940

STATEMENT OF GEORGE Q. LYNCH, GENERAL PRESIDENT OF PATTERN MAKERS LEAGUE OF NORTH AMERICA

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Mr. Speaker, there was delivered at my office this morning a written statement, dated June 10, made by George Q. Lynch, general president of the Pattern Makers League of North America. After investigation, I find that the Pattern Makers League of North America is one of the oldest affiliates of the American Federation of Labor; that its members are highly skilled craftsmen.

When the letter from President Green, of the A. F. of L., was read by Congressman HOWARD W. SMITH, of Virginia, during the debate on the Smith amendments, to put it mildly, I was shocked. It seemed to me that President Green had absolutely reversed himself in taking the position he did in this now famous letter. In my remarks, I stated that it was my opinion that his attitude, as set out in his letter, certainly could not reflect the attitude of the majority of the rank and file of the great American Federation of Labor. I am still of this opinion. The statement issued by Mr. Lynch very emphatically supports my position. I thought that the statement of Mr. Lynch would be of interest to all members of the House who might have been persuaded to vote for the Smith amendments as a result of the letter from President Green. The statement follows:

That all Trojan horses do not carry the colors of one stable is evidenced in the "blitzkrieg" pulled by the top command of the A. F. of L. by joining forces with recognized reactionaries to destroy labor's front-line defenses established by the National Labor Relations Act.

This move was preceded by all the solemn promises to respect understandings and agreements always given prior to the application of the modern "blitzkrieg." If we are to deal effectively with this technique, working men and women must face the facts. Here is the record:

The 1938 convention of the A. F. of L. listened to a bill of grievances against the members of the National Labor Relations Board. By action of that convention a three-man committee was appointed to consider amendments to the Wagner Act. This committee was not empowered to submit definite amendments to the Congress based upon its own arbitrary conclusions. This was wise, because one member of that committee has a consuming passion for opposing all governmental assistance for labor, with special emphasis on New Deal assistance.

This committee met, with advice of counsel, and drew up concrete amendments to the Wagner Act. It is not denied, but admitted, that representatives of employer groups were consulted by committee counsel and even contributed suggestions for improving the act from the viewpoint of their clients.

Not to be hampered or delayed by the processes of incompetent democratic procedure, the committee did not consult the executive council on their proposals, but submitted their handiwork direct to Senator WALSH to be dropped in the Senate hopper.

The executive council, which was to meet only a few days later, was thus left with the alternative of signing on the dotted line or displaying division in top rank A. F. of L. leadership. Perhaps because C. I. O. was then pressing hard on all flanks the executive council accepted the first alternative, but not without considerable internal heat.

Before this meeting of the executive council, in January 1939, but after the amendments had been submitted in the Senate, the Pattern Makers League called attention to the dangerous provisions of many of the amendments from the viewpoint of working people who work.

Our league offered no objection to efforts aimed at removing biased members of the Board. We favored the position, however, that this could be accomplished under the existing law and without danger to the act itself. We outlined the method.

We did not then, nor do we now, consider the Board biased because of its efforts to deal vigorously with such men as Ford, Rand, Weir, Girdler, and Gene Grace who were then, and still are, openly flouting the law of the land. The Supreme Court to date has supported this viewpoint on Board actions and orders.

The membership reaction against these proposed A. F. of L. amendments was so pronounced that they were dropped, in public statements, until only three remained defended. These were incorporated in the Norton amendments and publicly approved by the A. F. of L.

Even at this juncture our league held to its position that opening the act for any amendments in this Congress was not only inexpedient, but downright dangerous, to the best interest of labor.

Following investigation of the Labor Board by a special House committee, Congressman HOWARD SMITH then introduced committee amendments to the Wagner Act. We were promptly assured by the A. F. of L. that the Smith amendments would not be approved by the federation. One important A. F. of L. international union immediately opposed them "lock, stock, and barrel."

In an N. B. C. broadcast, date of February 17, 1940, President William Green stated:

"Now, I want to make clear the position taken by the American Federation of Labor with regard to certain amendments proposed and sponsored by some employers' associations. We are against them. We will oppose them with our full strength. We will try to do our utmost to see to it that both political parties adopt a progressive attitude with regard to the National Labor Relations Act."

To this clear statement of position we added our "amen."

This statement was certainly accepted to mean opposition to any amendments proposed by HOWARD SMITH, the recognized spokesman for "employers' associations" in the Lower House.

The record now shows that with a few unimportant exceptions, which will cause no chagrin to the smug satisfaction of Congressman SMITH and the interests he represents, the A. F. of L. top leaders have endorsed the Smith program "cap-a-pie."

The outstanding features of the Smith amendments provide the following in terms important to those affected.

The term "employee" is redefined for purposes of reinstatement with back pay. This is only a political gesture against sit-down strikes. Public opinion and the Supreme Court liquidated the sit down 2 years ago.

However, under another Smith amendment, endorsed by the A. F. of L., a violation of law by employers is not a violation of law unless it is a preponderant violation. Slapping around one active union man at a time in an industry employing 5,000 would hardly be construed as preponderant opposition to unionism.

Moreover, no Board decision against an employer can be made to stick until the employer has been given every opportunity for artful legalistic dodging and stalling before a United States Court of Appeals. For many long years labor has struggled to get labor relations out of courts. This amendment reverses our time-honored battle and throws us back into courts by statutory provision. Any organization rightfully expects its members to follow defined policy. This sudden shift into reverse gear however, leaves the subordinate staff confused and wondering: "Where do we go from here?"

In the 1938 convention the A. F. of L. properly condemned the Board for delayed decisions. This court of appeals amendment will delay decisions to a degree that will make the Board's record of performance resemble speed lightning by comparison.

And by way of applying bigger and better brakes against too much speed in the interest of labor the Smith amendments, endorsed by the A. F. of L., will divide the functions of the Board into two parts by placing in the hands of one man the arbitrary right to investigate and prosecute all complaints against alleged unfair employers. We await the appointment of the paragon of wisdom and virtue who will fulfill such duties to the satisfaction of all parties at interest.

But why go on? All of the Smith amendments were designed for one single purpose: To hamstring the legitimate efforts of organized labor. They are so bad that they never could have passed the lower House without A. F. of L. endorsement to serve as camouflage for their real intent and purpose.

We have repeatedly said that opening the National Labor Relations Act for amendments in this Congress would lead to emasculation of the rights of labor under the act. We said this however, without knowledge or thought that our own parent body would become an accessory before the fact.

June 7, 1940, will be remembered as a dark day in American labor history. Let the record show that the Pattern Makers League of North America was not even a silent or indifferent partner to the intrigue.

The law must now go to the Senate. A righteously aroused membership should send a veritable barrage of protests to their Senators. There must be no black-out of our newly acquired industrial freedom to belong to, and be active in, unions of our own choosing.

We give it as our opinion that this vote in the lower House, and the cooperation which supported it, will be more revealing than effective. The proposals still have to pass the Senate and be signed by the President to make them law.

Much to the expressed dissatisfaction of some seeking special privileges, the President of the United States stands as a bulwark to protect the underprivileged. Therein lies our safety against effective aggression of "blitzkriegs" to destroy labor's hard-won human rights.

Congressman SMITH's proudest boast is that he has never voted in favor of a single measure which aimed to benefit labor. Congressman SMITH voted for these amendments. He still maintains his antilabor record unblemished.

What the Stars and Stripes Stand For

HON. THOMAS C. HENNINGS, JR.

OF MISSOURI

EDITORIAL FROM THE ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of Sunday, June 9, 1940:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of June 9, 1940]

WHAT THE STARS AND STRIPES STAND FOR

It is fitting that we should be asked to display the national colors this week—Flag Week. Yet this act can have little meaning without the realization that the flag is only a symbol—a symbol for America.

America is more than a flag, more than an anthem, more than patriotic oratory. It is more, even, than—

"THIS LAND

"My own Manhattan with spires, and the sparkling and hurrying tides, and the ships,
The varied and ample land, the South and the North in the light, Ohio's shores and flashing Missouri,
And ever the far-spreading prairies cover'd with grass and corn."

America is the sum total of many, many men and women, great and small, quick and dead. It is the sum total of the things they did and are doing to make democracy work. It is action. It is work undertaken to give substance to ideals.

America is George Washington forsaking the plow at Mount Vernon for the cold and the hunger of Valley Forge. It is Thomas Jefferson, with no taste for public office and a skin too thin for the acrimony of politics, accepting that office and enduring that acrimony for the sake of high duty. It is Abraham Lincoln taking up the sword to save the Union, and then bidding the States to bind up their wounds "with malice toward none, with charity for all." America is the sum total of its heroes giving meaning to Jefferson's inalienable rights: life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

But, perhaps even more, America is a great host of lesser figures with less glamorous histories—men who saw tasks that needed to be done and did them, men who saw wrongs that cried to be righted and righted them.

There are, for example, the able and far-sighted administrators like Albert Gallatin, Jefferson's Secretary of the Treasury. This French-Swiss immigrant, who never learned to speak good English, not only put an end to the congressional custom of making lump-sum appropriations without designating the specific purposes for which public money was to be used, but he also introduced the present system of Treasury reports, halved the national debt, financed the War of 1812, and became the father of Federal aid for the building of our great network of roads that he saw to be necessary for binding together a great country.

Then there are the men of righteous anger like Benjamin H. Bristow of Kentucky, whom Grant unwittingly called to the Secretary of the Treasury. Bristow was horrified to see how greedy hands were looting the public coffers. Investigation soon convinced him that the distillers of St. Louis were paying taxes on only a third of the whisky that left their warehouses. That was the beginning of the exposure of the Whisky Ring. The trail of bribery led to the White House itself. Bristow obtained more than 250 indictments in St. Louis, Chicago, and Milwaukee, but convictions, unfortunately, were few, and he lost his own post for his zeal.

But Bristow's work was not in vain. He became one of the first soldiers in a great crusade that took form as the Nation's growing wealth tempted the buccaneers to make corruption part of the warp and woof of America. The New York Sun exposed Oakes Ames and the Credit Mobilier scheme, which cost the United States millions of acres of land and millions of dollars, ostensibly given for building our first transcontinental railroad, but actually siphoned into the pockets of the robber barons. Here in St. Louis, Joe Folk fought Butlerism. In New York, the lances were raised against the Tweed ring. Only the other day, Boss Pendergast left the Federal penitentiary at Leavenworth. The prosecution of the heirs of Huey Long is current history in Louisiana. So the crusade continues on one front and another.

Courage is perhaps the best synonym for the concept of America—courage as it was exemplified by old Bob La Follette and Nebraska's George Norris and their little band as they stood up in the Senate in 1917 and faced the stormwind and the tempest in a vain effort to keep us out of the first World War, steadfastly shielding the last spark of reason and conviction against all-engulfing hysteria.

America means a less spectacular kind of courage, too. It means the kind of courage that enabled the elder La Follette and his sons after him to make Wisconsin a model of honest and advanced government, the kind of courage that kept Senator Norris fighting for his Tennessee Valley dream until it became a reality, the kind of courage that sent a Jane Addams into the slums of Chicago to establish Hull House, as a model for so many projects that are making concrete the hope and promise of the Bill of Rights.

More important than anything else, perhaps, America means a high sense of justice, a scrupulous respect for the rights of all, even the most unpopular minorities—a sense of justice such as that of John Peter Altgeld, Illinois' eagle forgotten. There was something in the destiny of this man that would not allow him to settle into the comfortable life of a small-town Missouri lawyer. There was something that drove him on to Chicago and the executive mansion in Springfield. There, in the face of the most articulate and powerful elements in the State, he pardoned those Haymarket rioters who had not been hanged. That was in 1893, and the next year, before the hue and cry had subsided, he bitterly protested against President Cleveland's unconstitutional use of Federal troops in Chicago's Pullman strike. Altgeld was hounded into poverty and almost into obscurity. But not quite. Vachel Lindsay was able to say to his spirit:

"A hundred white eagles have risen, the sons of your sons,
The zeal in their wings is a zeal that your dreaming began.
The valor that wore out your soul in the service of man."

America, of course, is Holmes, and Brandeis, and Cardozo, the judges, shaping the law to the will of the people. It is also Brandeis, the advocate, pleading for decent working conditions for the women of Oregon, and striving with his insurance system to assure the workers of Massachusetts the secure enjoyment of the fruits of their toil in the twilight of their years.

America, too, is the educators—Mark Hopkins on his log and Robert Hutchins in his Gothic tower, working, in Jefferson's words, "to diffuse knowledge more generally through the mass of the people, realizing that knowledge is power, and that in a democracy power belongs to the many, not to the few."

And America also is the writers—Tom Paine and Harriet Beecher Stowe and John Steinbeck, those with the power of words that move men.

America is also the great legion of the unnamed. It is the Quaker doctor and nurse and teacher going up into the hills of Kentucky. It is the labor organizer defying tar and feathers in the almost feudal pockets of the southern hills. It is the employer who cheerfully complies with a wage-hour law and a Wagner Act. It is the good citizen who makes an honest income-tax return and marks an intelligent ballot each election day.

There is no need to call the roll longer. America is all those who know how to make democracy work, all those who know that their duty is to do the task at hand.

This America is more than a flag. It would be great without any banner or anthem or slogan. And no mere salute to a bit of bunting, no mere singing of a song, is sufficient to make any man a part of this America. Patriotism is in the deed, not in the symbol.

Will Want to Know

HON. ROBERT W. KEAN

ARTICLE FROM THE NEWARK (N. J.) SUNDAY CALL

Mr. KEAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Newark (N. J.) Sunday Call:

WILL WANT TO KNOW

The new income-tax law being prepared in Congress to raise an additional billion dollars in Federal revenue is the beginning of the end of happy days for the groups which have been draining the Treasury. It will lower exemptions for single persons to $800 and for married persons to $2,000.

The new law will create 2,000,000 new income-tax payers, make 2,000,000 more Americans aware of the cost of their Government. When they go on the tax rolls they will want to know more about these billions being poured out to reliefers, to farmers, to veterans, for housing, new dams, municipal power plants, swimming pools, and all the other things which are nice to have if you can afford it.

As a starter, these 2,000,000 new income-tax payers, many of them earning as little as $17 a week, will probably want to know what economies are going to be made in the Budget that goes into effect in July. Nobody will mind being taxed for the Nation's defense, provided money isn't being wasted elsewhere.

They may even ask, these $18 and $20 a week taxpaying wage earners, why W. P. A. should not be abandoned in favor of a direct relief system. If it is to be continued, they will want to know what it is doing to retrain the unemployed for work in defense industries and why there aren't places for some of them in the Army and Navy.

Unpreparedness in 1917

EDITORIAL FROM THE NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial from the New York Herald Tribune of June 2, 1940.

[From the New York Herald Tribune of June 2, 1940]

UNPREPAREDNESS IN 1917

The United States went to war with Germany on April 6, 1917. In December 1917—8 months later—we had 165,000 men in France, some of whom sailed without rifles and were totally devoid of artillery, airplanes, tanks, machine guns, trench mortars, and other munitions and supplies produced in the United States. Through 19 months Pershing fought our war abroad almost wholly from first to last with guns, munitions, airplanes, hand grenades, and materials either borrowed or bought from the Allies in Europe.

The Ordnance Department at Washington spent nearly $4,000,000,000 from April 1917 to June 1918, in an effort to build 20,000 guns of all calibers and equip them with munitions. The Civil War was fought for less. Despite this truly vast expenditure and effort only 133 guns and 600 shells of a single caliber reached Pershing in time for use at the front.

The Allies had perfected an effective hand grenade. The War Department rejected this and placed orders for 20,000,000 distinctive American hand grenades. These, however, were too complicated and Pershing bought hand grenades for our troops from the British.

We spent more than a billion dollars in our 1917–18 aviation effort. No American fighting plane ever reached the front. A few American-made observation planes appeared in France and these were so badly constructed, clumsy, and dangerous that our flyers dubbed them "flaming coffins." The Allies had produced some good fighter planes and sought to turn over to us all plans for expeditious mass production. However, we rejected these planes which had come from the laboratory of actual war and decided to produce typically American motors and planes with wasteful result.

The War Department spent $116,000,000 on gas for our chemical-warfare units in France, yet Pershing fired only gas bought from the Allies.

We built three picric-acid plants and seven more plants to produce phenol required for picric, and all of these produced nothing for use in the war.

We built a powder plant at Nitro, W. Va., for $70,000,000; a plant at Nashville, Tenn., for $90,000,000; and nitrate plants at Sheffield, Ala.; Muscle Shoals, Ala.; Toledo, Ohio; Perryville, Md.; and Cincinnati costing $116,000,000, and all of these produced not 1 pound of powder or nitrates for use in the war. After the war these plants were sold for a salvage value which was a crime against the American taxpayer.

The War Department planned for an Army of 4,000,000 men and 86,000 horses. For these were ordered 41,000,000 pairs of Army shoes; 50,000 sets of double harness; 110,000 sets of single harness; 945,000 saddles; 2,800,000 halters; 1,500,000 horse brushes; 2,000,000 feed bags; 1,000,000 horse covers; and 195,000 copper branding irons. These figures are not hearsay; they were developed in the course of a Senate investigation of war preparations.

Railroads taken over by the Government in 1917 had been paying stockholders a billion dollars annually, but the administration deficit at the end of 2 years was $1,350,000,000. The taxpayers received the deficit, stockholders nothing.

The Government spent about $1,200,000,000 on Army cantonments for troops in training on the cost-plus plan by which the Government paid for all materials and labor, leaving efficiency and economy to contractors. These camps cost millions more than necessary in excess labor and wasted materials.

About $50,000,000 was spent on spruce production for airplanes, yet 92.6 percent of all spruce used for this purpose was bought independently of the main project. Railroads to carry spruce lumber were built at a cost of about $10,000,000 and were not used.

Some of the port terminals built were never used.

It might be well for those who are assigned to the pressing job of rebuilding American armaments in 1940 and 1941 to extract from the Senate records and read the evidence taken by its investigating committee early in 1918 when charges were openly made that "the Military Establishment of the United States has fallen down" because of "inefficiency in every bureau and in every department of the United States." Senator Chamberlain, a Democratic Member of the Senate investigating committee, made the above charges in a speech in New York and added, "I speak not as a Democrat, but as a citizen of the United States."

We are now approaching a somewhat similar period in American history. A mighty effort at rearmament for national defense must be made. The American public will again want action, will undergo sacrifices to obtain action but above all it will demand capacity on the part of those who will be called to serve.

Brief for H. R. 9381

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SAM HOBBS

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 11, 1940

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker: First. National defense cannot be made adequate without adequate rail and water ways.

The United States is a land of vast distances. No one can predict where there may be need to concentrate men, munitions, and war matériel.

From time to time the place for such concentration may shift.

No matter how many tanks and guns, no matter how much ammunition we may manufacture, we must be prepared to haul them where we want them when we want them.

A railroad is no better than its bridges.

A water way is no better than its clearances.

Second. Neither can peacetime transportation service be adequate without adequate rail and water ways.

Third. Railways are no longer able to build bridges to serve, not only their own needs, but also the expanding needs of their competing carriers, the waterways.

The situation of the railroads presents a serious problem, as everybody familiar with the subject admits. Looking at the figures for the past 5 years, it appears that with the exception of the year 1935, the railroads have never earned as much as 2 percent upon their investment. In 1938, after payment of fixed charges, there was a deficit of $123,000,000, which may be compared with an income in 1930 of $524,000,000. It is true that conditions were somewhat improved in 1939, when there was a net income after fixed charges had been paid of $95,000,000.

On the whole, however, the situation of the railroads was well expressed by President Roosevelt in his Salt Lake City speech, made on September 17, 1932, when he said:

> Now, there is no reason to disguise the fact that the railways as a whole are in serious difficulty.

I may call attention also to the statement made by the President in that same speech, devoted as it was to the railroad question, where he said:

> The problem of the railroads is the problem of each and every one of us. No single economic activity enters into the life of every individual as much as do these great carriers.

The situation is further illustrated by the fact that at the present time 109 railroad companies of all classes are undergoing reorganization, either through the process of receivership or bankruptcy. These 109 companies operate 77,414 miles of railroad or 31 percent of the total railway mileage of the country.

The situation of the railroads, particularly with respect to impaired railroad credit, was such that the President of the United States, in the spring of 1938, appointed a special committee, composed of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, a representative of the Department of Commerce, the Administrator of the Farm Security organization, a representative of the Security Owners Association, a representative of railroad management, a representative of railroad labor and three members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to make a study of the transportation problem, particularly as it affected railroads.

In the message delivered to the Congress by the President, bearing date of April 11, 1938, in transmitting to Congress the recommendations of this committee, the President referred to the fact that the problem of railroad transportation had become increasingly difficult. In the report made to the President and by the President transmitted to Congress, the three members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, as shown by House Document No. 583, Seventy-fifth Congress, third session, fully recognized the serious situation of the railroads, saying, among other things:

> The continuing decline in the spread between revenues and expenses, along with the current loss of traffic, have, generally speaking, resulted in the destruction of railroad credit. Few railroads are in a position to borrow. With earnings so largely consumed in paying operating expenses, taxes, and other obligations, little is available for improving plant no matter how necessary such improvement may be. The railroad plant, especially its equipment, is constantly wearing out or becoming obsolete. Efficient operation requires constant renewal and replacement. To the extent such renewal and replacement are impeded, transportation efficiency is lessened and cost is increased.

In the fall of 1938, after the railroads had been defeated in their effort to secure a decrease in the wage rate, the President appointed a committee of six persons connected with the railroad industry, three of these being railroad presidents and three being railroad labor executives. In making this appointment, the President is quoted by the New York Herald Tribune as saying, at a press conference on September 20, 1938, in substance that the question of wage reduction is subordinate for the time being to the broad question of railroad rehabilitation. He pointed out that he had made recommendations for railroad rehabilitation at the last session of Congress, but that Congress had adjourned without enacting any laws helpful to the railroad, one-third of which are already in bankruptcy. It is a well-known fact that the President requested this Committee of Six to bring forward recommendations which would represent a forward step in the matter of railroad rehabilitation.

The Committee of Six, after very careful consideration of all factors entering into the problem, made a series of concrete recommendations, one of which had to do with the reconstruction of bridges and other facilities. The language of the Committee in summarizing its recommendation was:

> Adoption of policy that whenever, in connection with the improvement of navigable waters * * * a railroad is required to alter or reconstruct bridges or other facilities, it be reimbursed by the Government for all costs in excess of any direct benefit accruing to it.

This recommendation went to the President under date of December 23, 1938.

In the hearings which were had on a bill which is substantially the same as H. R. 9381, held by a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Commerce on May 17, 1939, a table was introduced showing that certain railroads shown in the table, over a period of years, had expended $48,209,756 in rebuilding and relocating bridges at the command of the Federal Government. The table further showed that of this amount, $28,480,267 was expended for the improvement of navigation and $17,890,528 was expended for the improvement of railroad facilities. In other words, in the period of years covered by the table, the railroads have been called upon to pay practically $28,500,000 to improve water transportation, without any benefit whatever to the facilities of the railroads from the viewpoint of railroad transportation.

It is only necessary to call attention to the extended hearings held by the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, extending from January 24, 1939, to March 30, 1939, to understand the serious situation of the railroads and the necessity for giving relief wherever that can be done without sacrifice of the public interest. Particular attention may be called to the testimony of Commissioner Splawn and to the tables which he there introduced, showing that for the first 11 months of 1938 the class I railroads of the country incurred a deficit of $145,277,364, and that among the deficit railroads in that period were such important lines as the Atlantic Coast Line; Baltimore & Ohio; Boston & Maine; Chicago & North Western; Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul & Pacific; Missouri Pacific; New York Central; New York, New Haven & Hartford; Northern Pacific; Pere Marquette; St. Louis-San Francisco; Seaboard Air Line; Southern Railway; Southern Pacific; and many others which could be mentioned. As stated previously, the 1939 showing is a little better, but the conditions which brought about the improvement were attributable to a stimulated and temporary improvement, due to war conditions abroad.

Fourth. H. R. 9381, the Truman-Hobbs bill, simply fixes these facts and provides the only practical remedy.

There is no question but that the Army engineers have the power to order the repair, remodeling, improvement, relocation, or rebuilding of any railroad bridge crossing a navigable steam, if the needs of navigation so require.

This bill simply requires that in the exercise of this power, a hearing be given to interested parties and that the Army engineers shall ascertain the equities in the event they find it necessary to order the improvement of a railway bridge.

In such event the bill requires the Army engineers to charge the bridge owner with "such part of the cost of the improvement as is attributable to the direct and special benefits which will accrue to the bridge owner as a result of the alteration, including the expectable savings in repair or maintenance costs. And that part of the cost attributable to the requirements of traffic by railroad or highway, or both, including any expenditure for increased carrying capacity of the bridge, and including such proportion of the actual capital cost of the old bridge or of such part of the old bridge as may be altered or changed or rebuilt, as the used service life of the whole or a part, as the case may be, bears to the total estimated service life of the whole or such part:".

The United States is required to bear "the balance of the cost, including that part attributable to the necessities of navigation."

Of course, other contingencies are provided for. The benefits to any highways must be borne by the proprietor of the highway. Where a relocation or alteration is desirable from the standpoint of the owner of a park, for instance, the park owner is required to participate in defraying the expense.

Essentially, the bill is sound, fair, and altogether equitable. It charges every proper element of cost against the railways which should be borne by them. The Government is required to bear whatever the residue of cost may be after all the deductions have been made. Bear in mind, the basis of the order for the improvement is the needs of navigation. Therefore, since a perfectly good railroad bridge, adequately serving railway needs, is to be remodeled solely because of the needs of the competing carrier, it is manifest that navigation should be taxed with an equitable share of the cost.

Whatever this equitable share may be is left to determination of the Army engineers. This is fair. The Nation gets the benefit both for peacetime service and for national defense. The Nation should be willing to pay what its own Army engineers certify to be equitable.

Fifth. The bill is the product of 4 years' hard work.

The authors, the Interstate Commerce Committees of both House and Senate, and their experts, after full hearings upon every phase of the transportation problem, many consultations with competent advisers, have produced a bill which has no "bugs" in it.

A very similar bill was passed by both Houses of Congress last year, but was vetoed by the President after Congress adjourned.

This year the President suggested certain amendments. These have been included in the present bill.

It has the cordial support of every one of the 21 railway brotherhoods; the unanimous and cordial support of the President's "committee of 6"; all of the railways; both committees, both Houses of Congress and, by analogy, of the Supreme Court.

This bill, as its preceding version, follows the philosophy set forth by the Supreme Court of the United States in its decision in the case of N. C. & St. L. Rwy. Co. v. Walter (294 U. S. 405), relating to the alalogous problem arising there in the elimination of grade crossings. There is no distinction in principle between the equities arising from the elimination of a grade crossing where a highway intersects a railway, and the equities arising from the improvement of a railway bridge which crosses a navigable stream. Hence the application of the philosophy of the Walters case to the problem thought to be equitably solved by this bill.

The proponents of the bill are clearly convinced that there will not be any great cost entailed upon the Government by making this bill law. The railroads have already, under the orders of the Army engineers, rebuilt or altered a considerable number of the bridges which might otherwise come within its purview. The railroads have already thus expended over $28,000,000 for the improvement of navigation out of a total of forty-eight million they were compelled thus to expend. There should not be a great many more of similar expenditures to be required. But whether much or little, the Government cannot be required under this bill to pay one cent until it has been certified, after full hearing, by its own Army engineers, that the Government's contribution is necessary for the improvement of navigation.

This bill will not cost the Government a cent unless the Government's expenditure is both necessary and right. If any expenditure meets this criterion it should be made.

We know how exceedingly engrossed in foreign affairs the President is. We have no criticism of his vetoes of this bill. We know that other things are uppermost in his mind. But we sincerely believe that this bill will militate to the distinct advantage of the national defense which is at this time the preeminent consideration of every American.

Sine Die Adjournment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GUY L. MOSER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 11, 1940

PART OF AN EDITORIAL FROM THE READING TIMES

Mr. MOSER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following from the Reading (Pa.) Times:

LET CONGRESS STAY AND SAW WOOD

Just at the time when everybody else is being urged to work harder and to slug away all the more earnestly at important business, Congress proposes to pack up and go home.

Month after month of work is tiresome for Congressmen, it is said. So it is for all of us. Congressmen have campaigning to do this fall, they protest. The country isn't interested in that.

The country is interested in getting its work done.

The country is interested in seeing that the armament program is actually followed through and results shown.

The country is interested in seeing that arrangements are made to pay for armament. It is ready to be taxed for security.

For Congress merely to appropriate any requested number of billions of dollars and then go gaily home is not good enough.

Congress may have its faults. But they are the faults of the people. Congress is the people in action. To argue that its presence in Washington would somehow hamper and handicap the preparedness efforts seems foolish. We have not yet reached the point which England reached when it turned everything over to Churchill.

Congress is highly valuable in times like these as a sort of national listening post and broadcasting station in Washington. Its presence should have a steadying influence on the President, a constant reminder that he is responsible to the people, a constant source of strength in the thought that the "other half of the defense team" is still pulling.

A tax bill to take care of increased military expenditures should be passed before Congress adjourns. The old political belief always was that to levy taxes in an election year was unpopular. This year things are different. The Nation is aroused. It may be more unpopular not to levy taxes than to levy them.

The European situation cannot be predicted 24 hours in advance. The rise of any morning's sun may look upon some completely unforeseen situation. Congress, direct representative of the people, should be on hand, not at the discretion of the President to recall it, but because, like everybody else these days, it is sticking to its job.

The Newfoundland Fish Deal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RALPH O. BREWSTER

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 11, 1940

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, the Newfoundland fish deal has been ended by the action of the Congress in passing a bill making it impossible to import free of duty fish processed in Newfoundland.

This act became a law today and the fishermen of Maine and New England may breathe a little easier.

Some measure of protection has been achieved although much still remains to be done.

The Newfoundland fish deal became a matter of Nation-wide interest and concern following the exposure of the plan on the floor of the House of Representatives on February 8, 1940.

In my speech on the subject that day I went in detail into the secret development of this project by securing changes in Treasury regulations with this program definitely in view.

STARTED IN STATE DEPARTMENT

The State Department first broached the matter to the Treasury, but a 164-page printed brief was later filed with the Customs Bureau by the corporation concerned to argue for this change, which would indicate there was considerable doubt as to its correctness. Otherwise why so much argument?

REDRESS REFUSED ON HEARING

An extended hearing was then held before the Customs Bureau, pointing out the disastrous effect to Maine fishermen of importing 15,000,000 pounds of fish from Newfoundland duty free and urging that the regulation be put back as it had been for many years. This was refused.

TWO-HUNDRED-THOUSAND-DOLLAR GRANT BY NEWFOUNDLAND

It appeared that an American concern which had already closed a fish plant at Vinalhaven had expended over $50,000 in developing this Newfoundland project and expected to spend $700,000 more and was to receive a grant of $200,000 from the Newfoundland Government "to take their fishermen off the dole," although it was going to put our fishermen out of business.

"AMERICAN FISH?"

The regulation proposed to call the Newfoundland catch "American fish" and thus let the fish in duty free, although they were caught in Newfoundland by Newfoundlanders, processed by Newfoundlanders, and sent to the United States in ships manned by Newfoundlanders.

PROTECTION FOR AMERICAN FISHERMEN

That proposal is now definitely terminated by legislation adopted by the House and Senate with the collaboration of all the Members of the Senate and House from Maine and New England.

MAINE FISHERIES ASSOCIATION

This shows again that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty. Some protection for America has been secured. Much remains still to be done. In this a militant Maine Fisheries Association can be a tremendous help.

United States History Supports Roosevelt in Dispute Over National Guard

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. SPARKMAN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 11, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE WASHINGTON POST

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a well-written newspaper article from the Washington Post of Sunday, June 9, 1940. This article by Mr. John G. Norris very ably discusses the matter of giving the President power to use the Reserve components of the Army.

Since this article was written the House Committee on Military Affairs has reported favorably the bill referred to, but only with great limitation.

The article is as follows:

[From the Washington Post of June 9, 1940]

UNITED STATES HISTORY SUPPORTS ROOSEVELT IN DISPUTE OVER NATIONAL GUARD

(By John G. Norris)

Some antiadministration circles call it "another Roosevelt grab for power" and demand that Congress be kept in session all year rather than grant it.

The Army says it is necessary for the proper defense of the Nation, so that it may act with free hands and in a businesslike way in case of trouble.

What is it all about, anyway, this congressional row over giving the President power to order out the National Guard?

Boiled down, the situation amounts to this:

Existing law provides two methods by which the National Guard can be brought into action when war threatens. One is when Congress declares a national emergency to exist, in which case the President "orders" the guard into Federal service. Under another statute, the President can "call out" the guard "whenever the United States is invaded or in danger of invasion" without any prior action by Congress.

The controversy is over a bill introduced by Chairman MAY, of the House Military Affairs Committee, at the request of President Roosevelt, which would permit the Chief Executive to order the guard into Federal service if he considers it necessary before Congress convenes next January. The House Military Committee had the measure under consideration all last week behind closed doors and is still deadlocked on the proposal.

Crux of the situation is that when the guard is ordered into Federal service it becomes a part of the Army of the United States and is under complete control of the Commander in Chief. It can be ordered anywhere in the world and is no longer subject in any way to State control. When "called out," however, there are certain restrictions on its use. It cannot be sent outside of the United States and it is still under some State control, all promotions, discharges, and recruiting being in the hands of the Governors of the 48 States.

"Ah," say opponents of the measure, "the President's purpose is revealed, he wants power to send troops overseas on some pretext or other. For he already has full power to mobilize the guard if the United States is attacked."

No, answers the Army, the situation is quite different. What we fear is trouble in South or Central America. Should a Nazi-Communist inspired "fifth column" uprising occur in Latin America and the country involved calls upon us for aid, there are not enough United States Regulars available to handle the situation, the Army chiefs state.

"By acting swiftly," Gen. George C. Marshall told the committee, "the conflagration might be put out with a fire extinguisher; while if we delay, it may be necessary to call out the whole fire department."

Probably only a small number of National Guard men would be needed in such a situation, say 20,000 to 30,000 to relieve Regulars stationed in Puerto Rico and the Panama Canal Zone, so the latter could be rushed to the scene of the trouble, Army heads argue. Why, then, should they have to wait for Congress to be called back to Washington when time is so important and a major mobilization is not involved?

The generals also point out how much red tape would be involved in having to deal with 48 Governors in handling the troops, getting replacements, promotions, relieving inefficient officers, etc.

The reluctance of the Army high command to rely on a force which is surrounded by legal restrictions and red tape is a natural conclusion, based upon the lessons of history. It is a phase of history that is not found in school textbooks. It is at time, ludicrous, but more often tragic.

Factual accounts of the wars in which the United States has been involved too often show battles or campaigns lost because the Army commander did not have full control of the militia supposed to be a part of his force. Battle plans often had to be changed because a State Governor was the real commander of such troops.

How the Army feels about the matter is well illustrated by an official publication issued for instruction of Reserve officers and civilian committeemen who would have charge of selective service in an emergency. The pamphlet paints an entirely different picture of the Revolutionary War than our schools teach.

"The militia by its very nature was completely unsatisfactory," it concludes. "The American Army was in constant danger of final disaster. * * * Because the Central Government lacked power to raise an effective army, the war dragged out for 7 years, during which the Americans employed a total of almost 400,000 men, while the greatest strength of the enemy in any one year (1781) was but 42,000."

During the War of 1812, history records that militia commanders, acting on the theory their force was supposed to be used only to repel invasion, three times refused to cross the Canadian border when ordered to do so.

On one occasion a force of Regulars was annihilated because the militiamen would not cross the border to come to their aid. During the same war, the Governor of Massachusetts refused to call out the militia of that State to fight the British.

Douglas Southall Freeman's great biography of Robert E. Lee and other histories of the Civil War tell of how often the Southern commander was thwarted by the refusal of a Governor to send some of his troops outside the State.

The Spanish-American War gives an illustration of the divided control of the militia which is almost comic opera. It is a tale of how the District of Columbia National Guard marched off to war and returned the same day, quite like the King of France and his 50,006 men "marching up the hill and down again."

The writer has often heard the story from an old friend, Lieut. Col. W. L. Hazard, Officers' Reserve Corps, who was then a corporal of the District militia.

"President McKinley called out the District troops on April 19, 2 days before Congress declared war on Spain," Colonel Hazard declares.

"We formed at the armory, which was on the site of the present Archives Building and marched up Pennsylvania Avenue with bands playing and crowds cheering.

"We went into camp on the Dalecarlia Reservoir to wait further orders. One of the War Department legal experts told the President he could not call out the Guard for service in Cuba. The orders were quickly revoked, and all of us went home for dinner that night."

Today the situation is somewhat different. In time of war or an emergency declared by Congress, the National Guard becomes an integral part of the Army, unimpeded by State control. But, argues the Army high command, Congress is not always in session and wars are no longer declared. The totalitarian nations strike without warning. "Fifth columns" pave the way.

Confidential reports received here from Latin America have official circles worried. They tell of undercover plans for Nazi uprisings should Germany win a quick victory over the Allies. A revolution in any country within bombing range of the Panama Canal by pro-Nazi forces would be a serious threat to the United States and one which would require instant action by the United States.

Yet the House Military Committee is said to be divided on the President's proposal, with the likelihood they will not recommend the bill except with limitations.

The issue seems to comprehend more than the immediate proposal. In a way it sums the whole challenge of the totalitarian states to the democracies. Can the latter, with their constitutional limitations on the powers of the Executive, and in the United States the added complications of States' rights, meet the dictators on their own ground?

We have seen that Great Britain and France have so far failed to do so. "Muddling through" seems quite inadequate to cope with the modern streamlined authoritarian state.

The question is whether democracy can meet the challenge and still retain its principles; whether authority can be granted to the Executive to act swiftly and still not give up our liberties. It is an issue that will arise time and again as the administration presses it preparedness program.

Some clear and nonpartisan thinking is required, not only of the House Military Committee men today but of all our leaders in the days that follow.

National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics' Need for a New Engine Research Laboratory

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 11, 1940

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, included in the supplemental national-defense appropriation bill for 1941 which will be under consideration Wednesday is an item of $2,000,000, with authority for contract authorization for $6,400,000 additional, for the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics.

Despite the fact that this committee's activities is not known even to all Members of Congress it has been in existence 25 years.

Without fear of contradiction I make the statement that no private or Government organization has even approached the record of this committee in its contributions to aeronautics. Today this committee has at Langley Field, Va., the outstanding research laboratory in the world. It has another in course of construction at Moffett Field, Calif.

This appropriation and authorization is for a new engine research laboratory.

During the Coolidge, Hoover, and Roosevelt administrations, not once but many times, I have joined with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] in assailing amendments to strike the appropriation for this activity from independent offices appropriation bills. Members ignorant of the outstanding achievements of this committee have sought to destroy it. Today you cannot find a man in this country interested in, or who has the least knowledge of aeronautics, who will not support my statement that the advancement of aviation in this country is due to the research work of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics.

The committee has now as its chairman, Dr. Vannever Bush. The members of the committee serve without compensation.

Dr. George W. Lewis is the Director of Aeronautical Research and one of the best informed men in the world in this line.

Col. Charles H. Lindbergh was for many years a member of the committee. His term expired last December and at his own request he was not reappointed. This, I think, was due to his interests in private corporations. Colonel Lindbergh took an active part in its deliberations until his separation from the committee and the value of his contributions cannot be estimated.

Mr. Speaker, I feel the Members of the House should know something about the proposed new research laboratory and the necessity for it. Therefore under the permission granted me I include as part of my remarks excerpts from the hearings before the Appropriation Committee. They follow:

Dr. BUSH. The National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics asks an authorization to the extent of $8,400,000 for an engine research laboratory.

This laboratory is not intended as a developmental laboratory, but is a research laboratory. It is intended to provide for aircraft engine research exactly what is provided by our Langley Field laboratories for airplanes. It is fundamental research. It is an engine research laboratory.

We have a small amount of engine research going on at Langley Field at the present time. There is considerable need for additional work in that line; or, as it is best expressed, if you will allow me to give you the opinion of General Arnold and Admiral Towers in regard to it, as follows:

General Arnold, Chief of the Army Air Corps, says in a letter to me dated March 5, 1940:

"Reference is made to the action taken at the last meeting of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics authorizing the submission to the Bureau of the Budget of an urgent supplemental estimate for the construction and equipment by the Committee of an aircraft engine research laboratory.

"Although I was a member of the special subcommittee that recommended this project, I wish to submit the matter from the standpoint of the Army Air Corps. The future needs of the Air Corps for better aircraft engines require that the Government take appropriate steps to provide adequate engine research facilities. I am convinced that the proposed engine research laboratory is necessary to furnish a proper balance between aerodynamic and engine research and that it is essential in order to bring about the needed progress in the improvement of aeronautic power plants in the United States.

"The need is definite and urgent and delay may prove costly. It is of great importance to the Army Air Corps that the proposed laboratory be placed in operation at the earliest possible date."

Admiral Towers, Chief of the Bureau of Aeronautics of the Navy Department, in a letter to me dated March 6, 1940, says:

"I have just examined the supplemental estimate of appropriation in the form in which you are about to submit it to the Bureau of the Budget for the construction and equipment of an aircraft engine research laboratory by the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics.

"As Chief of the Bureau of Aeronautics of the Navy Department it is my duty to provide the Navy with aircraft of the highest possible performance. Therefore, this project is of great significance to the Navy. The aircraft power plant is the heart of the airplane. It is largely around improved engines that aircraft of improved performance are designed.

"Engine research has not received sufficient attention in this ccuntry because adequate engine research facilities have not been available. It is my judgment, after careful study of this problem, that the most effective action that can be taken to meet this condition is to provide without delay for the construction and operation by the committee of an adequate aircraft engine research laboratory as proposed."

Mr. WOODRUM. At a total cost of $8,400,000?

Dr. BUSH. Yes.

NATURE OF PROPOSED LABORATORY

Dr. LEWIS. The engine research laboratory will consist of five major items. First will be the power-plant laboratory, including shops. That power-plant laboratory will provide for single-cylinder and multicylinder investigation to improve power output and economy.

There will be in that laboratory some fuels and lubricants research.

There will be in that laboratory facilities for supercharger research. This is the one important problem that we have right at the present time—the supercharger. The air war on the other side is a high-altitude war. The fighting is going on above 20,000 feet. Superchargers are essential to our airplanes now.

There are three types of superchargers. There is one type that is driven by the exhaust from the engine. Then there is the two-speed gear-driven supercharger and there is the two-stage supercharger, where compressed air from one stage is delivered to another stage for further compression. This whole field must be investigated to improve supercharger efficiency and range.

This laboratory will also have a section where studies will be made of the possibilities of recovery of waste heat from the exhaust of aircraft engines. The heat energy that is being lost through the exhaust is a very large proportion of the heat energy that is in the fuel. We are absorbing some of it now in the exhaust-type supercharger, but we are going to study the possibility of also doing it either by a gas turbine, by jet-propulsion methods, or by other methods.

The second item that we have is something that does not exist elsewhere in the world. It is very, very desirable. That is a power-plant wind tunnel. This wind tunnel will have a throat diameter of 25 feet and an air speed at sea level of 300 miles per hour. In it we can conduct research on engines up to 3,000 horsepower.

This wind tunnel will be evacuated to a density corresponding to 30,000 feet altitude. This tunnel will permit the study of the complete full-scale power plant under flight conditions, with the propeller operating, and using supercharging up to 30,000 feet. We can investigate the engine, supercharger, and propeller in this wind tunnel up to 30,000 feet and get the answer, rather than taking months in flight tests to obtain the most efficient combination of engine, supercharger, propeller, and nacelle installation.

At that altitude the speed in that wind tunnel will be 490 miles an hour.

That kind of research equipment does not exist anywhere in the world. That tunnel is going to take a little longer to build than the other units of the engine research laboratory. Research on the improving of the power output of engines to be used for the present procurement program is under way at Langley and will be transferred to the new station.

In the last 10 years the horsepower of engines has been doubled without increasing the size of the engine. Military airplanes must now fly at speeds of 400 to 500 miles per hour. To obtain these speeds the engine power must be further increased without increasing the over-all size of the engine. This problem is tied up definitely with the third unit of this laboratory, which is the fuels and lubricants laboratory.

This fuels and lubricants laboratory is a very important part of the whole picture. We have to have fuels of a high octane number of our engines will "burn up" at high-power output.

We have also to study safety fuels. The use of fuels of this character with a fuel-injection system must be studied. In this laboratory facilities will be provided for the investigation of new and better fuels for aircraft engines and new and better lubricants for high-power output.

We also have the problem in that laboratory of overcoming the deficiencies of the carburetor and using the fuel-injection system.

The laboratory will also be provided with an instrument laboratory for the construction and development of instruments required in connection with the measurement of fuel-air ratios and engine-operating conditions to find out in flight the actual operating conditions for maximum efficiency and safety.

Then the next item is an engine torque stand. After the information on the single cylinder and other units of the engine has been obtained the complete engine and propeller are investigated on a torque stand. It is not a very expensive piece of equipment. It has a horizontal air intake and a vertical exhaust. The air is supplied by the propeller. This torque stand will be capable of investigating a 4,000-horsepower aircraft engine.

There we can determine on the engine itself some ground conditions affecting the supercharging, the cooling, and the vibration characteristics of the whole power plant. We will also study the stresses in engine parts.

This problem is tremendously important, now that we are trying to get more power out of a given-size cylinder; and at the same time we have to find the metallurgical answer to take care of higher working stresses. We have to find better materials that will be able to withstand these stresses.

The next unit in the research laboratory will be the hangar and engine-flight test section. This equipment will consist largely of a brick and steel hangar, with certain special equipment, such as a thrust balance for ground adjustment and check of factors affecting power-plant thrust; special facilities for exchange and overhaul of aircraft engines; cooling-blower equipment for ground operation of installed engines over a period sufficient for check of new devices before flight. In the last analysis, the results of single-cylinder and multicylinder investigations must be a final check in flight. The hangar and its equipment are necessary for this purpose.

The laboratory will also include an administration building, with provision for heat, power, and water supply, and other facilities for the laboratory in general.

The total amount required is $8,400,000.

DISTRIBUTION OF ESTIMATE

Mr. WOODRUM. How much personnel is it going to take you to operate this laboratory?

Dr. LEWIS. Two hundred and twenty persons, at an annual operating cost for all purposes estimated at $650,000 per year.

Mr. WOODRUM. Did you have a break-down of this $8,400,000?

Dr. LEWIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOODRUM. Put that in the record at this point.

Dr. LEWIS. Yes, sir; the break-down is as follows:

Item 1. Power-plant laboratory and shops		$3,950,000
Building	$1,700,000
Equipment	2,250,000
Item 2. Power-plant wind tunnel		3,100,000
Item 3. Engine torque stands		200,000
Building	$150,000
Equipment	50,000
Item 4. Fuels, lubricants, and instruments laboratory		400,000
Building	$250,000
Equipment	150,000
Item 5. Hangar		200,000
Building	$180,000
Equipment	20,000
Item 6. Administration building		250,000
Building	$180,000
Equipment	70,000
Item 7. Miscellaneous: Heating, power, and water supply, roads, fences, fuel tanks		300,000
Total		8,400,000

Mr. LUDLOW. There is no governmental research of engines being done in the United States now? It is all done by private establishments, is it?

Dr. LEWIS. There is very little scientific research being done on engines in this country. Private establishments are concerned chiefly with development problems relating to their own engines. The aircraft engine research work that is being done at Langley Field represents the major portion of all fundamental research on aircraft engines in this country.

Mr. LUDLOW. And that is very limited?

Dr. LEWIS. That is very limited. The engine experimental laboratories at Wright Field and at the Naval Aircraft Factory are for developmental purposes.

Mr. LUDLOW. You propose to construct in connection with this research station a wind tunnel, do you not?

Dr. LEWIS. Yes, sir.

Dr. BUSH. This item is exceedingly important to the Nation's defense program. To assure improvement in the performance of American aircraft I believe that nothing is of greater importance.

Shall We Adjourn?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS E. MARTIN
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, June 11, 1940

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I submit the following:

SHALL WE ADJOURN?

A new morning dawns as evening approaches
And this is our plight as it finds us
The spenders are spent and spent lenders are lent
For defending fake cures that now ail us.

With world all aflame and Congress in session
We're told by F. D. we're not needed
The money and credit are all that he cov'ts
And so that's why our cry is not heeded.

Says Franklin "All rights now claimed by our Congress
Just sign away now as you're told to
Then get out of town and do not stay around
Or you'll get in my hair and I'll scold you."

Now shall we adjourn as war is approaching
And leave it to Franklin to guide us
To war unprepared and to war while we're scared
So that Franklin can rule as he wants to?

Oh no! Let's remain! Our country now needs us!
Let's stay on the job as we ought to,
To keep us from war and its horrible scar
And from all the disaster it leads to.

Our Congress should serve as danger approaches
Let's serve with our utmost devotion
The people who sent us to serve and dissent
From this dangerous course of our Nation.

Acquisition of Island Bases

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, June 12 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ARTICLES FROM VARIOUS NEWSPAPERS

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, several months ago I introduced a joint resolution authorizing the President of the United States to enter into negotiations with the Governments of France and Great Britain relative to the acquisition of islands in the Caribbean, the North Atlantic, and in other locations. During the past week I have from time to time clipped interesting newspaper articles in reference to this subject, which is of supreme interest at the present time. I ask unanimous consent that the articles referred to be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ISLAND BASES NEEDED
(By Ludwell Denny)

Immediate American acquisition of Allied possessions in the Caribbean and north Atlantic is essential to their and our defense, many here believe. The Senate Naval Affairs Committee recommends acquisition of more Caribbean air bases.

This would follow logically the President's warning to Congress of the short air distance from foreign bases to our mainland, and the Army and Navy testimony that any attacker would have to hold bases in this hemisphere.

Our occupation of the island bases would provide quick and effective defense, while the vast preparedness plan launched by the President will take from 2 to 4 years for completion.

Two-thirds of those questioned in the Gallup poll sometime ago favored trading the old war debts for those Allied strategic possessions, as proposed by Senator LUNDEEN.

Despite the President's sensational speeches of the last week there is little fear among experts that Germany could or would invade the United States. But there is fear of resumption of Nazi penetration in Latin America, and of German seizure of Allied strategic bases in that area—especially if Hitler wins in Europe.

That probably would mean war. The United States challenges German control over any area in this hemisphere. Transfer of sovereignty to a foreign power, of course, is forbidden by the Monroe Doctrine. But even indirect German control would be resisted by the United States.

To prevent any such eventuality, it is urged that this Government take preventive action now—with the consent of the Allied governments, Canada, and the Pan American republics—and for their benefit as well as our own.

Only the United States is able to protect the vital approaches to the North American mainland, the Panama Canal, and upper South America, which are: Greenland, Bermuda, the Bahamas, the Allied Caribbean possessions, and the Guianas. The Allies and Canada have their hands too full in Europe and the Latin American republics are unprepared.

The United States might not be strong enough to recapture those far-flung outposts from Germany if she "blitzkrieged" them or if they fell to her as the legal spoils of European victory. But our Army and Navy would be strong enough, if in actual occupation of those bases, to discourage German claims. One hundred of our planes based on those islands would be worth a thousand or more of our mainland planes.

As Colonel Lindbergh pointed out last night, not only bombers but a large army would be required to invade this country. But bombers and a very small force of parachutists and marines would be sufficient for German seizure of the now weak allied islands.

So long as the United States does not neutralize and protect those weak allied possessions and Greenland, they are a standing invitation to attack by German raiders with whom they are now officially at war. The very existence of belligerent territories in the Panama-Caribbean area is an anomalous menace to the safety and peace of the United States and the hemisphere.

If Germany defeats Britain and France—as she has already defeated Denmark (Greenland) and Holland (Dutch West Indies and Guiana)—the United States automatically would be brought at best into serious diplomatic and economic conflict with Hitler, and at worst into war. With Nazi minorities already strong in certain Latin American countries, even the threat of such a conflict might easily shatter the present uneasy Pan American solidarity—probably the worst blow of all to our natural defenses.

Confronted by a much less dangerous situation in the World War, Woodrow Wilson quickly acquired the strategic Virgin Islands from Denmark by purchase—and with the certainty that under military necessity he would take if he could not buy.

The Allies have no good reason to refuse to sell but excellent reasons to unload them on us. Economically most of them are a burden, as reported last year by the British colonial minister.

On the military side they are a liability to the Allies—assuming the Allies do not seek more conquest here. The Allies need elsewhere the ships, troops, and planes now inadequately guarding the American hemisphere.

Moreover, the Allies would profit by a wiping out of their old war debts to us and perhaps by the acquisition of gold—which we do not need and they need greatly.

The only legitimate arguments raised against such a solution are: (1) United States imperialism, and (2) rights of the natives. Both objections can be met completely by the United States acting as a mandate power for the 21 American republics.

Such a status would be preferable to present Allied imperialism in this hemisphere, which invites German imperialism here.

WEST INDIES ACQUISITION BY UNITED STATES HELD PREMATURE

A proposal by an English economist that some of the British West Indies be sold to the United States is considered premature by Chairman PITTMAN, Democrat, Nevada, of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Sir George Paish, who in the World War was economic adviser to the Chancelor of the Exchequer, suggested yesterday in a London speech that Britain exchange some of her insular possessions on this side of the Atlantic for American airplanes and pilots.

Any such trade, in Senator PITTMAN'S opinion, would be similar in nature to the resolution of Senator PEPPER, Democrat, Florida, for the sale of Government-owned airplanes to the Allies. The Pepper resolution was tabled by the Foreign Relations Committee yesterday, Senator PEPPER alone supporting the measure.

FEAR PLANE SALES

Some authorities felt that a direct sale of war planes by the Government itself would be in the nature of intervention and might be construed by Germany as an act of war.

Senator PITTMAN believes the Allies have plenty of money for the present to buy such materials as they need and can get in this country.

"I don't think the question of lack of gold exchange exists today," he said, "and it probably will not exist for at least a year.

"It would obviously be an advantage to the United States to have sovereignty over all the islands in the Caribbean or in the Atlantic adjacent to the United States. But this does not appear to me to be the proper time for consideration of such matters."

HAVE ENOUGH MONEY

Senator ELBERT THOMAS, Democrat, Utah, another member of the Foreign Relations Committee, said that in his opinion the Allies had money enough to keep up their purchases for at least 2 years.

"But if the British and French Navies appeared to be in danger of defeat, then it would be well for us to acquire the West Indies," he said.

"However, I think the purchase price should be applied against the war debts rather than be paid in cash. That would enable England and France to get credits in this country, after the war is over, since they would no longer be in default, and the Johnson Act would not operate against them as at present."

Senator THOMAS also suggested that Great Britain could build up dollar exchange by supplying the United States with reserve supplies of rubber and tin from British Malaya.

BAHAMAS VALUABLE TO US, ADMIRAL SAYS

Rear Admiral John H. Towers, Chief of the Naval Bureau of Aeronautics, said yesterday United States ownership of Bermuda, the Bahamas, and the British West Indies would be of great military value for air bases.

Representative JAMES W. MOTT (Republican, Oregon) raised the question of defense values of these islands now owned by Britain, but explained he was not asking the admiral to speak on matters of policy.

IN PAYMENT

"Possession of any islands that lend themselves to basing aircraft obviously would be of great military value," Admiral Towers said.

"Then," Representative MOTT commented, "I think it might be of advantage to Great Britain if she ceded them to us in payment, say, of the war debts."

BRITISH ISLANDS HERE COSTLY TO ENGLAND

Diplomatic quarters predicted today that fulfillment of congressional proposals to acquire British possessions in the Western Hemisphere would prove costly.

They recalled that the Royal West Indies Commission recently reported that such possessions face three major problems—overpopulation, depressed agricultural prices, and a need for broader social services—and recommended that Britain spend $5,000,000 annually for the next 20 years to improve conditions.

Senator ERNEST LUNDEEN (Farmer-Labor, Minnesota) advocates acquisition of a large number of foreign possessions in this hemisphere in settlement of World War debts. Senator ROBERT R. REYNOLDS (Democrat, North Carolina) has offered a resolution empowering the President to negotiate for the purchase of some of these islands.

The commission's report recommended that the British possessions' economic policies be reoriented to absorb population increases and advised that "whatever steps are practicable" be taken to improve agricultural exporting conditions.

BRITON FAVORS EXCHANGE OF ISLANDS FOR PLANES

LONDON, May 23.—Sir George Paish, economic adviser to the Chancellor of the Exchequer during the World War, yesterday proposed that Great Britain exchange some of her West Indies possessions for United States airplanes and pilots.

"The danger of not being able to command enough cash resources to buy what we need," he said, "is a matter of life and death."

CAN SPARE AN ISLAND

He said some Americans had suggested to him that Britain cede some of the West Indies colonies in payment of her war debt to the United States. He added that the time was perhaps more opportune than ever before.

"Surely out of this vast empire of ours," he said, "we can spare one or more of the West Indian Islands."

UNITED STATES DEAL FOR INDIES URGED—PAISH FAVORS GIVING ISLANDS FOR PLANES AND PILOTS

LONDON, May 23.—The United States should trade all the airplanes and pilots Great Britain needs for part of the West Indies, it was suggested yesterday by Sir George Paish, who was economic adviser to the Chancelor of the Exchequer and the Treasury in the World War.

Addressing members of the Sound Currency Association, he said Americans had previously suggested to him that Britain should give up part of her holdings in the West Indies in payment of her war debts. Perhaps the time is more opportune now than ever before for adopting that suggestion, he added.

"Surely out of this vast empire of ours we can spare one or more of the West India Islands in payment," he said.

Britain won the first phase of the war by keeping the seas open, he said, but where was she to get enough exchange to buy what she needed? The solution, he said, seemed to be exchanging some of the West Indies for United States airplanes and pilots.

America's Duty to Democracy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN THOMAS

OF IDAHO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 12 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial which appeared yesterday in the Washington News, which points out rather clearly, I think, that America's duty to democracy is to keep democracy working on this continent.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Daily News of June 11, 1940]

REALISM

Full-page newspaper advertisements appearing in many cities yesterday blazoned the line "Stop Hitler Now." They were signed by the "Committee To Defend America by Aiding the Allies," president of which is William Allen White, of Emporia, Kans., great editor and great citizen.

The appeal, like the prohibition experiment, was "noble in purpose." Otherwise it was not so good. The committee, for whose personnel and high purpose we have the greatest respect, might better be called the "Committee To Get America Into the War by the Back Door."

Some Americans, with every right to an opinion, honestly believe that we should now be in the war in Europe. This is not to debate that point. It is rather a plea for realism instead of emotion, and for consideration of the fact that all the armed democracies of Europe combined have not been able to stop Hitler's mechanized military might even with equipment 10 years ahead of anything we possess in quantity. "Stop Hitler Now"—what with? Our bare hands and the bared breasts of our youth?

Though the fact is not yet generally realized, Hitler has already determined the broad lines of our national life for at least another generation. Even with an ocean intervening, European totalitarianism has made obsolete our American way of life, temporarily at least; permanently unless we modernize our thinking and our national planning. Our country at present is not, as Mr. White's committee states, "still the most powerful nation on earth." To continue to think in terms which ignore the realities is to invite the disaster which has befallen European democracy.

We do not agree, but we respect the right of opinion of those who believe that we should be fighting with the European democracies today. Time may alter the situation, but today it seems inescapable that the surest way to help our friends in the European democracies is first to demonstrate to the dictators that we can help ourselves. Our present job is production for war, not participation in it. We must neither meddle nor muddle. Safety for, and service to, democracy, like charity, must begin at home. Mobilization of our national resources, our genius for mass production and our manpower, to insure a safe haven for democracy in America, will be the surest means of guaranteeing its ultimate revival in Europe.

Our immediate task is to show that our democracy can profit by the mistakes of others, and that the fire of liberty will be kept burning here. Our job today is not to stop Hitler. Our job is to start thinking. Thinking in terms of service to our country rather than service from it. Thinking in terms of defense and self-protection rather than of comfort and personal privilege; thinking in terms of increased production rather than decreased working hours; thinking in terms of the sacrifices that democracy is worth in dollars of capital and man-hours of labor; thinking of two related sentences in Premier Reynaud's remarkable interview yesterday with William Philip Simms in which he said: "In recent years especially, France has tended to speed social advances to the neglect of her national defenses." And, "the spirit which makes a people seek social progress in times of peace, also makes crusaders of them and their soldiers in times like these."

Let's have a truce on bluff and bluster. Let's avoid being edged, via the back door, into any fight until, if we ever must go in, we will be prepared to finish it.

And the foregoing expresses our sentiments about the belligerent tone that characterized the President's address last night at Charlottesville, Va.

This is no time to be talking loudly while carrying a feather duster.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD some figures compiled by the Department of Commerce which show the tremendous increases in the imports of farm products in 1939 over 1938. These figures will give an idea of what the administration's policy of deliberately given away the American market under the trade-agreements program has cost the farmer.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Sale of Reserve Airplanes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 12 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ARTICLE BY MAJ. AL WILLIAMS

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by Maj. Al Williams appearing in yesterday's edition of the Washington Daily News.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Daily News of June 11, 1940]

UNITED STATES CANNOT SPARE SINGLE FIGHTING PLANE AT PRESENT

(By Maj. Al Williams)

The administration is helping the Allies by selling our reserve airplanes back to the manufacturers, who will sell them to Britain and France.

Helping the Allies is one thing, and all right. But I cannot think of the Allies first and the United States second.

Our reserve air system is one of the weakest links of what should be America's strongest chain—air power. Our Army and Navy Reserve aviation groups have never been much more than a pitiful joke. Shortage of planes has been the chief deficiency, with red tape and obsolete flight training of Reserve pilot personnel close behind.

We should have paused before saying, "Let's help the Allies—let's give them our airplanes, especially our second- and third-line planes." We cannot afford to rob ourselves of a single military or naval airplane at this time.

American air power is negligible to the point of being nonexistent. We have two air services—one with the Army, the other with the Navy. Germany, England, Italy, and France rate far above American strength in the air. Our air defense is deplorably weak.

The administration insists we need 50,000 warplanes, and apparently refuses to heed the warnings of Army and Navy air experts and civilian airmen that we must train pilots to fly those planes.

The mass-production capacity of American industry to build aircraft is unsurpassed—provided we work according to sound plan. But where, and how, and with what shall we turn out pilots overnight or anywhere near as fast as we build planes?

Pilot training takes time. Don't be misled by the recent estimate of the Civil Aeronautics Authority that it can turn out 45,000 pilots in a year. It may train 45,000 pilots to fly little commercial planes (40- to 250-horsepower jobs) in a given time. But modern first-line war planes never use less than 1,000-horsepower engines and have landing speeds of 60 or more miles an hour.

What are you going to train your small plane pilot in, after he gets his license to fly the little job? His air education must progress by stages. He cannot jump from a 75-horsepower job to handling a 1,000-horsepower airplane.

We need every high-powered plane we now have, and thousands more, to train our young air fighters to handle real fighting ships—when and if we ever get them. If we had 50,000 superlative fighting planes on our airports today, we would be the laughingstock of the world—because those planes would be obsolete before we could train enough pilots to handle them.

We would have to build about 15,000 advanced training planes to cover the educational gap between the small commercial planes and the first-line fighters. Every military plane—old or new—is worth its weight in gold to us right now as an advanced trainer.

American Citizens of Italian Descent

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DENNIS CHAVEZ

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 12 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

EDITORIALS FROM THE WASHINGTON POST, NEW YORK TIMES, AND NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD editorials from the Washington Post, the New York Times, and the New York Herald Tribune, all of June 12, 1940, dealing with Americans of Italian descent.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of June 12, 1940]

AMERICANS ALL

Yesterday's newspapers reported that the Italian and Italo-American residents of our large eastern cities had listened with deep gloom and foreboding to the fateful words transmitted to them from Rome.

Much of their dismay, no doubt, was due to a realization of the rash and ignoble course to which the Italian fatherland had been committed by the will of its master. Much of it was due to fears for the fate of kindred and friends. But much of it must also have been due to an apprehension of their now uncomfortable situation among neighbors whose nerves and emotions have been tortured by the cataclysmic succession of disasters in western Europe.

News from England a few hours later tended to increase such fears. There had been angry rioting in the Italian quarters of London, Liverpool, Edinburgh, Glasgow, and even Belfast. Only energetic action by police saved harmless shopkeepers and restaurateurs from injury and possibly death.

Meanwhile, many prominent Americans of Italian birth or blood hastened publicly to repudiate the Duce and to reavow the complete allegiance of their followers to the United States. Among these were Representative D'ALESANDRO and Mayor LaGuardia. The mayor warned against demonstrations and promised to preserve the neutrality of the sidewalks of New York. His radio speech contained much sound advice, despite the past occasions on which Mr. LaGuardia, himself, has not remembered to follow it.

We shall do well in this crisis to take the loyalty of our Italian-born citizens and their descendants as much for granted as we expect our own to be taken. Nothing can be more dangerous to the Nation than the fear-inspired fantasies whereby an element of the population, numbering many millions, and yesterday much admired for industry, sobriety, and good nature, becomes today a gigantic horse of Troy. This applies also, of course, to that other large body of our citizens who are of German or Austrian antecedents.

This is a good time to chasten ourselves with the recollection of what incalculable tragedy was wrought upon innocent persons during the spy phobias of some 20 years ago. If ever we reach the point where anyone of German or Italian blood becomes, ipso facto, suspect, we shall have adopted the racial superstitions that we have so roundly and justly condemned in the Nazis. Moreover, we shall have created a confusion and disunity which the real "fifth column" will assuredly turn to its advantage.

[From the New York Times, June 12, 1940]

OUR ITALIAN NEIGHBORS

Because his own blood is largely Italian, Mayor LaGuardia could speak fittingly on this week's historic Monday, to and for this city's Italians. Because even his political opponents trust his native impulses at a time like this, he could speak fittingly to and for all of us, of whatever origin. He took it for granted that Americans of Italian birth and descent will, like himself, put the interests of this democracy ahead of those of a foreign government—particularly when the acts of that foreign government are an affront to democracy everywhere, as they are to honor and to decency.

He gave due warning that demonstrations in front of consulates will not be permitted, and that "the persons and property of foreign subjects, as long as we are at peace with other countries, will be fully protected." He also gave warning that consular officers will be expected to "adhere strictly to their consular duties." Opinion in the Italian colony seems to support the mayor's position. There need be no surprise that this should be so.

We believe that there should be a friendly realization, among Americans who are of different origin, that this is a trying time for our Italian neighbors in this city, that they are concerned about relatives and friends in Italy, and that they cannot rejoice in hardships that Italy may have to suffer, any more than they can be proud of the shame which Mussolini has brought upon a lovable and gifted race. Like the rest of us they will hope that the real Italy will in God's good time reassert and redeem herself.

[From the New York Herald Tribune of June 12, 1940]

AMERICANS BY CHOICE

The first reaction among Americans of Italian origin to Mussolini's degradation of his own and his country's fair name is, from a strictly American point of view, encouraging. Of course, many Italians in this country are Fascists at heart. So, also, among the mass of Americans of Italian origin, a passionate pride in Italy exists. Neither is open to fair criticism. But, if the first reports are correct—and they have been duplicated in all the city's newspapers with one exception—the news of Italy's declaration of war was received with anything but enthusiasm in our various "Little Italys" and the reaction of the American born was overwhelmingly pro-American rather than pro-Italian.

This is as it should be—and as it was in the case of the German elements in 1917. It goes without saying that it is almost impossible for the average alien who came to this country as an adult to shake off his or her intense feeling of sympathy for the mother country. But the very fact that most of them are Americans by choice and that their children born and educated here are Americans by training and environment makes it equally natural that the great mass of those of foreign parentage are Americans at heart.

There are, of course, exceptions. But no one who has traveled extensively through this country and spoken with the youth of the Nation can help being struck with the extent to which, outside of a few large concentrated colonies of foreign-born, the children of foreign parents are cast in the same mold as the sons and daughters of the older American stocks. This is America's salvation. If the reactionary racist theories of Europe were soundly grounded and should become widely accepted, the dissolution of the United States would be inevitable. If the Americans of German origin were to regard themselves—or be regarded by others—as Germans, and those of Italian origin as Italians, and those of British or Dutch origin as English or Hollanders, there would be no Americans today. Fortunately, no such condition exists. Descendants of these various stocks may have a sentimental interest in or attachment for their parents' country of origin, but it would be utterly ridiculous to look upon Franklin D. Roosevelt or Arthur H. Vandenberg as Hollanders, or Wendell Willkie or Herbert Hoover as Germans, or Thomas E. Dewey as an Englishman. It would be equally false to look on our earlier leaders, like Lincoln, Grant, Jefferson, Washington, and Robert E. Lee as Englishmen.

The Italian element will doubtless pass through some unpleasant days and nights. They cannot help but resent the fact that Mussolini's "stab in the back" has aroused such intense distaste among the mass of Americans. But they are a good stock, and have contributed much to the country's growth and welfare. Mayor LaGuardia's stern but friendly reminder that they are Americans first, last, and all the time will doubtless help them to preserve their balance, even if the Fascist agents in this country—who are many—copy the Nazi tactics of moral blackmail by threatening persons who refuse to carry out the agents' orders with injury to their relatives on the other side of the Atlantic. They may also derive comfort from the realization that the best way of proving that Mussolini is not typical of Italy's best blood is by being unswerving in their loyalty to the United States.

Taxation During the Twenties

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 7, 1940

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, when Woodrow Wilson left the office of the Presidency in March 1921 he left on the statute books a schedule of income-tax rates which might have been the means of avoiding the depression of 1929 had they been kept in effect by the Republican administrations which followed. The reason I say that is because those tax rates would have prevented the accumulation of the great surpluses and fortunes of the twenties which were in part the cause of the failure of our economic system during these years to distribute sufficient mass buying power to sus-tain production at its comparatively high level. Furthermore the United States Government would have derived additional revenue in the amount of approximately $11,500,000,000 during the twenties had the Wilson surtax rates remained in effect. That amount of money could have been used to cushion the shock of the collapse of October 1929 in such a way as to prevent the cumulative increase of unemployment and depression.

Mr. Speaker, I submit herewith certain tables in this connection which I believe will be self-explanatory. They have been prepared by Mr. Charles C. Whiting, of Springfield, Ohio, and I wish to express my deep appreciation for the work he has done.

Table A shows the number of income-tax returns, by classes of income, which were filed in the years 1921 to 1929. Significance of this table lies in the very great increase in the number of returns filed—particularly in the topmost brackets.

Table B shows the figures regarding income taxes for the three classes: $5,000 to $10,000, $10,000 to $25,000, and $25,000 to $50,000. Here the main things to be noted are the average rate per cents on total income of the tax.

Table C is a complete showing of the changes which have taken place in surtax rates and in amounts of surtaxes on incomes of certain sizes since 1921, though they do not of course include the changes made by the tax bill passed on yesterday.

Table D deals only with incomes between $500,000 and $1,000,000, and shows, first, the actual taxes collected on these incomes between 1921 and 1935; second, the taxes that would have been collected had 1921 rates been kept in effect; and third, the increase in revenue that would have resulted on this class of incomes alone.

Table E shows the same facts as to incomes of $1,000,000 and above.

Table F gives a summary which indicates that $11,540,000,000 would have been collected in revenue had the 1921 rates remained in effect throughout the twenties. It also shows how it was the people in the high and not in the middle brackets whose savings were far the greatest as a result of this.

There will, I know, be various comments and interpretations upon the figures here submitted. I think it is obvious, however, at the very least that sound tax policy is to be found in the maintenance of substantial rates on those with ample ability to pay in times of prosperity, and that unless this is done the groundwork for depression is being laid.

NOTE.—The above table of returns shows clearly the rapid increase in the number of returns during the years immediately following the World War, and a reference to the table showing the amounts of net income, taxes paid, and the average rate percent of tax on net income, show very clearly the evident manipulation of the revenue act changes to materially benefit those with incomes in the higher brackets.

Television

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERNEST LUNDEEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 12 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

LETTER FROM HON. ERNEST LUNDEEN, OF MINNESOTA, AND REPLY BY COMMISSIONER T. A. M. CRAVEN

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix a letter on the subject of television, written by me to Federal Communications Commissioner T. A. M. Craven on June 3, 1940, and his reply thereto.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE COMMERCE,
June 3, 1940.

Commissioner T. A. M. CRAVEN,
Federal Communications Commission, Washington, D. C.

DEAR COMMISSIONER CRAVEN: We note in the press that you joined with the Commission in its report dated May 28, 1940, concerning the matter of television. Will you please inform me of the Commission's action? May I request that you give your reasons for now concurring with the majority, with whom you previously disagreed? I am particularly anxious to know whether television is to go forward as a new industry or is it to be stifled by Government bureaucracy.

I am aware that responding to inquiries from Congressmen has been questioned in your case. A Senator and a member of the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate, I believe, has the right to be informed of your views and your reasons for voting as you have in this important matter of television.

Therefore I would appreciate a prompt reply.

Yours very sincerely,

ERNEST LUNDEEN.

JUNE 5, 1940.

The Honorable ERNEST LUNDEEN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR LUNDEEN: Acknowledgment is hereby made of your letter dated June 3, 1940, requesting me to inform you of the Commission's action of May 28, 1940, concerning television, and to give my reasons for now concurring with the majority, with whom I previously disagreed.

Since you have raised the issue of your right to this information, I request that it be made clear that I have no objections to giving reasons for my vote on any official action of the Commission, when such is specifically requested by a Member of Congress. I do this as a matter of courtesy and without questioning the right of a Member of Congress to undertake such a procedure. However, in this instance I know you will understand my hesitancy to emphasize publicly and controversially any differences of opinion which I may have had with my colleagues. To do so unnecessarily invites the specter of dissension, even when, as in the instant case, there existed within the Commission merely honest differences of opinion.

It may be recalled that I dissented from the Commission's action of March 23, 1940, because in my opinion this action, among other things, appeared to retard unnecessarily the development of television as a service to the public. On the other hand, the later Commission action of May 28, 1940, is intended to facilitate progress in television. Thus, while the two actions are related they present an entirely different set of circumstances as to the future. I am more interested in the future of television than in the past, and hence judge the later Commission action in the light of future progress.

Naturally I do not agree with some of the details of the Commission's television report of May 28. Likewise I would be more satisfied with a procedure for the future different from that suggested in the report. Nevertheless, I concur with the Commission in its broader objectives. The differences I now have are not of sufficient importance to justify a dissenting vote. I see no logical reasons for me to insist upon details, or even upon a different procedure, provided the Commission can agree unanimously on some broad, constructive objective leading to more rapid progress in television.

It is my opinion that the Commission intends to encourage actively the promotion of television as a service to the public in their homes. It is my belief that as soon as the scientists of the industry can come to an unbiased agreement with respect to the best current engineering practices for television, the Commission will authorize full commercialization to be undertaken by licensees of television broadcast stations. In the near future the chairman of the Commission will call to Washington the leading television engineers of the country for the purpose of encouraging higher standards and coordinated approach to research. Thus, with this cooperation between the Commission and the industry, technical progress and agreement on basic standards of the best current engineering practice can be facilitated. In this connection I do not believe anyone will condone "stalling" by any licensee, engineer, or manufacturer on the question of the best current engineering practices in television.

In addition, the Commission intends to grant immediately several pending applications for television broadcast stations throughout the country. The Commission will authorize these licensees to transmit television programs while, at the same time, requiring them to keep their stations abreast of scientific progress by undertaking research leading to uniformity in the external performance characteristic of the transmitters.

The foregoing appears to me to have the broad objective of facilitating rapid progress toward the adoption of proper uniform standards of current engineering practice for television. At the same time there is the intention of authorizing television broadcasting stations operated by private enterprise on a regular business basis as soon as this is consistent with the adoption of proper uniform engineering standards for transmitter performance. With such objectives television can move forward faster than it has in several years past, because the Commission again presents some incentive to the television pioneers of the Nation. The Commission's report indicates it will authorize full commercialization of television as soon as the engineering opinion of the industry is prepared to approve any one of the competing television systems.

Since I am vitally interested in making constructive progress to start television as a vast new industry, with all its implications as to service and employment, I see no logical reason for insisting upon one method in preference to others, provided all of us can agree on something which is intended to stimulate progress. While I regret the Commission's rules will not permit immediate commercialization by experimental television station designed primarily to broadcast television programs, my colleagues prefer another method also designed to achieve progress on to the ultimate goal of good television service to the public. I recognize that other methods may possibly achieve the desired goal by a different route. Therefore, under the circumstances, I see no valid reason for dissenting in this respect. I am confident that the Commission will not delay authorizing commercial television by waiting unduly for the unknown inventions of the future.

While I have advocated public trials of different television engineering developments, if such be necessary to get television started, I recognize that this procedure has disadvantages as well as advantages. I also recognize, and have also advocated, the desirability of the industry progressing uniformly and concurrently with respect to standards of engineering practice. Uniform standards should be the ultimate goal. Personally, I prefer that the Commission refuse to approve or disapprove standards at this time because of the disagreement among the engineers of the industry. However, I have no basic objection to the Commission prescribing such uniform standards from time to time, provided such standards are broad in base and subject to change; and provided further that such action does not preclude public trial of technical developments of the future. In this connection, any standards adopted or prescribed today will be changed in the future anyway, as new inventions are made, or as public opinion dictates. No one can stop inventive genius or control public opinion. For example, I cannot envisage either the television industry or the Commission being bound 10 years hence by the best engineering practices current today, even though standardization will influence the situation. Improvements undoubtedly will occur requiring frequent changes even in basic standards. While the problem of obsolescence is a factor to be considered, I do not believe that factor alone will or can stop progress or prevent changes for the better.

Therefore, in connection with this engineering phase of the television problem, it appears useless for me to insist upon a specific procedure.

Summarizing the foregoing, it is my estimate of the situation that, at a relatively early date, there can be established by private enterprise several television stations throughout the Nation rendering a competitive commercial television broadcasting service to the public. Each of these stations will be capable of broadcasting programs to the public with transmitters having the best uniform engineering performance possible at this time. Of course, in making this estimate I have to disregard the possible economic influence of the European war. I cannot foretell whether the effect of such economics will stimulate or retard the development of the television industry.

I believe in getting television started as a new industry as soon as possible. I think it is ready to undertake the initial construction now. I know that you will agree with me that any quibbling on methods or raising the ghosts of the past will not contribute constructively toward the progress which must be made on the long road ahead before television is established as an acceptable service to the public on a Nation-wide competitive scale. In America we are at a critical point. Unity of action is necessary, not only in Government but also in industry, as well as between the Government and industry. This is no time to insist upon specific methods, provided agreement can be reached on broad principles of constructive action, designed to attain a definite goal.

Very truly yours,

T. A. M. CRAVEN, Commissioner.

P. S.: I have discussed this reply to your inquiry with the chairman of this Commission. He informs me that we are in close agreement on the broad objective of facilitating progress in television.

American Expeditionary Force in Present War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN THOMAS

OF IDAHO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 12 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

SPEECH BY W. A. S. DOUGLAS

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix a speech by W. A. S. Douglas, which appeared yesterday in the Washington Times-Herald. Mr. Douglas has demonstrated beyond any doubt that we cannot enter the European war and refuse to send our boys.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Times-Herald of June 11, 1940]

SECOND AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCE TO CLIMAX UNITED STATES AID TO BRITISH, FRENCH—ALLIED NEED FOR MANPOWER HELD GREATER THAN IN WORLD WAR

Speaking over station WOL last night, W. A. S. Douglas, of the Times-Herald staff, ex-soldier and recently a war correspondent in the European battle zone, presented the conclusions of an Army officer friend who insisted that present governmental actions in regard to the Allies are acts of war against the totalitarian states and that such actions cannot fail to bring into Europe an American expeditionary force.

Douglas quotes the authority as firm in his belief that the war will come to us without our going after it.

"WRONG IMPRESSION"

Douglas said:

"I talked to a high-ranking military officer yesterday who told me that there appears to be a generally accepted conclusion throughout the United States that this country can get into this second World War to influence its course and its outcome without sending boys and young men across the seas.

"He tells me—and I am presenting his case to you because I consider him one of the smartest soldiers of today—that advocates of intervention are trying to give the impression that France and England do not need men and that therefore we can arrive at the status of a belligerent without sending a single boy to fight in Europe. The argument overlooks the fact that the decision to be a belligerent is irrevocable—as Mussolini's decision is irrevocable—and that the supplying of troops follows also as an irrevocably developing fact.

"CITES LAST ENTRY

"Remember, these are not my thoughts, but the thoughts of a man for whom I have the greatest respect. Those of us who remember the last war, he reminds me, can remember also that when entrance by the United States was discussed, it was insisted that the Allies had all the men they needed and that what they wanted was nothing but credit, cash, and supplies.

"They got all that. Then there came, and very quickly, too, that 'token' army. And then, although the cash, the credit, the munitions, and the supplies were going over and the 'token' army was ready, there burst upon us conscription—and that army, 4,000,000,000 strong, from which stemmed the American Expeditionary Force.

"ENGLAND NEEDS MEN

"I think that England today is badly in need of manpower. The fact that British conscripts and volunteers are found on the French left wing seems to substantiate that alleged shortage.

"There is, my friend states, a definite similarity between the set-up of the first World War and the set-up abroad today. He can see no reasonable chance of the Allies winning a short war. In fact, if this war is going to be short, everything points to the defeat of the Allies. Therefore, if the United States should become a belligerent, we would be either backing a lost cause or else be furnishing cash, credit, supplies, munitions, and men for a long, costly, and bloody war; a war which, my military friend declares, is going to come to us in the long run—if the Allies lose—without our going after it.

"ARGUMENTS IN PROOF

"He pointed out to me his basis for proof that the need of the Allies for more men is greater and more urgent today than in the last war. And here are his presentations in sequence:

"One. There was an eastern front in the last war held by the Russians until the "red" revolution.

"Two. Italy was on the side of the Allies in the first World War.

"Three. Belgium remained with the Allies and gave excellent account of herself all through the first World War. Now she is out of the picture.

"FLANDERS DISASTER

"Four. England and France never suffered in the first World War such punishment as they have experienced recently in Flanders.

"Five. In the first war, Germany and Austria were allies, but operated as distinct units at least until the middle of the war. And at no time was there the coordination or the rigorous discipline over Austria, as is now being exercised by Germany.

"Six. England must keep a large and well-trained army at home.

"Seven. In the first World War the French used a tremendous number of colonial troops. There has been no sign of their presence in this war so far and it seems obvious it has been considered necessary to keep them in the colonial possessions.

"Eight. This is a gasoline war. Mechanics and other men skilled in driving and service of tanks, trucks, and planes must be at a premium. Such men are plentiful in the United States in comparison with those among the allied personnel and within recruiting or conscription reach.

"REMINDS OF PERSHING

"He reminds me that General Pershing insisted from the start of the landing of American boys in France that none of these could be used for replacements in French and British regiments. He says Pershing insisted on this despite efforts made by President Wilson to have him give in to the pleas of Lloyd George, Marshal Haig, and Marshal Foch. My friend believes that if we do get involved we are much less likely to secure that firmness of purpose regarding trench and field loans of manpower to blend with French and British manpower than we were in the last war.

"He states that thousands of draftees sailed out of Hoboken without knowledge of firearms or squad drill. I distinctly remember a humorous circumstance along those lines myself.

"Disembarking American soldiers were passing an inspecting officer on the pier at Liverpool, England. It was plain to see that they were still soldiers in the making. And their officers were also new. There was one Florida lad who came by, looking fairly well; he had almost passed the officer when the latter suddenly noticed that he was minus his wrap-around puttees.

"ASKS ABOUT PUTTEES

"The recruit's breeches just flowed into his socks, and his socks flowed naturally into his boots.

"'Where,' snapped the disembarkation officer, 'are your puttees?'

"'Puttees? puttees?' asked the boy. 'Whaddyemean, puttees?'

"'Your leg coverings,' explained the officer. 'Those wrap-arounds they issued you. Long khaki strips you wind around. Don't you see what these other men are wearing?'

"The lad from Florida laughed loud and long, and then hitched up his blouse to show both puttees wound carefully 'round the region of his stomach.

"'Joke's sure on me, Cap,' he answered grinning widely. 'I thought that was a cholera belt.'"

German Credit Renewal Plan Is Negotiated

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER T. BONE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 12 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE CHICAGO TRIBUNE

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article from the Chicago Sunday Tribune of June 2, 1940.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Chicago Tribune of June 2, 1940]

GERMAN CREDIT RENEWAL PLAN IS NEGOTIATED

NEW YORK, June 1.—Representatives of Wall Street banks are returning from Europe with a plan for renewal of an agreement with Germany covering commercial credits, informed banking sources said today. The plan, it was learned, was worked out in discussions in Rome for submission to a committee from local banks which had extended credits to Germany.

A temporary arrangement calling for gradual reduction of outstanding credits was made last December. It expired yesterday. Under it Germany paid interest ranging from 3 to 4 percent and cut the estimated indebtedness from $46,000,000 to $40,000,000.

The new plan, it was said, probably followed closely the expired agreement, but disclosure of the details awaited return of the negotiators. They are due home within the next 10 days.

Fair Labor Standards Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARY T. NORTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 11, 1940

LETTER FROM PHILIP B. FLEMING

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

MAY 18, 1940.

Mr. J. S. CAPPER,

President, Toro Manufacturing Corporation, 3042 Snelling Avenue, Minneapolis, Minn.

DEAR MR. CAPPER: It was good of you to send me the report entitled "Typical Cases Illustrating Adverse Effects of Wage and Hour Law Upon Employees, Employers, and the Employment Situation." You state that the report was prepared by a committee of 10 or 12 persons in Minneapolis and St. Paul, who had made a survey of the various concerns in that area affected by the wage-and-hour law. I have undertaken to make a careful study of each situation presented, and for that reason have been unable to furnish you with a reply at an earlier date.

Apparently, the purpose of the report was to gather together and circulate information in connection with instances in which the Fair Labor Standards Act was thought by the authors of the report to have created hardships or to have had other undesirable results. In other words, the report is a compilation of so-called hardship cases rather than an analysis of the effects of the wage-and-hour law. For this reason, it could not but paint an unfair picture of the way the law is working.

The Fair Labor Standards Act is a national law having Nation-wide application. Any law of this character must of necessity result in some isolated cases of alleged hardship, but I believe that it is entirely unfair to regard such cases as being the typical results of the law. Even assuming some of the cases in the committee's report to be cases of real hardship which the law has created, they seem insignificant when considered beside the hundreds of thousands of cases in which the law has had an admittedly beneficial effect. I shall now undertake to comment on the cases in the committee's report in the order in which they are presented.

1. This case involves a certified public accountant who is a duly elected secretary of a corporation, although not a member of the board of directors, employed at a salary of over $5,000 a year. He is in charge of the audits and accounts for the company's branch offices as well as its main office. Periodically, he works over 42 hours a week when required to make audits of the branch offices which are located outside the city. It is stated that the Wage and Hour Division was asked for a ruling as to whether this employee was exempt as employed in an executive, administrative, or professional capacity. It is also stated that the ruling of the Division does not give the company complete assurance that this employee is exempt.

Whether or not an employee is employed in an executive or administrative capacity depends upon whether his employment satisfies the conditions set forth in the Administrator's definition of those terms. (See sec. 541.1 of the enclosed regulations.) Similarly, to be exempt as a professional employee, the conditions of section 541.2 of the Administrator's regulations, which defines the term "professional," must be satisfied. These definitions were promulgated only after lengthy conferences with representatives of various business groups, and there was singular unanimity of opinion that the definitions were so clear that any employer could readily determine therefrom their applicability to his employees.

It has been the consistent policy of the Division to refrain from expressing an opinion as to the applicability of these definitions to particular cases. The decision in an individual case is purely a question of fact, and it was felt that an ex parte presentation of facts was hardly a proper basis upon which to render an opinion. Further, although the Administrator has authority under the act to issue regulations on this matter, he can give no binding assurance that a particular employee is or is not employed in an exempt capacity. Nevertheless, we attempt to be as helpful as possible by explaining the broad outlines of the definitions. Thus, we have informed all inquirers that a certified public accountant usually satisfies the requirement of the professional definition that the employee's work be "based upon educational training in a specially organized body of knowledge." If the other parts of the definition, which can be readily applied by the employer, are satisfied, the certified public accountant is exempt. From the brief statement of the employee's duties which are contained in your committee's report, there would seem to be little doubt that the employee is within the exemption. I should think that if the facts are as given in the report, any employer could determine that the employee was exempt by merely reading section 541.2.

2. The second case summarized concerns a young woman employed at a salary of $140 a month. It is stated that, although she enjoyed a 3-week vacation with pay, was never docked for sickness, and worked less hours during the year than if she had worked 44 or 42 hours per week, her employer was informed that it owed her overtime compensation for certain workweeks in which she worked in excess of the maximum workweek applicable under section 7 of the act.

Quite clearly, the overtime provisions of the act apply on a workweek basis. Section 7 (a) (2) expressly provides that no employer shall work his employees for a workweek longer than 42 hours without paying them time and one-half for each hour over 42. If language expressed by the national legislature is to be given its plain meaning, the conclusion seems inescapable that the act provides no method whereby hours may be averaged over a period of longer than one workweek for the purpose of determining compliance with the basic overtime provisions of section 7. Further support for such an interpretation of section 7 (a) (2) is found in the fact that some flexibility with respect to overtime requirements is prescribed. Sections 7 (b) (1) and 7 (b) (2) provide a partial overtime exemption with respect to employees employed pursuant to certain types of collective bargaining contracts. If the conditions of either section 7 (b) (1) or section 7 (b) (2) are met, the employees need be paid overtime only for hours in excess of 12 a day or in excess of 56 a week. These exemptions are explained in greater detail in our Interpretative Bulletin No. 8, a copy of which is enclosed.

It is not believed that an amendment to the statute providing for an averaging of hours over a period of 2 or more weeks would be workable. Some of the difficulties presented by such a provision are that it would greatly increase enforcement difficulties, complicate employer's record keeping and remove much of the stimulus to regularize employment. Moreover, if the experience of the N. R. A. can be taken as a guide, an averaging system inevitably breaks down in practice unless it is reenforced by a strong union contract, as provided for in section 7 (b) (1) or 7 (b) (2) of the Fair Labor Standards Act, or unless the averaging period is extremely short.

On the question of enforcement, the individual worker would not know whether he was being paid less overtime than was legally required unless he understood clearly what the averaging provisions meant, was informed when the period began and kept a daily and weekly record of the hours he worked. He would then have to wait until the end of the period and would have to be able to add and divide before he could decide whether he had any overtime pay due him. How serious this problem would be may be realized when it is known that many of the employees of those who advocate an averaging provision can neither read nor write nor keep records of their own as to time worked. This means that some of the very sections of industry which are most in need of a limitation of hours would be deprived of the most effective policing method—complaints by individual employees.

A similar enforcement difficulty would confront the Government inspector. Evidence of the violation could be had only when the final paycheck was available after the end of the period, and then only as a result of a laborious process of computing the average for each employee. The inspector would then be confronted with the dilemma of trying to relate particular violations with particular shipments in interstate commerce. Even in cases of flagrant violation of the hour standards, criminal action would become difficult, and in our enforcement policy it would be necessary to show interstate commerce for the entire period instead of for a particular workweek, as is now the case.

One of the objections sometimes raised to the Wage and Hour Act is that the record keeping is complicated. Any method of averaging involves more elaborate records than are now necessary and the longer the period to be averaged, the more complicated the necessary calculations. The exemption presumably must apply to individual employees and the employer would have to know not only what plant average hours were, but before he could decide whether to work an employee overtime in any given week, he would also have to know what the employee's record had been in previous workweeks of the period. In some small plants this might almost double the bookkeeping previously required.

In a number of ways the averaging provision would tend to accentuate fluctuations in employment and in earnings and thus defeat one of the major purposes of the act. Thus an employer who found, near the end of an averaging period, that a particular employee, or group of employees, was going to have a substantial amount of overtime, would either lay these employees off or put them on such short time that their average would be reduced to the legal limit. In the case of irresponsible and fly-by-night operators, the lay-off method would probably be preferred, since employees who were paid off at the end of 12 weeks, after having 48 or more hours per week, could hardly be shown to have worked more than 42 hours as an average over a 14-week period. Thus, the number of evasions possible under this provision would, in fact, be almost endless.

Finally, "the averaging procedure was declared by N. R. A. to be the provision most difficult to enforce and most subject to abuse" (N. R. A. Work Material No. 45). It was found that, with averaging, elaborate systems of checking and recording were required, employees were uncertain of their rights, and that the provisions were unduly complex and cumbersome, with many loopholes for evasion.

3. Case 3 is substantially the same as case 2, and would not appear to merit any additional comment.

Cases 4 and 5 of the committee's report relate to the applicability of the child-labor provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act. Since these provisions are administered by the Chief of the Children's Bureau and not by the Administrator of the Wage and Hour Division, the following comments concerning cases 4 and 5 are those of the Children's Bureau.

4. This case involves the children of a charwoman who assist her in performing her services and whose work is said to be in violation of the child-labor provisions of the wage and hour law.

Section 3 (l) of the Fair Labor Standards Act defines oppressive child labor as "a condition of employment under which (1) any employee under the age of 16 years is employed by an employer (other than a parent or a person standing in place of a parent employing his own child or a child in his custody under the age of 16 years in an occupation other than manufacturing or mining) in any occupation * * *."

By section 3 (g) of the act the word "'employ' includes to suffer or permit to work."

Section 12 (a) of the act provides that "no producer, manufacturer, or dealer shall ship or deliver for shipment in commerce any goods produced in an establishment situated in the United States in or about which within 30 days prior to the removal of such goods therefrom any oppressive child labor has been employed * * *."

Whether or not the minors involved are employees of the mother's employer at common law, nevertheless, under the provisions of section 3 (g) of the act, this employer suffers or permits the children to work. Furthermore, the work which they are doing is performed in or about an establishment where goods are produced for shipment or delivery for shipment in commerce.

However, regulation No. 3, issued by the Chief of the Children's Bureau on May 8, 1939, under the authority conferred upon her by section 3 (l) of the act, makes certain exceptions for the employment of minors 14 to 16 years of age in occupations which "will not interfere with their schooling" and "which will not interfere with their health and well-being." Section 441.2 of regulation No. 3, paragraph 2, allows the employment of a minor between 14 and 16 years of age in occupations which will not require "performance of any duties in workrooms or workplaces where goods are manufactured, mined, or otherwise processed." Under this regulation, a minor between 14 and 16 years of age may be employed as an office boy or to clean up around the offices in a factory building so long as he has no duties to perform in the workrooms or places where the goods are manufactured or processed.

However, such employment is subject to certain limitations set forth in section 441.5 of regulation No. 3. Attention is called to paragraph (2) of this section, which requires that the work be performed outside school hours, and to paragraph (f), which limits the workday of a minor between 14 and 16 years of age to the hours between 7 a. m. and 7 p. m.

From the facts of the case submitted, it does not appear whether or not the minors are over 14 years of age, or whether the work they perform in the factory office terminates at 7 p. m. If the minors are over 14 years of age, and if the work they perform is done outside school hours and is completed by 7 p. m. each day, and if the work is confined to the offices of the establishment, then such employment will not be deemed to be the employment of oppressive child labor.

Your attention is directed to laws of Minnesota on Women, Minors, and Children, and particularly to chapter 8, section 7, of the Laws of 1912, which forbids the employment of children under 16 years of age after 7 o'clock in the evening.

5. This case involves the applicability of the child-labor provisions of the act in the case of a 17-year-old boy employed to deliver products in the performance of which duties he uses his employer's private automobile and a light delivery truck.

The power of the Chief of the Children's Bureau of the Department of Labor to determine what occupations are particularly hazardous for minors between 16 and 18 years of age is derived from section 3 (l) of the Fair Labor Standards Act and not from section 12 (b). The latter section empowers the Chief of the Children's Bureau to make investigations and to bring actions for violations of the provisions of the act.

The language of order No. 2, issued November 27, 1939, clearly indicates that this order was promulgated after very careful consideration and after the receipt of evidence upon which the order was based. It shows that the occupation of a minor under 18 years of age as a driver or helper on a motor vehicle is hazardous for the eight reasons set out in section 422.2 of the order. It makes no difference under order No. 2 that the driver or helper is a husky boy or that the products he handles are of a light nature, or that the vehicle which he drives is a pleasure car. Consequently, if the employer is engaged in the production of goods which he ships or delivers for shipment in commerce, he is subject to the oppressive child-labor provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act and to order No. 2, issued by the Chief of the Children's Bureau under authority conferred upon her by section 3 (l) of the act.

Therefore, the employment described in this situation constitutes the employment of oppressive child labor.

In line with finding No. 7 of order No. 2, attention is directed to chapter 327, Laws of 1935 of the State of Minnesota, dealing with the issuance of chauffeur's licenses, and to the order of the Secretary of State establishing a minimum age of 18 years for an applicant for a chauffeur's license.

A copy of order No. 2 is enclosed.

6. This case involves foundry employees working on a 40-hour-week basis. The number of hours worked week by week fluctuate from 40 to as low as 16. In order to obtain extra work in the slow weeks, certain of the regular employees made a deal with the company to unload carloads of materials at a stipulated price per car, the work to be done at night, on Sundays, or at other times when the foundry was not in operation. It is stated that no supervision was necessary because the work was to be done on a stipulated contract price per car. The Wage and Hour Division is criticized for ruling that these regular employees engaged in unloading the cars in the manner described above were still employees of the company and not independent contractors, and that, therefore, they were entitled to overtime compensation in any week in which they worked in excess of 42 hours.

It is my opinion that these employees would not be considered independent contractors even under common law. The fact that they are paid on a per-car basis is not at all determinative. The men were regular employees of the company. They were not engaged in the independent calling of loading and unloading cars, nor is that the type of work which is ordinarily performed by individual independent contractors. I believe that it would be unrealistic to take the position in this case that these workers were employees during part of the workweek, and that during the balance of the workweek, while working on the same premises and performing closely related work, they were independent contractors. Even in the absence of the Fair Labor Standards Act there could be no other conclusion but that these employees were employees of the company even while they were engaged in loading and unloading cars.

In this connection a further criticism is made of the position of the Division with respect to employees who work for two or more different employers. It is stated that such employees may work any number of hours without being entitled to overtime compensation. It is also stated that if Congress was correct in its opinion that employment in excess of 42 hours is detrimental to the health, efficiency, and well-being of workers, such excessive work during the week is equally detrimental when performed for two or more separate employers. Finally, in connection with this point, it is asked how the detrimental nature of the work is changed if overtime is paid.

In the first place, it is not necessarily true that an employee may work any number of hours in a workweek without being entitled to overtime compensation, simply by working for two or more different employers. If you will refer to paragraphs 16 and 17 of Interpretative Bulletin No. 13, a copy of which is enclosed, you will observe that if the several employments are not completely disassociated, such employments should be considered together for the purposes of the act. Thus, if in the case you present the employers make an arrangement for the interchange of employees, or if one company controls, is controlled by, or is under common control, directly or indirectly, with the other company, the two employments will be considered together for purposes of the act, and overtime compensation will have to be paid.

In the second place, it is quite true that excessive work even for two completely disassociated employers may also be detrimental to the well-being of workers. Nevertheless, to interpret the Fair Labor Standards Act so as to require the payment of overtime compensation in that situation would be to do violence to the act and to disregard completely its plain language. Congress provided in section 7 that "no employer shall employ * * * any of his employees * * *" in excess of 42 hours a week without paying overtime compensation, but it enacted no limitation upon the number of jobs an employee might have. It merely forbids the employer to work his employees more than 42 hours without paying overtime. Perhaps Congress should have gone further and prohibited any employee from working over 42 hours in any event. This, however, it did not see fit to do. It should be pointed out quite definitely that the so-called inconsistency in the example put has not resulted from any strained administrative interpretation of the act. Rather, the interpretation made seems the only one which the plain purport of the statutory language legally permits.

Finally, the purpose of the requirement of overtime compensation was to discourage employers from making the employees work over the maximum workweek prescribed. The overtime provision is clearly a penalty. True, the detriment to well-being of workers exists as much in a case where overtime is worked and paid for as where it is worked without being paid for. Had it desired to do so, Congress might have absolutely forbidden the employment of any worker beyond a certain number of hours in a workweek. Presumably, however, it felt it more desirable to attempt to achieve the same result by merely imposing a penalty for the overtime hours rather than by forbidding such hours.

7. In this case it is stated that a wholesale firm employed truck drivers and, through collective bargaining with the union, had agreed to give the drivers enough hours at overtime compensation so that their weekly pay check would be the equivalent of the pay formerly received under a 48-hour workweek. A certain truck driver of this company requested that he be given additional work in the retail stores in order to acquaint himself with that most important part of the business. I assume that the retail stores were conducted as part of the wholesale firm's business. If not, the discussion in connection with the previous case, concerning employment of an employee by separate employers during the same week, is applicable.

If the driver in question works more than 42 hours in the aggregate in any week for the employer, even though his time on Friday and Saturday is spent in the retail store, he must receive the requisite overtime compensation for all hours worked in excess of 42 in the week. Nor is this result unfair. As long as the truck driver is simply acquainting himself with the work by observing, it is one thing; but when he starts working in the store, it is only fair that the hours so spent be considered "hours worked." This problem is further discussed in the later examples.

8. This case involves a regular employee of a customs brokerage and freight business concern who, for the purpose of gaining experience, asked to be assigned certain work in the foreign traffic department of the company. It is stated that this experience would be of value when the employee returned to his native country. Under the arrangement this employee was to devote a number of hours each day to work in the foreign traffic department with the understanding that he was to receive no compensation for such services. By requiring payment to the employee for such work, the division is alleged to have obstructed an ambitious worker.

Quite clearly the Fair Labor Standards Act requires an employer to pay his employees wages at the rate of at least 30 cents an hour for all hours worked by the employees. If an employee was engaged in work covered by the act, and it appears from the statement of facts that he was, the act requires that he be paid not less than the minimum wage. The fact that the employee at some future date planned to return to his native country, and the additional fact that his father operated a similar business in Sweden, are circumstances which cannot be taken into account under a national law such as the Fair Labor Standards Act. In other words, the law cannot always consider the motives of employers and employees. The fact that an employer and employee agree that there be no compensation is, of course, immaterial, since Congress intended to prevent the parties from bargaining for employment at less than the minimum-wage rate. It is to be observed, however, that even if no compensation was paid the employee for the hours devoted to the foreign traffic department, the Wage and Hour Division, for purposes of enforcement of the act, would take the position that there has been no violation of the minimum-wage requirements of the act, provided that the total hours worked, including time spent in the traffic department, did not exceed 42 hours, and the employee averaged 30 cents per hour for all hours worked during the workweek. See the enclosed copy of R-609.

It should also be pointed out that Congress did recognize that under certain circumstances it might be necessary to provide for the employment of inexperienced employees (learners and apprentices) at less than the minimum wage rate in order to prevent curtailment of opportunities for employment. See section 14 of the act and Regulations, part 521 and 522, copies of which are enclosed.

9. This case, which is said to close the door of opportunity, involves a schoolboy who quit school in order to learn to operate a tabulating machine in a Des Moines, Iowa, wholesale establishment. The employer consented, the boy went to work, and no compensation was provided. After 3 months it was decided that the boy should be paid $20 per month, the feeling being that in case of accident he could then recover under the workmen's compensation laws. Three months later the boy was raised to $65 a month, and later to $75 a month. At some later date it is stated that the Division determined that this young man had not been paid in accordance with the law, and that $123 in back wages was due.

The Fair Labor Standards Act defines the term "employ" to mean "to suffer or permit to work." Quite clearly, therefore, this boy was an employee. However, as long as he was in the office merely for the purpose of practicing on the tabulating machine and did not perform any work for the employer, the act would not appear to apply. When he begins to do more, he must be treated like any other employee. This, of course, is a factual question which cannot be determined from the digest of the case given in the report.

It should be pointed out, however, that it is erroneous to assume that the act would not have applied in this case had the company employed this boy without paying any wages at all. Although the payment of wages would be an indication that the boy was working for the employer, the mere fact that he was working without compensation would not prevent him from being an employee. Therefore, if the Wage and Hour Division investigator informed the company that it would have owed the boy nothing under the act if it had not paid the boy wages while learning, such advice was clearly in error. As pointed out above, section 14 provides a procedure under which employers may secure special certificates authorizing the employment of learners and apprentices at less than the minimum wage.

10. This case involves an employee who travels by truck among various States. He transports certain automobile accessories into other States and then travels over a route for the purpose of selling these products. It is stated that he solicits customers, makes the sale, delivers the product, collects the price, and returns to his home office with whatever goods he has been unable to dispose of. He is paid on a commission basis and is said to receive $4,500 to $5,000 a year. It is stated that this employee is not considered as an outside salesman under the Administrator's regulations, and that the employer has notified the employee that he cannot continue his work unless he confines his activities to 42 hours a week. It is not stated that the division has ruled this employee to be outside the outside-salesman exemption. Furthermore, it does not appear whether an opinion has been asked in this case.

Of course, you must realize that it is virtually impossible to determine, on the meager factual statement presented in this digest, whether or not this employee falls within the definition of the term "outside salesman" appearing in section 541.4 of the Administrator's regulations. Here, as in the case of the executive and professional definitions, we do not ordinarily express opinions as to the applicability of the definition upon an ex parte presentation of fact. This definition also was promulgated only after consultation with many representatives of business groups, and all agreed that the definition was sufficiently clear to enable employers to apply it without difficulty. In the case you present, no facts are given which would bar the applicability of the exemption. It is possible that additional facts exist which would indicate that this employee is engaged in making recurrent routine deliveries, and therefore is not exempt under the regulations. In this connection we call your attention to the fact that the major element in the definition is that the employee's primary duty must be the making of sales as distinguished from making recurrent routine deliveries.

11. This is another case of an alleged outside salesman who is said to be engaged in selling cigars for a wholesale house. The factual statement in this case is even more meager and sketchy than in the preceding one. In addition to what is said above in No. 10, the preceding case, it should be pointed out that a hearing was held in Washington April 10, 1940, on the question as to whether or not amendments should be made to the definition of the term "outside salesman" and the other terms appearing in section 13 (a) (1) with respect to the wholesale distributive trades. No changes have yet been made in the regulations as a result of such hearing.

12. This item is not an actual case but a summary of the alleged position of the division with respect to the application of the act to the building industry. The position of the division is said to result in a "Chinese puzzle for the building industry." I believe this situation warrants careful consideration.

The opinion of the division is said to be to the effect that employees of a building contractor who are engaged in building a new building which will be used for the production of goods for commerce are not covered by the act but, on the other hand, such employees are under the act if they are engaged in remodeling or repairing a factory which is used to produce goods for commerce. So far, the interpretation of the division's position is correct, and I believe that this position will be supported by the courts. Perhaps the courts will go beyond past precedents and apply the act to employees engaged in the original construction of the factory which, immediately upon completion, will begin to produce goods for commerce. The division does not, however, believe that the courts will so hold and, therefore, has given the industry the benefit of its best judgment in this matter. Perhaps the situation would be less of a "Chinese puzzle" if we disregarded judicial precedents and rendered opinions to the effect that all employees in the building construction industry are covered by the law.

The division is also criticized for advising certain employers, who have asked questions regarding the applicability of the act, that the courts may hold employees subject to the act where they travel from State to State in the performance of their duties. Our advice in this connection has been no more than advice. The decisions of the Supreme Court on the question as to whether employees traveling from State to State in the performance of their duties are engaged in interstate commerce are inconclusive.

It should be noted, however, that where the case is merely that of employees who are taken from one State to another to engage in original construction work in the latter State, and is not a case of employees who continuously travel from State to State, it is not true, as the report states, that the interpretations of the division place such employees under the act. It should also be remembered that some of the key men who are sent into other States may qualify for exemption under one of the definitions found in part 541.

13. In this case the problem of computing overtime is presented where truck drivers work from 10 to 50 hours a week for a constant weekly salary of $35. We have taken the position that where a salaried employee works a fluctuating number of hours, his regular rate of pay varies from week to week and must be computed each week by dividing the weekly salary by the total number of hours worked.

The employee is then entitled, for his overtime work, to a sum in addition to his fixed salary equivalent to one-half the regular rate of pay thus computed for the number of hours worked in excess of 42 in the week. The report seems to indicate that the employer, during the 50-hour weeks, will have to pay, in addition to the $35, a sum equal to $1.05 for 8 hours, whereas, in fact, the amount of additional compensation required is only 35 cents, one-half of 70 cents, for 8 hours, or a total of $2.80. The act does not prevent the payment of a basic weekly wage to the employees, but merely requires that additional compensation be paid such employees for the number of hours worked in excess of 42 in any workweek. The amount of such additional compensation due should be computed as indicated above.

14. In this case, entitled "The House That Jack Built," A is a company engaged in the manufacture of paper for interstate commerce. A buys pulp from B. B buys pulpwood from C. C cuts the pulpwood at a lumber camp and employs a cook and a barn boss (D and E) at the camp. G is said to be a wholesaler and sells food to the camp. I assume that all of these concerns are within the same State.

The first inquiry is as to whether or not D and E, in this situation, are subject to the provisions of the act. In this connection the first point to be made is that the act applies not only to those employed in producing goods for commerce but also to those engaged in a process or occupation necessary to such production. (See sec. 3 (j).) The second point is that goods are produced for commerce where the employer hopes, intends, or has reason to believe that such goods, or any unsegregated part thereof, either as produced or after subsequent processing, will move out of the State. (See pars. 2, 4, 5, and 9 of the enclosed copy of Interpretative Bulletin No. 5.)

We have taken the position that all employees employed in an establishment which produces goods for commerce are engaged in a process or occupation necessary to the production of goods for commerce unless the employer maintains the burden of showing as to particular employees that their functions are so definitely segregated that they do not in any way contribute to the production of goods which move into commerce. Ordinarily employees who are on the pay roll are necessary to the production of goods, for otherwise they would not be on the pay roll. Furthermore, the term "goods" is defined in section 8 (i) of the act to include articles or subjects of commerce of any character "or any part or ingredient thereof." Therefore, the pulpwood which is cut in the lumber camp and which becomes pulp and later the main ingredient of the paper which goes out of the State, falls within the statutory definition of the term "goods." The pulpwood is produced in the lumber camp and it is produced for commerce if the employer hopes, intends, or has reason to believe that the pulpwood will thereafter move out of the State, either as pulpwood or as an ingredient of the paper. It is, therefore, our opinion that the employees in the lumber camp, including the cook and the barn boss, are subject to the conditions mentioned above, engaged in processes or occupations necessary to the production of goods for commerce, within the meaning of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

All the employees in the lumber camp are contributing to the production of the pulpwood. Since the pulpwood is produced only because there is an extrastate market for the resultant paper, it is only fair and reasonable that Congress extend the benefits of the law to such employees.

The second inquiry presented is as to whether C, the wholesaler, is covered by the act because he sells food which is cooked by D, for the purpose of feeding the men who cut the wood that is made into pulp that is made into paper that moves out of the State. Quite clearly the law does not apply merely because of this sequence of events and I do not suppose that anyone has seriously considered that the division or anyone else has contended that it does. The wholesaler, if covered at all, would be covered for other reasons. As you will observe by reading paragraphs 14 through 16 of Interpretative Bulletin No. 5, in our opinion wholesalers who make sales across State lines or who receive their goods from outside the State, are engaged in the stream of commerce and are therefore covered by the act.

15. The facts in the case put are not very clear. They permit of two different inferences as to the actual situation: (1) That the employee actually worked only 51 hours prior to the act and continued to do so after the act became effective; or (2) that the employee actually worked 56 hours prior to the act, in accordance with the union agreement, but had his hours reduced after the act became effective. Our inspector's calculations are correct only if case (1) reflects the actual situation. If an employee worked 51 hours a week and received therefor $25 weekly, the rate of pay at which he was and is actually employed is the rate arrived at by dividing $25 by 51 hours or 49 cents an hour. Time and one-half must be paid on such rate.

The fact that a union contract stipulates that the watchman is to work 56 hours for $25 is immaterial; the employee did not work 56 hours, and the computation of the regular rate of pay must be based upon actuality.

To permit an agreed number of hours to be taken as the basis for computing the regular rate of pay, where such agreed number of hours is in excess of the actual number of hours worked, is to permit a means whereby the overtime requirements of the act may be circumvented.

A different situation is presented if the employee did work 56 hours prior to the act for $25 and the employer, in order to meet the requirments of the act, reduced his workweek to 51 hours. In such case the employee's regular rate of pay actually was $0.446 per hour. All that the act required the employer to pay was an amount each week equal to $0.446 per hour for 44 hours and $0.669 per hour for the number of hours worked in excess of 44. By paying $25 for a regular workweek of 51 hours the employer paid more than the act required. In fact, he raised the employee's regular rate of pay from $0.446 per hour to $0.4589 per hour ([44 hours × $0.4589] + [7 hours × $0.6883] = $25). Since October 24, 1939, therefore, the employer is required to pay each week a sum equal to $0.4589 per hour for 42 hours and $0.6883 for the number of hours worked in excess of 42, or $25.46 for a regular workweek of 51 hours or approximately $25 for a regular workweek of 50⅓ hours.

To summarize, I trust that you will understand that under the Fair Labor Standards Act the Administrator is given power only in certain specific and limited instances to make binding rulings and regulations. In cases in which the act authorizes and directs the Administrator to promulgate rules and regulations, the rules and regulations have provided that any interested party may petition for a change in any particular provision which may appear to be erroneous. It is on the basis of such a petition that the hearing mentioned above was scheduled for April 10.

On the other hand, although the Administrator has no broad power under the act to issue binding interpretations or rulings, we have undertaken to furnish our best advice in the thousands of cases presented by employers and employees throughout the country. This service is not one which Congress required the division to perform. It has been our belief after due consideration that our inquirers and others interested in determining their rights and liabilities under the law without resorting to expensive litigation are entitled to have the best legal advice on their questions which we can possibly provide. With that thought in mind the division has gone to considerable effort to provide such advice.

I have gone to considerable pains in considering the various situations presented in the report of the committee in Minneapolis and St. Paul and hope that I have been able to explain that the cases summarized in the report are not typical nor do they necessarily have adverse effects upon employers, employees, or the employment situation. May I ask that, if possible, my letter be given as wide circulation in your community as the committee report you have been so kind as to send me.

Sincerely yours,

PHILIP B. FLEMING,
Administrator.

Aliens Seeking United States Citizenship

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 12 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ARTICLE BY THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an Associated Press article dated Minneapolis, Minn., May 29, 1940, entitled "Aliens Fearing War Call, Seek United States Citizenship," which article will no doubt throw light upon the question as to why so many aliens today are seeking United States citizenship, which heretofore they have failed to make application for.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ALIENS, FEARING WAR CALL, SEEK UNITED STATES CITIZENSHIP

(By the Associated Press)

MINNEAPOLIS, May 29.—Fearful of a call to military service in homelands some of them haven't seen for 20 years, thousands of northwest citizens of European nations now at war are flocking to naturalization offices to get under Uncle Sam's protective wing.

Up until Tuesday Federal naturalization officials estimated that 7,000 persons of foreign birth have applied for American citizenship during the last few months. This is a 20- to 25-percent increase over applications a year ago.

The bulk of the applications, Twin Cities immigration officials said, have come from Scandinavian, British, Polish, and German nationals, although some 20 nationalities are represented. Many are from persons who have lived in the United States more than a decade.

Changing Horses

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 11, 1940

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, as not infrequently happens, there comes a time when the thought contained in an old adage, for example, the one about not changing horses in the middle of the stream, cannot be safely followed.

A rider having started to cross, finding himself in the middle of the stream, on a horse that either could not or would not swim toward the desired shore would be justified not only in changing horses if another was available, but in doing a little swimming himself.

It is time we do a little thinking and, in order that we may intelligently decide whether we are to entrust the safety of our Nation, the lives of those near and dear to us, to the present "horse," we should take a look at the record of that "horse."

Do you want to ride a "horse" with that kind of a record for the next 4 years onto what may be the battlefields on foreign soil?

Do you want to trust to him the future of our Nation, the safety and the lives of those who are near and dear to you?

That is a question which you will be required to answer in November of 1940.

Is it not time that we get another "horse"? One with a better record? With not quite so many communistic and New Deal jockeys and trainers?

What Must California Do?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JERRY VOORHIS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 12, 1940

SPEECH OF HON. CULBERT L. OLSON, GOVERNOR OF CALIFORNIA

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, it is a distinct honor to me to be able to include with my remarks the following radio address by the Governor of California:

WHAT MUST CALIFORNIA DO?

My fellow citizens, the sudden and horrible turns taken by the European war during the past few weeks, even the past few days, have served to arouse American citizens of all parties to a realization that the safety of our country, of democracy on this side of the Atlantic, may become involved. It has produced a determined resolve that the United States shall be prepared to defend against any potential invasion of the Western Hemisphere. This is the very minimum action that will give assurance that no foreign legions shall set foot on American shores.

Yesterday, as chairman of the delegation elected to the Democratic National Convention to be held in Chicago in July, I sent to President Roosevelt the following telegram unanimously adopted as the resolution of the delegation. I quote:

"The Democratic delegation from California extends heartiest commendation of your courageous and forthright message to Congress. Every resource of the Nation will be at your command in this emergency. Such is the way of democracy. California sends you a sincere expression of complete confidence and implicit faith in your continued leadership."

We believe the President spoke the sentiment and the will of the Nation in that message—the sentiment and will to keep us out of war but to amply prepare for our defense against any power which would make war upon us.

Already we feel the repercussions of the rest of the world's wars in their effects upon our economic affairs. Pacific coast shipping is slowing down. Ships that we need are being diverted to other purposes and other waters and other registries. Men are out of work.

Markets for farm products have been upset and restricted. This is especially true of the European markets for the highly specialized products of California's orchards, vineyards, and farms.

California has an enormous stake in the petroleum business. This, too, has been upset. If the war keeps on spreading, we shall hear even more insistent demand that we stop exporting our oil supplies which will be so precious if we ourselves are finally attacked.

The war cannot fail to affect our motion-picture industry, by restricting some of its foreign outlets, cutting others off entirely.

Thus, so far as California is concerned, the war may have severe deflationary effect; when we have great quantities of goods and services to dispose of.

On the other hand, we are, for the time being, at least, much favored by having a major share of the airplane industry. They doubtless will be called on to expand, to multiply their productive capacity several fold. We may thus anticipate a sharp increase in employment in this quarter, which will help to reduce the number of our unemployed to the extent at least that skilled workers can be found among our unemployed to meet the requirements of this industry.

If, indeed, our country is in danger of war being made upon us, everyone wants to help in placing us in a position to be invulnerable to attack from without or within the Nation's borders.

What can the individual American citizen do, or the community, or the State, that will really add to their effectiveness in a time of such national emergency?

To the President, and to the Congress, we can safely entrust the task of building our national defenses; that is, our coast defenses, our fighting forces, the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and flying forces; our armaments, and the enormous stocks of materials required to meet modern warfare methods and cruel mechanisms for the destruction of life and property. All good citizens will support such plans.

But there is another type of war attack adopted by imperialistic powers to implement their ruthless invasions of the territory of other nations, which requires special types of defense to which we in California can and must make a great contribution.

I refer to the Trojan-horse methods of making war, or, as we now call them, "fifth column" activities, which have been brought to such high perfection and used so effectively by the Germans in their successive invasions of Czechoslovakia, Poland, Denmark, Norway, Holland, Luxembourg, and Belgium. During the recent Spanish civil war, Franco's Gen. Emilio Mola, in 1936, broadcast that he had four columns marching on Madrid, and that he had a "fifth column" already there, working inside the enemy camp. The "fifth column," in other words, is the secret campaign of lies and rumor, of sabotage and spying, which might be carried on among our own people. A campaign designed to do far more than destroy war stores or blow up bridges. A campaign designed to confuse the people, to divide their loyalties and allegiances, to undermine their morale, to cripple their efforts for complete unity and effectiveness.

Whatever may be the origin of so-called "fifth column" activities in the European countries, to my way of thinking the only origin for the support of any secret "fifth column" activities in our country will be found in the distress, confusion, frustration, the loss of confidence and hope for a life worth while under the workings of our economic system as the reactionaries of today would have that system work. It is among that part of our population, as well as among those given to intolerance and racial hatreds, that our alien enemies could hope to secure support for their "fifth column" activities in this country.

It is in this sense that I believe that we in the United States should consider possible danger from "fifth column" activities. Their organizations can succeed only to the extent that they can discover, foment, and organize divisions among our own people, based upon their despair, discontent, and prejudices.

This is done, perhaps most easily and effectively, by demagogic appeals to emotional instability, to misunderstandings, to racial hatreds, religious bigotries and superstitions, and political differences. Such appeals are effective among those whom life has defeated or frustrated in their efforts to live decently and normally.

It requires no stretch of the imagination, therefore, to realize that if the "fifth column" is doing or can do any effective work in our country, it will do its most effective work among the great mass of unemployed men and women, and their families, among men and women who need work, who want work, who seek work, who will work, but who cannot find it. That is, steady work at wages sufficient to maintain them in health and decency.

It requires no stretch of the imagination to realize that among the unemployed we find most of our defeated, frustrated citizens, who are most likely to be discouraged with the "American way," most likely to respond to the cries and slogans of demagogues.

If, therefore, the "fifth column" threat is a real one, it is my firm conviction that the place to fight it most effectively is on the unemployment front. It is my conviction that California, as a State, can do more to maintain and defend our country and our liberties by solving the problem of unemployment than by any other single activity. But we cannot make this contribution by planning to continue the dole system for unemployment relief. We cannot adopt plans for handling the problem of unemployment based upon the idea that a glutted labor market is a good thing, and that doles should be dealt out only for the purpose of preventing hunger riots and social upheavals.

It is my conviction, on the other hand, that if we continue much longer with our present cash dole relief methods; that if we continue much longer in our failure to deal effectively and humanely with this problem of unemployment, our country and our liberties will be in far greater peril than from any combination of foreign foes.

We are told that it will take 10 years to modernize our weapons and build our war machine to the strength required to protect us from foreign invasion. But what can that avail us if, in the meantime, we disintegrate under the forces within our body politic that have produced ten to twelve millions of unemployed men and women?

As I see it, and as I should like every citizen of California to see it, the solution of our unemployment problem is just as much a national-defense measure as the provision of airplanes, tanks, guns, and ammunition. "Fifth column" activities, demagoguery, appeals to hatreds, and misunderstandings—none of these can hope to find response among contented, well-employed people.

It is with these ideas in my mind that I once more invite all thoughtful citizens to study the plans of this administration for attacking the problem of mass unemployment. They are based upon principles which are few and simple.

1. Man must live by his own work in useful employment.

2. Private enterprise, however encouraged by governmental policies, has failed to provide general employment, but has succeeded in developing labor-saving devices which, although progressive and desirable, have only contributed to the number of unemployed.

3. To the extent that private enterprise fails to provide employment it is the responsibility of government to do so; to borrow and to tax in order to raise the money with which to provide unemployment relief or to engage in directing economic activities giving productive work to the unemployed.

4. Since it is now manifest that the dole system is an utter failure, that it solves no problem but only raises new and more difficult problems, it becomes ever more apparent that our way out is by putting the unemployed to work on land, in factories, forests, and fisheries, producing the food, the clothing, and the shelter they must have, providing the well-being and security that are every man's right.

I submit that the very internal economic forces that have produced the phenomenon of widespread, long-drawn-out mass unemployment are a greater danger to our country, to our democracy, than is the danger from any combination of foreign foes.

War arouses deepest emotions, emotions which sometimes lead to the most illogical and uncontrolled behavior, behavior which contributes nothing to our security, but, on the contrary, may contribute to the possibility of our being drawn into war. I therefore urge all citizens to remain calm; grateful that we are not at war; reassured by the fact that our President is bending every effort to keep us out of this war; loyal to our country and our duties as American citizens, and secure in the knowledge that the Congress and President are taking the steps necessary to make our defenses impregnable to attack if we should finally become involved.

It is in calmness, not in excitement, that we can deal most effectively with our problems.

During the past 48 hours an earthquake, highly localized but of extraordinary severity, has brought death and ruin in the southern end of Imperial Valley. I know I speak for us all in expressing to the distressed people of this area the sympathy and the desire to help of every man, woman, and child in California.

Alert to the responsibilities falling upon the various State departments when catastrophe overtakes the people, we are gathering accurate information and already taking the steps necessary to give every assistance to these stricken people of which the State is capable.

The legislature is now in special session. Heretofore I have asked them to appropriate an extra one and one-half million dollars for emergency repairs of the extraordinary ruin caused by spring floods in the Sacramento River Valley and other sections of the State. I urge the prompt adoption of this measure so that we may be sure to have enough money left in the State's emergency fund to give practical help to the distressed people of Imperial County in this emergency.

I thank you and bid you goodnight.

The Alien Round-Up

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 12 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON POST

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a portion of an editorial from the Washington Post of several days ago entitled "The Alien Round-Up," which relates to the registration and fingerprinting of aliens, which I have advocated consistently for more than 5 years past, and I am happy to learn that at last, even at a late hour, some of the editors of America are awakening to the fact that legislation of this sort is essential for the protection of our country.

There being no objection, the portion of the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE ALIEN ROUND-UP

It is expected that a bill recommended by a Senate Judiciary Subcommittee requiring the registration and fingerprinting of aliens will shortly pass the Senate. The House has already approved a measure providing for the registration and fingerprinting of new immigrants. So the enactment of some sort of legislation affecting the welfare of aliens appears to be virtually certain.

At present the Government has no accurate information about the alien population, because thousands of persons have entered the United States illegally. Some of these illegal entrants are criminals, or otherwise undesirable persons. Others are capable of becoming good citizens. The task of locating aliens who have violated our immigration laws will be far from easy, since they have the strongest possible incentive to escape official notice. Moreover, after they have been rounded up, the question will arise as to whether wholesale deportations should proceed or leniency be shown in exceptional cases.

Registration and fingerprinting of aliens will merely provide the authorities with needed information. The policies to be followed in the light of that information will then have to be determined. Indeed, it is likely that hitherto neglected problems will press for attention as facts about aliens accumulate.

The Government should, of course, have as complete a record as possible of alien residents. A system of registration, combined with a sure means of identification, such as fingerprinting, has long been needed for effective enforcement of the immigration laws. But until our eyes were opened to the importance of protecting the Nation against traitorous or subversive elements opposition to such proposals was exceedingly strong.

Objections to singling out aliens for special identification have been raised because the information thus gained may be used unfairly. President Roosevelt has given assurance that transfer of control over aliens to the Department of Justice will not deprive them of their civil liberties or otherwise impair their legal status. If that promise is faithfully kept, more good than harm may come from registration of aliens.

The Folly Plain Now

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 12, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE NASHVILLE (TENN.) BANNER

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Nashville (Tenn.) Banner of May 29, 1940:

[From the Nashville (Tenn.) Banner of May 29, 1940]

THE FOLLY PLAIN NOW

It often occurs, and with nations and communities not less than with individuals, that the challenge of an exacting and serious situation is necessary to awaken realization of the folly of a course long adhered to.

The United States, it may be confidently asserted, as one of the accompaniments to the discussion and determination of a national-defense program, involving expenditures and commitments running into billions of dollars, will awaken to a new perception of the importance to the national credit of preserving, or approximating, a balanced Budget.

In the last 10 years about $30,000,000,000 has been added to the public debt; and the deficit habit finally was even officially pictured as a profitable investment.

Had not expenditures been thus lavishly made and regardless of the inadequacy of revenues Congress, in deciding how funds for imperative national defense may be secured, would not be faced by the question of whether they are to be obtained by imposing new taxes upon already heavy burdens, or fresh borrowings, thereby exceeding the $45,000,000,000 legal-debt limit, fixed over 20 years ago; or by absorbing a part of the stabilization fund in the Treasury.

The observations in this connection of the New York Times, which by no means can be classed as a captious critic of the national administration, are decidedly pertinent.

Says that newspaper:

"Now the grave error of the New Deal has been, not that it allowed the Budget to remain unbalanced for a few years when that may have been unavoidable, but that it never worked conscientiously and determinedly toward conserving the national resources, using that term in its broadest sense. It has never convinced the people that all the huge expenditures that it has made, totaling more than $58,000,000,000, have been necessary or wise. In the perspective of the situation of today the judgment must be that it has spent an appallingly large part of this sum in a frivolous, wasteful, and irresponsible manner. It has been spending not only far more than it has been raising through taxation, but far more than it would even be possible to raise by taxation without either seriously injuring business and reducing the national production or moving toward an iron governmental control. If we had watched our expenditures closely until now, we would have today far greater potential reserves to draw upon for increased defense. But we have already allowed the Budget to get out of hand, we have strained the national credit, we have built up a formidable army of pensioners and subsidy beneficiaries, we have formed demoralizing public spending habits. We have seriously impaired the resiliency that our Budget should have had to meet the critical situation today."

Congress Should Remain in Session

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 12, 1940

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, it is apparent to every Member of the House that opposition to final adjournment is increasing daily. Many Members feel as I do, that Congress should remain in session during these critical times.

If Members desire to get away for the national conventions, we could recess for that purpose.

This feeling that Congress should remain in session is not confined to the membership of the House. We see it expressed in the daily papers, we hear it over the radio, and letters are pouring in to the Members from every section of the country urging us not to adjourn.

I see an editorial in today's Washington Daily News headed "If They Vote To Go Home, Vote To Keep Them There."

Similar editorials are appearing in almost every paper that comes to hand.

The leading veterans' organizations of the country express the same sentiment. Commander in Chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars Otis N. Brown said in a recent interview that Congress should remain in session indefinitely.

This is not a diplomatic crisis—

Commander Brown said—

this is a national emergency. We may have to prove our ability to retain our sovereignty, protect our vital interests and maintain our American institutions against the impact of advancing world revolution. The appropriation of funds for the President's arms program is only the first step. Complete accomplishment of our purpose will require the development and integration of our industrial, financial, military, and social resources to the fullest extent. To that effort the American people will give undivided support. All departments of our constitutional government should continue to function without interruption. The Congress should remain in session.

The Disabled American Veterans of the World War have expressed the same view. On last Monday evening, June 10, Hon. Raymond J. Kelly, national commander of the American Legion, in a Nation-wide broadcast urged Congress to remain in session, and appealed to the American people to join in that plea.

Under permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert Commander Kelly's address at this point.

IT'S TIME FOR SANE THINKING

Good evening, everybody: The chief question occupying the people of our Nation this evening is what to do about the war in Europe and the peace that must some day follow. None of us, I think, can prophesy with any great degree of certainty the ultimate outcome of the wars now raging. All of us, I think, are in agreement when we discuss the horrible rape of individual liberties and the destruction of small nations which have come from the spread of the totalitarian powers.

We have seen clearly what can happen when nations neglect their defenses, when pseudo liberality is encouraged, when the "fifth column" is tolerated. We know now what occurs when communism, nazi-ism, and fascism are placed at the controls.

The question is whether you and I are willing to accept our individual responsibilities in shaping the course the United States will follow. Nothing, I believe, is to be gained from taking a hysterical view of the situation. Keeping first things first we must root our course in sane thinking. The time for wishful thinking is past. Vain boasting about our undeveloped but potentially great military strength will avail us little. Loose talk about our neighbors will butter no parsnips.

Within the past few days I have addressed a written message to the more than 1,000,000 members of the American Legion. In it I have called their attention to the soundness of the position of the Legion. Every great danger now troubling the people of our country heretofore has been the occasion for discussion and action by the American Legion.

These dangers, as I see them, are wrapped in a now familiar package. They include the things in store for us if our Nation abandons its neutrality completely; the plight of our national defense unless there is complete unity in strengthening our Army, our Navy, and our air forces; the weakness arising from continued failure to accept the principle of universal service in time of war; what may come from continued complacence in handling the enemy within who never ceases to work for the spread of alien ideologies; how we will fare if there is any slackening of the individual effort to unite for the common defense to show the world that our Republic within a democracy can meet any emergency.

In my message to the Legionnaires, speaking as their national commander, I have presumed to speak with some degree of authority because consistently—in the past—the Legion called the turn and pointed the way of sanity for handling many of these problems now confronting the United States.

For 21 long years the Legion raised its voice to the highest pitch in the effort to rouse the Nation to the need for an adequate national defense. Few listened to us.

Since 1922 the Legion has had a definite program looking toward universal service. In the event this country ever becomes involved in another war our plan would deprofitize such a conflict, leaving special privilege for none, equal service for all.

Knowledge of the existence of subversive influences, apparently just now penetrating the public consciousness under the modern description of "fifth column" is neither new nor novel to the Legion. It is only lately we have had public acceptance of the dangers from such influences.

The definite complacence of America in a world rapidly becoming an armed camp with high-explosive potentialities has occasioned dismay in the Legion for many years. Few heeded our warnings.

The 1939 Chicago national convention of the American Legion demanded that Congress stay in session during the emergency. The emergency is even more grave now than it was at the time of the Chicago convention. In my message to the Legion I stressed the importance of having our Senators and Representatives stay in the Nation's Capital so long as national and international affairs are on a 24-hour basis. We are hopeful the country will join with us in asking Congress to remain where it can give constant attention to the needs of the hour.

In my belief the most menacing factor to the safety of the United States arises from within our borders rather than without. Our house must be set in order. But the neglect of years cannot be corrected in a few short minutes, hours, or days. What must be done will be done—if a determined and united Nation sets its will to the task.

Let us face the fact that communazi conspirators seeking to undermine and destroy our institutions are fanatics. The truth, as we know it, is not in them. Reasonable treatment has no effect upon them and but serves to embolden and encourage them in their efforts.

We have been told that far-reaching suppressive measures against flourishing domestic ideological conspiracies might injure innocent people. In my belief, the good of the whole Nation compels summary action to be taken by our properly constituted Federal, State, and local authorities to stamp out in their entirety the activities of these subverters. Such action is needed irrespective of what may happen to their fellow travelers or innocent bystanders. This is no time for quibbling. We must pull no punches.

Good, law-abiding American men and women who enjoy and cherish their civil liberties do not follow the policy of shouting about them. In many cases those who clamor the loudest about the dangers of losing such liberties bear the most watching. All too frequently what they fear most is the loss of their opportunity to work for the destruction of our form of government. There are more than 600 communazi organizations flourishing in the United States. Many of these are Trojan horse and "fifth column" groups. They have no rightful place here among us.

The second place where we are woefully lacking is in our national defense. For two decades national-defense preparedness has lagged. Within the past 2 weeks the first new United States battleship in 19 years has been launched. In every other element of preparedness we have been equally complacent.

We must appreciate that the hurried building of our defenses to the point needed may not make for the most efficiency. Errors will be made and the ball will be fumbled. But the characteristic of a great pitcher is that he pitches over his errors and goes on to win. I am confident we are a nation of thoroughbreds, neither to be upset nor deterred from our purpose by such mistakes.

There is no change in the official position of the American Legion with regard to the neutrality of the United States. We believe the protection—at all hazards—of the free peoples of the Western Hemisphere is our primary obligation. While our Nation is ill-equipped to provide even a minimum of protection for the Monroe Doctrine, it is idle to consider the feasibility of intervening in the great conflict across the Atlantic.

With what would we intervene? Though some progress has been made in giving educational orders for material and equipment, and in providing for the needs of an expanded air corps, we do not have on hand today the needed planes, weapons, and materials to train properly the extremely moderate armed forces we are able to put in the field.

How then would we make our potential strength felt, short of 2 or 3 years? Fast moving, aggressor nations have no intention of allowing us to select our own time and place for exerting the might of a rearmed America.

In my written message to the members of the Legion I have also told them the safety of our Nation transcends any political issue. I have cautioned them to avoid the danger of subjecting such safety to the fear generated through hysterical approach to the handling of our problems.

In my public utterances as national commander I have stressed the importance to American Legion organizations of assisting and working through recognized agencies of the Government. I have told them that only rarely when there is a collapse of recognized authority as in times of great natural disasters is it our job to do what we can independently.

In recent years many of our Legion posts have prepared disaster relief plans to become effective at the onset of such catastrophes. In other words, the machinery of Legion support for law and order is already established with a fair degree of efficiency. Posts without plans are being urged to form them now. Such plans should be integrated with existing Government authority in every community where there is a Legion post.

State departments of the Legion can well initiate and urge the adoption of State emergency councils. In several States this has been done already with the support and consent of the State Governors.

Official representatives of the national organization of the American Legion are now engaged in conferences and discussions with proper agencies of the Federal Government. These conferences look toward utilization of Legion organization and membership in the most effective manner possible in the event of any conceivable emergency developing. Such perfected plans will be ready for immediate use when conditions warrant their invoking.

The American Legion is working to make this a Nation geared to go. We recognize it as a blue-chip game in which we are engaged. We advise playing them close and playing the cards to win.

Our members regard this situation as another call from the Nation. It is not a call to the armed forces where once we served, though we will not shun such a call if it comes. Rather it is a call to develop sanity superseding hysteria; to remove all doubt about the strength of our national defense whatever the cost; to have all of us individually willing to bear the heavy price of the defense, which must be paid to assure peace for our people.

For 21 years the American Legion called the turn. It is confident its judgment in the present situation will coincide with the safety and well-being of our beloved Nation.

For God and country we have associated ourselves. We pledge again our loyalty to that creed. We extend the hope that America now is awake to the dangers we face. Resolutely we pledge our organization to work with those who are for the preservation of our national unity that thus we may safeguard the glory of our ideals, our principles, and our institutions.

Adjournment of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 12 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ARTICLE FROM WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask unanious consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial appearing in today's Washington News, entitled "If They Vote To Go Home, Vote To Keep Them There."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Daily News of June 12, 1940]

IF THEY VOTE TO GO HOME, VOTE TO KEEP THEM THERE

Within a few days Congress may be called upon to cast the most important vote of 20 years.

That will happen if administration leaders persist in their effort to force an adjournment.

Any Congressman who does vote to adjourn and go home should be commanded by his constituents to remain at home.

Any elected representative of the people who is so insensible of his constitutional obligations that he would voluntarily abandon his post at a time like this is, we believe, unfit for the responsibility of service in Congress.

The terrible conflict in Europe goes rapidly from bad to worse. Any day may bring the need for fateful decisions involving our Nation's peace and security. Borrowed billions have been laid on the line for rearmament. But to turn dollars into weapons in the quantities needed old industries will have to be invigorated and new ones created. Only Congress can do what is necessary to mobilize idle capital and manpower for this supreme task.

Overnight it may become not a matter for academic debate but an imperative necessity to order compulsory military training and conscript men for defense duty. Congress alone has that power and responsibility.

Our Government has operated in the red through 11 years of apparent peace and security. Confronted now with need for gigantic new defense expenditures, nothing substantial has been done to weed out old wastes, and the only tax proposal yet made won't even balance the nonmilitary outgo. Congress is the Nation's fiscal guardian.

Yet it is suggested that Congress pack up and go home. It is suggested that if an "emergency" should arise the President will summon Congress back to a special session—a procedure which requires several days in a period where there may be no day to spare. Incidentally, an adjournment and a special-session summons would mean that the lawmakers would be legally entitled to collect travel allowance, at 20 cents a mile, to their homes and back to Washington. No such allowances are legal if Congress merely recesses a few days at a time through the summer. We would accuse no Congressman of wanting to be a mileage patrioteer.

But we repeat that any who vote to go home at a time like this ought to be made to stay there—and very probably will be.

The Preparedness Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENJAMIN JARRETT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 12, 1940

Mr. JARRETT. Mr. Speaker, the House yesterday passed a bill increasing the national debt four billions of dollars, and provided a $1,000,000,000 tax per year. This for national defense. We were all for it with a few exceptions. We would be pleased if we could be assured that this will be used for national defense and not for New Deal activities. It is up to the administration to be honest with us who voted for it and the people who are to pay for it. We did not vote for defense to get us into a foreign war but to keep us out.

The burden now is on the people from the President down to keep cool and to begin to work out a program for American interests and keep out of foreign mix-ups. The more we interfere with foreign affairs the quicker we will become involved.

Let us be careful in furnishing material and aid, as the next thing to follow will be manpower. I am afraid that we have gone too far now to avoid it. One thing lacking in the bill—there should have been provided a tax on preparedness profits. No amendments could be offered, as we were working under a "gag" rule.

The President has now recognized the existence of a "fifth column" in this country. It is to be regretted that he did not realize this sooner. Our hope is now that it is not too late, for our country is only as strong as we can successfully deal with the enemies within our borders. The first order of business in the national-defense program should be to clean up within; let the team—the President and the Congress—go to work speedily on this job. Do not break up the team now. Let Congress remain in session and work together toward these ends.

On the preparedness program let the administration, from the President, be honest with the country and leave the production to men who understand production, quit meddling, for all the manufacturer needs is the orders, let them do the job. They can do it if left alone.

We are asking the people to buckle down and retrench. The administration should first set the example in reducing Government expenses. The President announced before the passage of the bill that he would retrench. Let him now make good that promise.

The National Guard and Military Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BEN F. JENSEN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 12, 1940

LETTER FROM AN OFFICER OF THE NATIONAL GUARD IN IOWA

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith excerpts from a letter I have received from an officer of the National Guard in my district. He explains in detail his position on the matter of calling out the National Guard. This letter appealed to me to such a degree I felt obligated to place it in the RECORD, where many thousands could read it, and have a clearer picture of this very important matter. He states as follows:

I have no particular quarrel with what's going on in Washington, except that much of what is now being done should have been done a long time ago; and if attention had been given to the recommendations of people who know, it would have been done. The natural result, as always, will be that we shall pay a great deal more for our military defense than we should have had to pay if we had kept up to a reasonably efficient standard through the years. Up until now that has been the American way of doing things. There is another way to do them, however, and perhaps the realization that seems to be finally dawning on our people that we are in the arms competition, whether we like it or not, may lead us to a more sensible view of our entire defense scheme.

I have been identified with the armed forces of the United States in one capacity or another ever since I enlisted in 1917—part of the time as a Reserve officer but most of it as a National Guard man. I have the highest regard for the officers and men of the component of the Army of which I am a part. I know they have made tremendous progress over their condition in 1915 and prior thereto. I know that the officers of the guard today on the whole are professionally as well equipped as were the majority of the officers in the Regular Army in 1915 and 1916, but that doesn't alter the fact that any army of civilian soldiers earning their living outside of the military are being called upon under our present scheme of national defense to fulfill a mission as part of the initial protective force of the country that is practically impossible. It is not feasible during periods of training at home stations to attain the degree of efficiency and teamwork that is essential to the front-line troops who may be called upon to go up against a modern army. The alternative is that which is now being suggested—induction of the guard into Federal service. None of us would seriously oppose that course of action if we felt we were going to be called out for the duration of a major emergency, but to be called in to the field for a short period of time, 2, 3, or even 6 months, and then to be told that our services are no longer required—that we may go home and try, if you please, to earn a living again—will, in my judgment, finally destroy the National Guard as an institution.

Men with jobs will find them filled by others who will be naturally resentful of their return. Men with businesses will find them destroyed by competition during a time when they have been unable to give them personal attention and those with professions will find that their clients or patients have found others capable of meeting their requirements, and it will be next to impossible to reestablish those intimate personal contacts upon which relationship of doctor and patient, or lawyer and client depend. Knowing those things, men who have been called upon to make that kind of a sacrifice will seize upon the first opportunity to sever their connection with an institution that has been so destructive of their personal interests and it will be next to impossible to find others sufficiently foolish to subject themselves to the possibility of a similar fate. These men do not lack in patriotism. Their membership in the guard should be sufficient evidence that they have it; but when that membership exacts of them sacrifices entirely out of proportion to those which other citizens similarly situated are called upon to make, the obvious injustice will have a ruinous effect so far as that branch of our national defense is concerned.

It is apparent also that many of the members of the National Guard hold positions in our industrial and business life that are in a sense key positions. They will be immediately removed from those positions and the result may conceivably be the crippling of businesses and industries that may be extremely important in the scheme of national defense.

There has been also evidence of a tendency to militarize the C. C. C. I thought a long time ago, and I believe told you, upon that occasion that I felt the establishment of a Civilian Conservation Corps apart from the Army was a great mistake, when the Army had within its organization elements which could be activated to do the business with less overhead. At the same time a certain amount of military training could have been given which would have resulted in the intervening years in the training of a substantial group of young men. That also has its weaknesses, for it trains the young men of poorer or at least lower-bracket-income families, and the burden of the defense of this country should not fall upon one group alone.

The answer it seems to me is to be found in the experience of other nations, who have had to meet similar situations, and they have adopted some form of universal military service. It seems to me that that is what we shall have to come to. We shall have to set up some sort of scheme that will require every young man to spend a year in the armed forces of the United States, after which he can be placed on a reserve status for a few years and then furloughed into the group that could afterward be called on with some confidence as a part of our reserve forces. At the same time that that is done, the pay status of the private soldier which will be drawn from this group should be absolutely changed. These young men should be paid sufficient money to enable them to buy cigarettes and some few luxuries, but nothing more than that; $3 to $5 a month ought to cover it, for the obligation of national defense is one that every citizen owes—not just a few—and the matter of compensation should be entirely secondary.

The plan that I suggest would not necessarily eliminate the guard as a part of our defense program, but it should be then relegated to a secondary role. It should be the reserve component, ready to function after the beginning of an emergency and after 2 or 3 months' intensive training. To the accomplishment of that mission, it is entirely adequate. To it could be sent those men who were called for universal service but who, because of dependency or otherwise, could not give an entire year in military service, in lieu of which they should be required to serve a 3- or 4-year enlistment in the guard. To it, also, could be furloughed those men who had completed their year's military service and from interest or otherwise wished to maintain a military connection. The details of the organization of the complex plan are not the proper subject of a discussion of this kind, but its adaptability should be readily apparent.

I know that the program I have suggested would meet with a great deal of resistance, at least in its inception, but it should be receiving serious consideration in anticipation of the future. It would enable the maintenance of a substantially larger army for the same expenditure of money, and at the same time provide us with what should be an adequate first line of defense and an adequate reserve force.

Please understand that the views I have here expressed are my own—not necessarily those of other officers of the guard, although I find many who agree. I don't know how much attention has been given to the subject along the line of this proposal. It seems to me that it should have thoughtful consideration.

Opportunism and the Debt Limit

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, June 12, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE ST. LOUIS GLOBE-DEMOCRAT

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the St. Louis (Mo.) Globe-Democrat of May 29, 1940:

[From the St. Louis Globe-Democrat of May 29, 1940]

OPPORTUNISM AND THE DEBT LIMIT

President Roosevent has endorsed a proposal of congressional leaders and Treasury Secretary Morgenthau to raise the $45,000,000,000 debt limit by $3,000,000,000 and levy between $600,000,000 and $700,000,000 in new taxes for defense. This recommendation may be greeted in many quarters with an approval engendered by current sentiment for adequate armament. The plan, however, has the stamp of a political opportunism that has consistently characterized this administration.

Only a few weeks ago Congress and the White House contemplated any extension of the national debt limit with many a qualm. It presented an embarrassing, political hurdle, but the hurdle now has sagged perceptibly. During the last month new dealers and November-looking Congressmen have obviously felt that with the pressing demand for more adequate defense machinery, the country's reluctance to abandon the debt limit has been largely dissipated.

When Congress convened it was faced with an alternative: Either raise the debt limit or levy new taxes. There was still a third suggestion—to cut Budget costs. Consider what has happened. The House capitulated to the Senate's election-year nostrum that material appropriation cuts should not be made. Congress passed the enormous farm bill, appropriating $923,000,000, or $203,000,000 more than Budget estimates. The House has voted a giant relief bill of $1,111,754,916, acceding to the President's request to use $975,650,000 of the amount for W. P. A. in the first 8 months of the fiscal year beginning July 1. It is silly to suggest the Senate will pare this allotment. What is the result? Senate revenue experts figure the new Budget requirements will probably exceed the $45,000,000,000 debt limitation by about $1,000,000,000.

Not only was there no important decrease in expenses of government, but now the President urges that the debt restriction be hiked and new taxes be assessed, too. He attributes the need to defense. The defense bill bulks $3,000,000,000, yet the debt limit raise is fixed at $3,000,000,000 and new taxes set at almost $700,000,000.

Granted that it is imperative to bolster our defense arm; it should be needless to follow any such plan as Mr. Roosevelt champions if, in the face of a national safety emergency, Government were to set clamps on administration profligacy. Defense needs are being used as a barrage for blasting off debt restrictions.

Government's sudden lack of perturbation over dealing with the debt-limit problem is largely due to the national preoccupation with war fears. It is impossible to avoid the conviction politicians are riding defense sentiment. They have long intended to tear the lid off debt limitation and quite apparently consider defense spending offers an auspicious lever.

Expansion of national defense on a sound and extensive basis is a need beyond argument. But when such requirements arise, Government should recast its budgeting policies and apply brakes in other directions.

There has not been a semblance of economy in our prodigal subsidy systems; there has been no effort at curtailment of administrative and executive expenses. This administration has placed the country in the most precarious financial condition of its history, at a time when national safety may at any moment be critically threatened from without. Now Congress will be asked to toss the debt limit into discard, and the Government's fiscal condition suffers even more perilously.

It Is Time for Sober Consideration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, May 13, 1940

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, it will be best if we do some sound, sober thinking before we jump at conclusions. This thought is suggested by the many messages which come to me daily.

NEUTRALITY IS A MYTH

If you and your neighbor are fighting and I hand your neighbor a club, you know at once that I am not neutral and, if, because of the club, you are whipped, you are angry, resentful, and revengeful. At the first opportunity, you will endeavor to get even. If you win, you still are quite apt to see that I do not forget my part in the affair.

Such is the international situation.

SO WHAT, YOU ASK?

Here it is, Our sympathy is with France and England. How far do you want to go? Planes, ships, munitions, do I hear you say? Very well. If that is not sufficient, do you want to send the fathers, sons, and brothers? Do you wish Congress to declare war, which means conscriptions and, in the end, death to hundreds of thousands, if not millions, and other millions crippled, gassed, maimed, shell-shocked, and insane? And, after that, a hundred or two hundred years of paying additional pensions? The problem is yours. So, when you write me, think it over before you compose your message.

ANOTHER THING

We are unprepared even to defend ourselves from foreign aggression; in danger of invasion. So said the President. If that be true, should we send our resources across the seas to fight the battle at a disadvantage? Or should we prepare here at home to meet any and all enemies?

NOW, WHAT WOULD YOU DO?

If you had to fight the town bully, would you call on him at his home, fight him in his own dooryard? Would you go to meet him down on the street corner? Or, if he was looking for trouble and for you and you knew he was coming, that the struggle was inevitable, would you hunt up a nice, big baseball club or take the neckyoke or pitchfork and meet him as he entered the door of your home?

WHY BE FOOLISH

Knowing that unreasoning war is sweeping the Eastern Hemisphere; that it may come to us, is it not just good, hard, common sense to quit our wasteful spending? Our foolish, impractical experiments? Conserve all our resources? Quit fighting business? Get rid of, by voting them out of office, those in this administration who, by their actions, during the major portion of the past 7 years, have shown themselves—and our present state of unpreparedness proves it—to be wholly unable to solve our problems and who are cheek by jowl altogether too friendly with Communist groups?

COOPERATION

France and England have lost hundreds of thousands of men on sea and land, blown by bombs or shells or crushed by tanks out of all resemblance to human beings. They lost because they permitted those who always wanted to work less and spend more to determine the Nation's course. Now, too late, they have discovered the error. Should we not profit by their example and oust those, and all the friends of those, who are interfering, by strikes, sit-downs, slow-downs, and just plain sabotage, with our preparedness program? Those who want to make over America?

The House last week started on the right road when it voted, two to one, to abolish the National Labor Relations Board which, for more than 2 years, I have been fighting. Let the Senate now do its duty and we shall be on the road toward industrial peace. This we must have, if we are to prepare for defense.

CONGRESS

In the last 2 years, the President twice called Congress back in special session, each time at a cost of at least a half million dollars. On neither occasion was there a real emergency.

Usually Congress stays in session until the latter part of August, this when the sun is shining and the seas are calm. Now the storm is raging all about us, yet the President, although he advised us that danger is knocking at our door, said he saw no good reason why Congress should continue in session. Sarcastically, he remarked that the situation did not require Congress to remain in session except for the laudable goal of delivering speeches.

The President is himself some fireside chatterer and he never has been noted for the accuracy of his statements. Nor is he distinguished for keeping his promises. Why should the people's representatives desert their post of duty and leave him to act as a dictator?

Secretary Ickes, his mouthpiece, asked whether he thought a Presidential campaign and election was necessary, in view of the present situation, replied, "Well, we might as well call it unanimous and save the money." Evidently Ickes thinks the dictatorship is here.

It will be my purpose to keep Congress in session and there is not the slightest chance that Ickes will be able to prevent an election in November, unless Congress is foolish enough to give the President the power to make him overnight a dictator, through the use of the Army.

Ickes has long been a spokesman of the New Deal. When any group of officeholders gets the idea that they can continue in office without being reelected, it is time to clean them out and it cannot be done too quickly.

Here you have my thought: Extend what help we lawfully can to France and England. By all means prevent our Nation becoming involved in the war. Clean up the mess we have here at home by insisting that an end be put to the worse than foolishness which has been carried on during the past 7 years. And, right now, wage a vigorous and a relentless war against those who propose, with or without force, to make America over. It is my purpose to do my utmost to keep us out of war and I will not support an effort to lead us into the present world war.

Glad to have your views but, before you write me, think and consider well the result of whatever course you may suggest.

An Opportunity To Render Aid to the Suffering Humanity of War-Ridden Continental Europe

HON. JOSEPH J. O'BRIEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 11, 1940

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, one of the greatest humanitarian requests that has come from the White House in quite some time was the one enunciated this morning when the President asked for $50,000,000 so that food might be purchased to send to the refugees in Europe.

The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COLE] has introduced a measure calling for $20,000,000 and this morning I am introducing a bill to encourage the exportation of surplus agricultural food products, to alleviate the suffering of war refugees and other purposes.

The bill provides:

That in order to encourage the exportation of surplus domestic agricultural food products the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized and directed to purchase, through such agencies under his control as he may designate, surplus domestic agricultural food products, and to grant such food products, together with any other agricultural food products acquired by the Secretary under any other provision of law and not otherwise disposed of, to foreign nations as provided in section 2.

SEC. 2. If any foreign nation shall, after the date of the enactment of this act, purchase agricultural food products in the United States for export, the Secretary of Agriculture shall, upon the request of such foreign nation, grant to it for export agricultural food products acquired as provided in section 1 having a market value equal to the amount so expended by such foreign nation.

SEC. 3. There is authorized to be appropriated the sum of $500,000,000 to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 4. The Secretary of Agriculture shall make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

I have today introduced this bill, which I believe carries out to the fullest the American concepts of humanitarianism and our desire to do everything short of war to aid the Allies and the millions of unfortunate victims of the drive against civilization.

We have all bent our energies to furnishing the Allies with military necessities. My proposal takes into consideration that even armies, to make use of this military equipment, must be fed, and the hordes of unfortunates, who are being driven aimlessly out of reach of German guns, also need food.

Europe today is face to face with the greatest famine in world history. We have many needy within the confines of our country, but we have more than enough to feed them and to save war victims from starvation.

The bill I introduced todays aims to do just that. It proposes also to help solve our own economic disaster by providing that our surplus of foodstuffs may have a market and get to the hands and mouths of Europe's starving people.

It authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase through such agencies under his control as he may designate, surplus domestic agricultural food products to match dollar for dollar purchases in this country by foreign nations of our exportable food products.

I am delighted to see that President Roosevelt today finally considered the vital need of this country doing something to avert this dreadful famine in Europe. I noticed in the morning papers that the President, in a letter to Vice President GARNER and Speaker BANKHEAD, suggested an appropriation to the relief bill of $50,000,000 for the proposal I outlined several days ago, and which previously had been proposed by a native son of New York State, Frank Gannett, of Rochester, candidate for the Republican Presidential nomination. Mr. Roosevelt did not, in my opinion, go far enough. Fifty million dollars at this time is a drop in the bucket. It is like offering a sandwich when meat and potatoes are needed to sustain body and soul together. I believe in order to really help the destitute in other lands, we should appropriate at least $500,000,000. Offhand, this seems to be a tremendous sum, but in reality it would not only save our farmers, but it would be a reduction in the amounts now appropriated for parity payments and crop control. In a world hungry because of war, with a nation blessed by productive capacities such as we have, it is foolhardy further to go along with the New Deal course of restriction of agricultural production.

I believe the situation is so grave that the Agriculture Committee of the House should consider this proposal at once so that we may help a starving Europe.

Anniversary Day Parade, 1940

REMARKS
HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 7, 1940

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, I wish I had the ability and power adequately and accurately to describe to you the scene that took place in the Boroughs of Brooklyn and Queens in New York City yesterday. Upward of 150,000 men, women, and children participated in the one hundred and eleventh annual Anniversary Day parade of the Brooklyn Sunday School Union and the fiftieth anniversary of the Woodhaven Sunday School Union—a parade in honor of God and peace.

The Sunday School Unions, composed of churches of every Protestant denomination, was formed in Brooklyn over a century ago. The other unions in Queens County were formed about 50 years ago.

The first parade was held in 1829. It was originally a neighborhood event, and later grew to such size that it was returned to the neighborhoods.

The parade of 1940 was, significantly, one of the largest ever held, if not, in fact, the greatest in the long history of the parade. Concern over the world situation was believed to be the reason for the turn-out of participants and spectators. Particular emphasis was laid, both in the beautiful floats and banners, in proclaiming "Peace on Earth."

The parade has always been reviewed by men prominent in local and national affairs. Former United States Senator William M. Calder has traditionally held a luncheon for the reviewers at the famous Montauk Club in Brooklyn. This year his guests included Newbold Morris, president of the city council, representing the mayor; Borough President John Cashmore; Lt. Gov. Charles Poletti; Henry C. Turner, former president of the board of education and present grand master of the grand lodge of New York; and former Ambassador James W. Gerard. Other prominent officials reviewing the various parades include Supreme Court Justices Lewis L. Fawcett and Charles Lockwood, former Judge Edward Riegelmann, James W. Twomey, Helen A. Brana, Ernest C. Wagner, Faith Moore Andrews, Gen. Bryer A. Pendry, and others. In its long history the parade has been reviewed by Presidents of the United States, including President Grant, Theodore Roosevelt, and Taft.

This year, in Brooklyn, over 105,000 participated in the parade in 28 sections of the borough. William O. Prescott, president of the union, and Harold E. Meyer, chief marshal, directed the arrangements. Upward of 50,000 children participated in 11 parades throughout Queens. In Woodhaven arrangements were supervised by Charles J. Collins, grand marshal, and George F. Hora, president; and in Richmond Hill by Joseph H. Hall as grand marshal and George Walter as president.

The day is marked by the closing of the public schools in Brooklyn and Queens.

Mr. Speaker, I should, indeed, like to be able to describe in detail the vision of this parade. Beautiful floats and banners with messages of peace and good will; thousands of children, spick-and-span, on a holiday of holiness. The children's day in a troubled year—affording us an opportunity to recall those famous lines of Longfellow:

> Between the dark and the daylight,
> When the night is beginning to lower,
> Comes a pause in the day's occupations,
> That is known as the children's hour.

Mr. Speaker, this day was the children's hour—an inspiring sight to those privileged to review, and a most powerful force for good. So long as the unions preserve the tradition of Anniversary Day, America and democracy will be protected. May that be forever. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The League Against War and Fascism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MARY T. NORTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, June 12, 1940

LETTER FROM EDWIN S. SMITH

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from Mr. Edwin S. Smith, of the National Labor Relations Board:

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD,
Washington, D. C., June 11, 1940.

Hon. MARY T. NORTON,
United States House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MRS. NORTON: I am writing to express to you my appreciation for the splendid fashion in which you answered the quite unfair charges that have been made about me in connection with my trip to Mexico in the summer of 1938.

I note that in your speech on page 7711 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for June 6, 1940, you state:

"Mr. Smith is credited by the gentleman from Georgia with having been selected at Mexico City as secretary for the United States of the League Against War and Fascism. In point of fact, Mr. Smith was never a member of the League Against War and Fascism and was never selected in Mexico by anybody for any office."

While your statement is entirely correct, I think in view of a statement by Mr. Cox in the RECORD of June 7, 1940, a further explanation is due you. On page 7777, Mr. Cox says:

"Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand a photostatic copy of the Daily Worker, the issue of September 12, 1938, in which the meeting of this so-called Congress of Workers to promote communism in the Western Hemisphere was reported. I quote from the Daily Worker: 'At the evening session a presiding committee was elected.'

"This is referring to the session of September 11, 1938, the Mexico City meeting 'a presiding committee was elected. President was Jouhaux; first vice president, Ramon Gonzales Pena, of Spain; second vice president, Eno Fimmen, of the International Transport Workers' Union; and the following secretaries: Meherally, India; Lin Lin, China; Edwin Smith, the United States; Casperson, Sweden; Marcel Prenant, France; Allaga, Peru; Villasenor, Mexico; Milessi, Uruguay; and Nelken, Spain.'"

This refreshes my recollection about an incident which had entirely escaped my memory and which may be correctly reported by the Daily Worker.

My very definite recollection of the whole matter now is this: That on the occasion of the first meeting of the Congress Against War and Fascism, which was held in Mexico during the time that I was there, Leon Jouhaux, who is, as you know, the leader of the trade-union movement in France, was elected as presiding officer and named a presiding committee for the conference, on which my name was included without my consultation. I thought it undesirable to serve on this committee, and so promptly informed Mr. Villasenor, of Mexico, who was a member of the committee, and who used to be the counselor of the Mexican Embassy in Washington. I am sure my name was withdrawn. In any event, the committee, as the text of the newspaper account indicates, was simply a pro forma committee to preside over the conference. It had no relationship to any activities subsequent to the conference.

This was the only session of that conference that I attended, and, to the best of my belief, no organization of any kind was set up as a result of the deliberations of the conference. I presume that Mr. Cox based his charge that I was selected at Mexico City as secretary for the United States of the League Against War and Fascism on the basis of this clipping, which he exhibited in the course of the debate. The untruthfulness and maliciousness of such a proceeding is quite obvious.

The League Against War and Fascism, it has been stated by the Dies committee, was organized by the Communist Party. Whether or not this is so, I want to reiterate that I was never a member of the League Against War and Fascism and certainly was never elected by anybody as its secretary for the United States. I want to point out further that the League Against War and Fascism went out of existence almost a year before I went to Mexico City. This fact appears in the report of the Dies committee.

Again I want to thank you for your helpfulness and courtesy in this matter and to congratulate you most sincerely on the wisdom and courage which you displayed during the debate on the Smith amendments.

Sincerely yours,

EDWIN S. SMITH.

Merchant Ships Essential to National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 12, 1940

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, in an address made by me on April 12, 1940, I pointed out that ships of our maritime competitors are being destroyed abroad, and that at the conclusion of the war we shall be met with the serious problem of finding sufficient ships upon the seas of the world to carry our commerce. The situation now is more serious than it was then.

But it is not alone as carriers of commerce that we need these ships. They are essential to our national defense. We are embarking upon a naval building program such as we have never seen before. Merchant ships are essential to that program. Without an adequate supply of auxiliaries the program is crippled from the start. It is imperative that we build merchant ships in larger numbers. The situation is so graphically and accurately presented in an editorial that appeared on June 4, 1940, in the New York Journal of Commerce, under the heading "The merchant marine in defense," that I submit it as a part of my remarks. It reads as follows:

THE MERCHANT MARINE IN DEFENSE

While the new national defense program places the primary emphasis upon the provision of airplanes, mechanized Army equipment, and warships, an adequate and modern merchant marine is an integral and vital part of the Nation's defense. Ships are needed to bring needed imports, including strategic raw materials, to this country, to carry men and materials to any theater of a war in which we may become involved, and to supplement land transport facilities in coastal and intercoastal commerce. If our defense plans are to embrace the entire Western Hemisphere, this fact alone will make a vast expansion of the merchant fleet necessary. Since there may be heavy losses of merchant vessels through enemy attacks, in time of war, the size of the merchant marine required for defense is far larger than that needed for peacetime requirements.

The American merchant fleet today, inclusive of vessels engaged in intercoastal commerce and on the Great Lakes, consists of about 1,700 vessels with an aggregate of approximately 11,000,000 gross tons. Of these ships, about 1,500, with 8,500,000 tons, or almost 85 percent of the total, will be 20 years old or more within the next 3 years, showing that the obsolescence factor is very high. Only about 325 ships, aggregating some 2,250,000 tons, are engaged in foreign trade at present.

Our merchant-marine problem consists not only in increasing the supply of shipping but also in modernizing the fleet so that the ships available will meet every reasonable requirement that may arise. The Maritime Commission's present replacement program, under which 50 new ships are to be provided annually on the average over a period of 10 years, is clearly insufficient to attain this end. The Commission is now ahead of its schedule, having ordered 152 ships within the past 2 years, of which 46 have already been launched. However, a determined effort to replace vessels over 20 years old within a much shorter period should be made through a marked acceleration of the shipbuilding program.

In the meanwhile, Congress has paved the way for an immediate expansion of the available shipping supply by passing the Buck-Johnson resolution authorizing the sale or charter of ships over 20 years old in the Maritime Commission's laid-up fleet. All laid-up ships under 20 years of age have already been sold, but 116 vessels, of a total of almost 1,000,000 tons, remain. The Commission has invited bids for the reconditioning of 10 of these older vessels, and they should be in operating condition by midsummer. This reconditioning program should be expanded without delay, for there is no other way by which a large number of seaworthy vessels can be made available so soon and without overloading already crowded shipbuilding facilities. Great Britain has found that in time of war older ships play a valuable role, particularly on routes where the risk from mines and aerial attack is great.

By putting its laid-up ships into shape for immediate use and expanding its construction program forthwith the Maritime Commission can do much to assure an adequate and efficient merchant fleet, which is needed to supplement the other measures that are being taken to safeguard American national defense.

Beware of the "Sixth Column" Demand for United States Entry Into War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN JENNINGS, JR.

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 12, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE KNOXVILLE JOURNAL

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Knoxville Journal of June 11, 1940:

[From the Knoxville Journal of June 11, 1940]

BEWARE OF "SIXTH COLUMN" DEMAND FOR UNITED STATES ENTRY INTO WAR

Don't be stampeded into war, America!

Like every other neutral in the world, we are living under the threat of a "fifth column," composed of native and imported enemies to democratic government.

And from day to day the evidence grows that at this critical period in our history we also must face new assaults from a "sixth column," composed of American citizens, some high placed, who are moving heaven and earth to thrust this country into the present conflict as a belligerent.

Over the week end indications of "sixth-column" activities and intent were typified in a statement, signed by 30 lawyers, professors, and businessmen, demanding that the United States instantly declare war on Germany.

Columnist Dorothy Thompson "seconded" their demand in a column suggesting the same action, and urging that our Navy be started to the North Sea immediately.

These are the beginnings of a deluge of public appeals and pronouncements designed to convince our citizens that we are helpless to keep out of the war; that like a leaf in the clutches of a raging stream we are being inexorably swept into the sea of conflict.

It is the part of clear-headed citizens to deny that this is so. It is their part to resist the idea with all their strength that the time has come when we have no choice—that we have to get in.

Nobody familiar with American public opinion would declare it to be neutral. Ninety-nine percent of it, conservatively, is pro-Ally.

But that is not an argument for declaring war on anybody. Rather it's the very best argument for our taking an opposite course that will contribute most toward ultimate victory for the Allied cause—and that contribution won't be made by going in but by staying out.

This is true for two reasons:

First, the help that the Allies need is not manpower. The Allied troops need arms. They need planes, tanks, guns, ammunition, and supplies of all kinds. They need the very things which our industrial set-up is ideally geared to furnish, provided we are not forced to abandon supplying the Allies in order to equip an expeditionary force of our own.

In a nutshell, if the New Deal is able to bring itself to put politics out of the way for a time, to subdue its dislike for American business and industry, we can do more for the Allied cause in our present status of technical neutrality than we could possibly do as an unprepared and unarmed belligerent.

What this country should do, what it must do, is the thing that it can do—turn over to the Allies the full production resources of the Nation.

Nor is it necessary that United States industrial production of needed arms and war materials of all kind be held up until the Allies actually place orders for certain specific items. Let the Government immediately turn loose competent engineers on specifications for modern war supplies and equipment—materials that the Allies may or may not buy, but that we can use in our own defense program if they don't.

Get the orders moving. That is the main thing and the thing that counts. Speed in getting this process started is what is the prime necessity, and if the Allies are forced to wait till fall to get the products of our mills and factories then it is folly to talk of giving them help. By that time, one way or another, they won't need it.

In the second place, if, after we have turned over to the Allies, under provisions of our present Neutrality Act, all of the needed arms and supplies we can produce and still they lose, we will not be committed as a Nation to a lost cause; to the defense of the British and French Empires throughout the world. Instead, we will be able to concentrate solely upon completion of our own defensive preparations for whatever may come.

A declaration of war under existing circumstances is an emotional gesture; it's like cheering for an officer who, with bare fists, is trying to subdue a gangster, instead of passing him a club or a brick with which to end the fracas.

Instead of writing letters and passing resolutions to declare war, let our Government show the proper signs of leadership to the Nation's business and industry in mobilizing their resources for the aid of the Allies.

There is no need for new and modern war equipment that this Nation's industrial organization is not capable of producing quickly and in quantity.

The only thing that can stand in the way will be red tape, politics, and incompetency in the Government itself. If these can be overcome, American industry can be confidently expected to turn out the material and do it without delay; and there is no other contribution half as great that could be made to an Allied victory.

Finally, victory in the present war will have swung one way or the other long before we could make our power felt as a belligerent. The supplies which we can send today and in the coming months in an unceasing flow because of our nonbelligerent position would be completely cut off if we were preparing for our own participation.

The place for us to help the Allies win is from over here, without ourselves becoming active belligerents. Let every sensible citizen resist for himself and his fellow the inflammatory words of the new "sixth column"—the new war party of the United States.

Let every citizen hold fast to the conviction, founded in common sense, that we have no business in this war as a belligerent, and that we won't have to go in whether we want to or not—no matter who says we do.

The Campaign Fence

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH W. BYRNS, JR.

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 12, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE NASHVILLE (TENN.) BANNER

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Nashville Banner of June 10:

[From the Nashville (Tenn.) Banner of June 10, 1940]

A Congressman receives his salary under the obligation to render a year's service For Congress to turn its back upon important legislation vitally affecting domestic problems and matters, to fashion a new and important plan of new taxation to yield $1,000,000,000 a year with little more than a lick and a promise hastily fashioned, and to confine its serious effort to appropriations for the national defense, however important, then to hurry homeward to patch campaign fences is far from a creditable procedure.

The Congressman who concentrates his attention upon intelligent, vigilant, and patriotic public service seldom needs any fence fixing, for constituents, as a rule, are as quick to discover and reward ability and fidelity as to detect mediocrity and shirking.

As a matter of fact, the country is in such need of genuine statesmanship in Congress and is so anxious to see it in action that the man who displays it, certainly at this time when national attention is so intently fixed upon Washington and national affairs, may rely upon public appreciation and reward.

Sea Power Versus Air Power—No Longer is the "Right, Tight Little Island" Sheltered by Walls of Steel

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 12, 1940

ARTICLE FROM CURRENT HISTORY BY COL. JOHN CALLAN O'LAUGHLIN

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article appearing in Current History for June 1940, entitled "Sea Power Versus Air Power," by Col. John Callan O'Laughlin, publisher of the Army and Navy Journal, who was First Assistant Secretary of State under President Theodore Roosevelt. He is the author of the book Imperiled America. A former newspaper man, he has been employed by the New York Herald, the Associated Press, the Chicago Tribune, and the Chicago Herald.

During the World War, as a representative of American newspapers, Colonel O'Laughlin took a Christmas ship laden with 6,000,000 gifts to war orphans in Europe. He was a delegate to the Progressive National Convention which nominated Theodore Roosevelt in 1912 and 1933–34 was assistant to the chairman of the Republican national committee.

Colonel O'Laughlin was aide to Major General Goethals, subsequently served in France with the intelligence section of the General Staff, and later was Secretary of the United States Inter-Allied Munitions Council.

The article reads as follows:

With true understanding of the purpose behind the Nazi invasions of Norway and the Low Countries, Winston Churchill grimly warned his people that deficiency in the air condemned them to difficulty, suffering, and danger.

No longer is the "right, tight little island" sheltered by the walls of steel that supplanted the oak of yesterday. Planes from southern Norway, unless intercepted, can soar over those walls and within an hour and a half drop their deadly load on Scottish ports. Planes from Holland also can soar over those walls, and within an hour be in a position to bomb the naval stations at Sheerness, Chatham, and Portsmouth, and the industrial centers nearby. They can interrupt Channel communications with France and imperil the sea route through the Straits of Dover over which passes much of the food and oil and exports of England.

Unless these air attacks are checked, the British Fleet will be forced to base in West English and Scottish ports, and to refit inadequately and slowly. Thus, the effectiveness of the British blockade fleet would be seriously weakened, communications with France would be hampered, and the life lines around the south of England and the north of Scotland would be badly snarled.

Germany's strategy and objectives are no sudden emanation from the brain of Hitler, but are the product of intense, technical thought applied to the lessons of 1914–18, and directed to a new utilization of air power. It was evident to the students in Berlin that, if German submarine operations had been conducted with more ruthlessness during the World War, victory would have been won despite the British Fleet. This conclusion weakened the old theory that annihilation of an enemy force was an essential preliminary to success. It also strengthened the principle that in the case of an insular power food transport should be denied and the support of the fleet on shore removed.

Lending themselves to these objectives were the submarine and the airplane, especially the latter, because it could strike the enemy in all his activities—naval, maritime, and industrial. But the range of the bomber was limited, and bases for its service had to be acquired nearer to the enemy than Germany. The experience drawn from bombing attacks upon British bases in northern Scotland during the early months of the war confirmed this necessity. Hence the invasions of Norway and the Lowland countries in order that their territory might be used against England itself as well as fleet bases and channels of supply.

It is a bold and ingenious conception the Germans are seeking to execute, one that forebodes dark days for the British Empire. Prevented by the Treaty of Versailles from building a fleet comparable to that of Britain, the Reich deliberately accepted inferiority and allayed British fears by signing a treaty, limiting German building of all classes of ships to 35 percent of the British construction, submarines excepted.

Such surface vessels as Germany launched were designed for coast protection and operation in waters convenient for speedy retreat, for troop convoy to Norway and the Dutch coast, and for raiding, as in the case of the ill-fated Graf Spee. In other words, it was determined not to challenge England upon the surface of the seas but to rely upon the submarine, the raider, and the plane to destroy enemy shipping—especially upon the plane to attack the heart of the British home fleet.

This decision dismissed the possibility of a defeat at sea and placed reliance upon neighboring states rather than upon the sea for all vital imports. It contemplated also air offensives to harass enemy maritime traffic, to drive his sea forces from bases, keep them from German shores, and finally to gain a rapid decision by striking at the most sensitive and vulnerable points of England.

Operations in the war to date show how Germany has adhered to this program. Her submarines and planes torpedoed and bombed British shipping, and in the North Sea forced it to hug the Scottish coast; her planes bombed the Firth of Forth and Scapa Flow, compelling the British Fleet to take up a more distant blockade; and now she is acquiring air stations close to England herself.

Yet, until air attacks on English objectives are effective, England will be able to keep open the arteries of trade upon which her life depends. She will continue to exercise that slow, constricting pressure which sapped the strength and morale of the German people in the first World War. So far neither submarine nor plane nor mine has interrupted the traffic of the United Kingdom. Improved detection devices have resulted in the destruction of at least two-thirds of the underwater force with which the Reich started the war. Moreover, the convoy system has largely protected merchantmen; raiding has been proved disastrous, and new construction, plus acquisition of Danish and Norwegian freighters, has far exceeded the British losses at sea. In fact, more damage has been done to the British breakfast table and industry by the Russo-Finnish War and the Scandinavian invasion than by direct attacks upon shipping.

Before the World War, blockade was maintained just off hostile ports, and a passive "come to me" policy was observed by the blockader. This traditional procedure was changed by the submarine, which forced blockaders to a greater distance and a more active use of patrols. The blockade in the current war has required the Allies to lie at a great distance from shore-based aircraft, but this inherent disadvantage is compensated for by opening wide areas to reconnaissance planes which can radio enemy movements to superior surface force.

This change in blockading tactics explains the practical abandonment of the North Sea by the British Fleet and its refusal to enter the Baltic Sea. It accounts also for the partial blockade by the Allies of the Mediterranean accomplished by routing of shipping around Africa, and placing the fleets at Gibraltar, and near the Suez Canal.

Nevertheless, the blockade is effective in spite of distance. There is not a German ship loose upon the seas. Italy has been forced to rely upon her own shipping and the comparatively small bottom capacity of the United States and Mediterranean neutrals, to handle her trade, now severely reduced. Driven into home or neutral ports, the German merchant marine is useful solely for transport purposes, as in the Norwegian operations, and to a minor extent in the attacks against Holland and Belgium.

The control of the seas has another advantage than that of protecting home trade and banning imports to Germany. It is the ability to transport forces at will to threatened points, to remove them in case they are imperiled, and to supply and maintain them. This was demonstrated by the Allies in the Norwegian campaign. Here again, however, German planes placed a limit upon hitherto free movement. Protected by strong forces, troops were landed in central and northern Norway, and when threatened with disaster were brought back home or shipped to the Narvik sector.

These operations necessarily imposed long voyages in order that the transports might be outside the range of bombers. Movements had to follow the arc of a circle instead of direct procedure to the objective. They required launching of planes from ships, from hastily assembled rafts, and from inadequate air fields instead of from land airdromes which the Germans seized at Trondheim and more southern fields. They demanded constant watchfulness for bombing attack upon warships and transports, whose presence was signaled by submarines and by scouting planes.

In these operations came the first real test between the warship and the plane. But in spite of air deficiencies, both in number of machines and expert personnel and in operating facilities, fleet losses were remarkably few. As far as we know now, bombs can sink a submarine, a destroyer, and a light cruiser, and, if delivered in sufficient volume, can damage and even destroy a capital ship. They can also ruin instruments for gunnery precision on any ship, reducing the range and effectiveness of its fire. A board of British experts, after exhaustive investigation, reported before the war that "capital ships cannot be constructed so as to be indestructible by bombing from the air."

Yet, although the Germans have claimed to have sunk or damaged 11 battleships—which Winston Churchill sneeringly denied—so far we know that one of this type, the Rodney, a battleship, was only slightly damaged after a direct hit.

There are admissions that German bombs sank four Allied destroyers, and some submarines, and that German gunfire destroyed three British destroyers. German claims, as yet unverified, assert that Reich bombers accounted for three additional destroyers as well as five cruisers, a battleship, and an aircraft carrier. Allied gunfire riddled two German cruisers, and admiralty claims add five more cruisers and seven destroyers sunk from this cause.

From authenticated reports it is clear that the weapons we have known—the mine and the gun—have done the most damage, the bomb ranking third in destructiveness, and that the drawbacks of the plane are its low volume of fire, vulnerability, and dependence upon weather.

Nevertheless, waves of planes, as the Norwegian operations demonstrated, can cause terrible damage to an enemy, unless countered by defense plane and antiaircraft fire. It does not follow, however, that need of air strength lessens the need of gun power, nor that the costly battleship is an anachronism.

If that were true, Germany and Italy would not be building battleships, or the craft which complement them. In fact, nothing to date has established that the day of the floating fortress is over. The range of the airplane inhibits this. Future ships, of course, will be strengthened against air attack, decks will be reenforced, gunnery systems better guarded, and crews at antiaircraft batteries will be given greater protection. Just as defense eventually overcomes offense, so the battleship will develop. We have seen it in the past in the transformation of the wooden ship into iron and then into steel, and the transformation of the uncompartmented, thin-skinned underwater hull into the cellular and triple or quadruple skin hull of the modern battleship.

The submarine, which at the beginning of the World War seemed destined to drive shipping from the sea, has been brought within defined limits of service. So we may conclude that, while the air is affecting the design of warships and naval strategy and tactics, it has not usurped their function. Rather it is demonstrating that each has its own sphere of operation. Coordination of all three will be essential for victory in war.

Because the war will be decided on the battlefields neighboring the North Sea, one is apt to overlook the vast area in which the Allies are dominant. More than a third of Germany's merchant marine—309 vessels of 1,530,000 tons—is idle in neutral ports. Smaller and smaller is the percentage of Allied ships sunk by German submarine or mine, a contrast with the mounting casualties of the World War. From dominions and colonies and from far-off neutrals supplies of men and materials for the Allies flow without disturbance. Allied warships guard them. German planes cannot reach them. Here we have sea power supreme, and functioning with its age-long effectiveness.

If its home bases be protected, if that closer cooperation imperative with the air arm be achieved, sea power will exercise upon the struggle in progress the compelling influence it has exerted upon the wars of history.

Tax Burden on Business

REMARKS

HON. LELAND M. FORD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 12, 1940

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I did not have time in my remarks yesterday to include some of the tables that were given by the Guaranty Trust Co. in an article called Tax Burden on Business.

You will find in this article that 122 industrials paid 38 percent of their gross in taxes and 27 utilities paid 50 percent of their gross in taxes. You will find in this same article that 122 industrials paid 60 percent of their net income in taxes and 27 industrials paid 99 percent of their net income in taxes.

Also the Iron and Steel Institute report that if they could have used the money they paid in taxes they could have employed 92,000 more men last year than they did.

I draw this to the attention of the Members of the House because I think it is instructive and well worth while.

The article to which I have referred follows:

[From the Guaranty Survey, New York City, May 27, 1940]

THE TAX BURDEN ON BUSINESS

No one questions the desirability of taxation for the support of the essential functions of government, but taxes that bear so heavily on any group—workers, consumers, investors, or proprietors—that productive effort ceases to be worth while and the industrial machine slows down are inherently uneconomic. And the tax load has increased to a point where it represents one of the principal deterrents to business recovery and reemployment. Yet, present taxes, high as they are, fall far short of meeting the cost of Government. In the not distant future this Nation will probably be forced, in one way or another, to face the fact that it is living beyond its means and that retrenchment in nonessentials is not merely desirable but imperative, especially in view of the greatly enlarged expenditures for national defense that must be met.

The most striking feature of the corporation income statements for 1939 that have appeared since the beginning of this year is the evidence they give of the heavy and still rapidly increasing tax burden on business. An examination of the facts disclosed by these reports lends force to the contention that the tax load has increased to a point where it represents one of the principal deterrents to business recovery and reemployment. Yet the present taxes, high as they are, fall far short of meeting the cost of Government.

RELATIVE SIZE OF TAX PAYMENTS

The absolute magnitude of the tax payments by business enterprises, while impressive, conveys little meaning when considered alone. The real significance of the tax burden lies in its relations to other factors in business operations. In an effort to throw some light on these relations a study has been made by the Guaranty Trust Co. of the 1939 income statements of a large and representative group of industrial and public-utility corporations, not including railroads. The primary purpose of the investigation was to determine, first, the ratio of direct taxes paid by corporations to reported net income before tax deductions; second, the ratio of taxes to pay rolls; third, the average amount of tax payments per employee.

Direct taxes include Federal and State income taxes, franchise, capital-stock and property taxes, and social-security taxes paid by the companies. They do not include excise and sales taxes or social-security taxes collected from employees and remitted by the companies to the taxing authorities; that is, they include only those taxes presumably borne by the companies themselves and not those immediately passed on to other groups and individuals.

SIGNIFICANT TAX RATIOS

The inquiry reveals, first, that the ratios of total direct taxes to total net income before taxes for the groups of corporations last year were as follows:

	Percent
122 industrials	38
27 utilities	50
149 companies	43

Of the 122 industrials, 29 reported a ratio of 50 percent or more, and the same was true of 17 of the 27 utilities. Some of the outstanding companies reported the following ratios:

	Percent
Consolidation Coal Co	497
Ward Baking Co	85
Real Silk Hosiery Mills, Inc	74
McKeesport Tin Plate Corporation	73
Ohio Oil Co., Inc	72
Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation	65
U. S. Steel Corporation	62
Mack Trucks, Inc	59
Western Union Telegraph Co	81
American Telephone & Telegraph Co	46

If the comparison is based on the amount of net income remaining after deductions for taxes, the ratios are, of course, much higher. On this basis, the figures are as follows:

	Percent
122 industrials	60
27 utilities	99
149 companies	75

The 29 industrials and 17 utilities that reported taxes equal to 50 percent or more of net income before taxes are thus seen to have paid out more to tax collectors than they had left for distribution to stockholders and reinvestment in the business.

The comparison of direct taxes with pay rolls shows the following ratios for the corporations for which the pertinent data are available:

	Percent
39 industrials	18
8 utilities	39
47 companies	23

The ratios for some of the individual companies were as follows:

	Percent
North American Aviation, Inc	35
Standard Oil Co. of Indiana	28
Standard Oil Co. of Ohio	26
United States Steel Corporation	18
General Motors Corporation	20

Four of the eight utilities paid more than half as much to tax collectors as to their own employees. American Telephone & Telegraph Co. and its principal telephone subsidiaries, the largest private employer of labor in the country, reported a ratio of nearly 33 percent.

TAXES PER EMPLOYEE

Even more surprising, perhaps, are the facts disclosed as to the relation between taxes and number of employees. Direct taxes per employee were as follows:

49 industrials	$315
16 utilities	751
65 companies	424

Some of the individual companies reported the following figures:

Ohio Oil Co., Inc	$665
Commercial Credit Co	623
Standard Oil Co. of Indiana	598
North American Aviation, Inc	568
Texas Corporation	507
General Foods Corporation	500
General Motors Corporation	344
U. S. Steel Corporation	299

Half of the utilities paid more than $1,000 per employee, while the American Telephone & Telegraph system paid $611.

The railroads were omitted from the study because they constitute a special group for which comprehensive data are readily available to the public. The ratios for class I railroads last year were as follows:

Taxes to net income before taxes	percent	79
Taxes to net income after taxes	do	374
Taxes to pay rolls	do	19
Taxes per employee		$360

The ratio of taxes to pay rolls and the amount of taxes per employee were somewhat higher than the general levels for industrial corporations but far below those for most of the utilities. These comparisons reflect the relatively unprofitable results of railway operation, which tend to raise the ratio of taxes to net income but probably reduce the ratio of taxes to pay rolls and to the number of employees.

The representative character of the foregoing figures is borne out by reports from other sources. The American Iron and Steel Institute reports that taxes paid by the steel industry last year absorbed more than one-half of the net profits remaining after all other expenses of operation had been met. They were equivalent to more than $332 per wage earner employed during the year, and if they had been paid out in wages, they would have increased the total pay rolls for the year by 22 percent. Expressed in another way, the tax payments represented a year's pay for 92,500 workers.

Comparisons between taxes on the one hand and employment and pay rolls on the other must be interpreted with care. They do not imply that the tax burden is directly shifted to employees or that amounts saved through tax reduction would be automatically added to pay rolls. The main purpose of the comparisons is to show the relative magnitude of the tax payments as an element of cost. A very significant relation does exist, however, between taxes and wage payments, as will be indicated presently.

The oil industry, besides paying direct taxes such as are levied on business concerns in general, bears a special burden in the form of heavy excise and sales taxes on its products. Taxes levied on the industry and its products last year, as the Skelly Oil Co. points out in its annual report, totaled more than one and one-third billion dollars. This is about a hundred million dollars in excess of the total value of all the crude oil produced in the United States during the year, and is equal to more than 10 percent of all taxes collected during the same period by the Federal, State, and local governments. Gasoline taxes alone amounted to more than a billion dollars and were equivalent to a sales tax of 41 percent.

DEPRESSING EFFECTS OF TAXES

Taxes on petroleum products, like sales and excise taxes on numerous other commodities, are ordinarily passed on to the consumer and do not represent a burden on the industry in the same sense as direct taxes on corporations. But taxes that raise the cost of goods to the consumer necessarily reduce demand and diminish the volume of business, and this affects the industry and its employees as well as its customers.

Conversely, direct taxes on corporations tend to affect not only the companies themselves but consumers and employees as well. When the taxes are light and the companies find it impossible or inadvisable to pass them on to others, they may be absorbed without appreciable harm. But heavy taxes are a vital factor in the cost of doing business and in many cases represent the difference between profitable and unprofitable operation. Consequently, they have profound effects on business policies and hence on the volume of production and employment.

UNECONOMIC TAXATION

The effort is sometimes made to belittle the adverse effects of taxes on the ground that they represent not a curtailment but merely a redistribution of purchasing power, since the revenue received by Government from tax levies is expended in one form or another. The only question to be considered, according to this view, is which type of expenditure is more worth while, that undertaken by Government with the proceeds of taxes or that pursued by individuals and private groups when the purchasing power is left in their possession.

Directly, the process of governmental taxing and spending does represent a redistribution, not a diminution, of aggregate purchasing power. The process, however, has indirect effects that may enormously outweigh the direct ones, either for good or evil. No one questions the desirability of taxation for the support of the essential functions of government, or even for worthy social objectives so long as the cost does not constitute a serious deterrent to business enterprise; but no social objective, however commendable in itself, can possibly compensate for the incalculable losses suffered by the public at large from taxes that bear so heavily on any economic group—workers, consumers, investors, or proprietors—that productive effort ceases to be worth while and the industrial machine slows down. Such taxes are inherently uneconomic, for they take vastly more from the public in lost income than they yield the State in revenue. By reducing the incentive to enterprise, they diminish aggregate production, income, and purchasing power to such an extent as to lower the standard of living of the entire population.

There is reason to fear that taxation in the United States is approaching, if it has not already reached, this uneconomic level. Federal, State, and local taxes are estimated at 20 percent of the national income, and the trend is still upward. In fact, taxes are now far less than sufficient to meet the current cost of government, which has been estimated at approximately 28 percent of the national income. If governmental expenditures continue at or near their present level, taxes must sooner or later be much higher than they are now; and the longer the balance is deferred, the greater the burden will eventually be. In the not distant future, the Nation will probably be forced, in one way or another, to face the fact that it is living beyond its means and that retrenchment in nonessentials is not merely desirable but imperative, especially in view of the greatly enlarged expenditures for national defense that must be met.

The Smith Amendments Would Destroy the Most Beneficial Labor Legislation That Congress Has Ever Enacted

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 7, 1940

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, due to meetings of the Committee on Rules and other matters which required my attention yesterday and today, I was deprived of the opportunity of obtaining time to register my protest against the efforts of the special interests to destroy this most beneficial labor, as well as industrial, legislation, namely the National Labor Relations Act, by the passage of the destructive Smith amendments.

The provisions in these amendments are about as fair and just as the methods that have been used and employed in making them in order for consideration by the adoption of one of the most unusual discriminatory rules ever forced by the enemies of labor out of the Rules Committee.

It is to be regretted that a few men—and I might as well name them—the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox], the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH], and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN], aided and supported by the voracious industrial interests, are wasting many days of our time—my time and your time—in an effort to emasculate or destroy this excellent piece of legislation that has taken the friends of labor years to enact into law.

NOTHING THE N. L. R. B. DOES IS EVER RIGHT TO ITS CRITICS

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] especially has persistently made most unfair attacks against the National Labor Relations Board, its decisions, rulings, and administrators, and even against some of its employees, just as he has against all other suggested legislation that is in the interest of the working men and women of America. He reminds me of the shrewd lawyer who, when the facts and evidence are against him, argue the law, and when facts, evidence, and the law are against him, finally attacks the judge in his do-or-die effort to sway the jury.

The allies of the gentleman from Georgia who are so industriously seeking to sabotage this most useful labor legislation are not unknown. They are the labor-hating American Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers, who have their paid lobbyists always on the job in Washington. With an effort worthy of a better cause, these interests representing the Tom Girdlers of big business at first sought to prevent the passage of the act, and ever since have continuously attacked everybody and everything connected with it. The gentlemen in Congress who seek to destroy the law via the Smith amendments refuse to recognize or admit that the act was passed for the needed protection of labor, to give it certain imperative rights, chiefly among which is the right of collective bargaining, with a view to the elimination of strife and strikes and discord among capital and labor.

They willfully ignore the fact that the industrial barons of special privilege have persistently and consistently opposed the enactment and enforcement of this law in every way. They have worked overtime in trying to hamstring the operation of this Board and make its tasks as difficult as possible.

WORST ELEMENT OF EMPLOYERS ARE THE LEADING CRITICS

These malevolent, organized groups, under the leadership of Girdler, Weir, Pew, Willkie, and Hopson, have been advising not only their own members but everybody else to disregard this, the law of the land, and to disregard the rulings and orders of the Board, yes, even the orders of the courts themselves.

Not until the Supreme Court declared the National Labor Relations Act constitutional did these groups desist in their multiplicity of court actions, and in their effort to prevent the enforcement of this law.

Since that decision the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] has no longer been able to charge that the act is unconstitutional, but he has at every opportunity that presented itself, as I have stated, assailed and attacked the members of the National Labor Relations Board as being unfair to the "poor" employers and even went further in assailing them as being communistically inclined. I say without fear of successful contradiction that they are no more communistically inclined than he is. In these unfair attacks, naturally, he has had the support and acclaim of the employers who, notwithstanding their ever-increasing profits, have been at all times and are now against the payment of a living wage to their employees. The gentleman from Georgia as well as the gentleman from Virginia should recognize the fact that the Senate will never approve the Smith bill which, as I have stated, will, if enacted, tend to destroy the effectiveness of the National Labor Relations Act and, therefore, as I have pointed out, the time of the House is being wasted.

THE SELFISH BIG INTERESTS HAVE ALWAYS OPPOSED LEGISLATION IN THE INTEREST OF THE WORKERS

The viciousness of this present attack against the National Labor Relations Board and the act itself is not anything new to you and me. The same interests that have from the beginning opposed this act are the self-same ones that have ever persistently opposed every effort that tended in the slightest degree to restrict or prevent unfair practices in the treatment of labor. When I first came to Congress fights were being made by the railroads against laws that would provide safety for both employees and the public. Every safety measure, even the provision to eliminate wooden passenger coaches, and every advance in safe operation and administration was bitterly opposed by the railroads, and not always by methods that merited applause.

The workmen's compensation law, the 16-hour law for those engaged in train operation, the safety-coupler requirement, the automatic air control, safety provisions for grade crossings, were alike opposed bitterly, it being the claim of the carriers that such laws would prevent the proper and profitable operation of trains and be generally destructive of our rail-transportation system. Then, too, we all remember the strong opposition of the railroads and express companies to the parcel-post system.

The same applies to the steel industry, the packing industry, and the textile industry. It has been since I entered Congress that the steel and packing industries discontinued a 12-hour day; and only comparatively recently did the textile industry, as the result of operation of the very law now under attack, discontinue oppressive working conditions and child labor.

ASSOCIATED GAS AND ELECTRIC EXPLOITATION A PUBLIC SCANDAL

Those of you who were Members of the Seventy-fourth Congress remember the typical Hitler-like propaganda carried on against the then proposed regulatory power bill. You recall the effort on the part of the Senate committee to obtain service on the power representative—the man Hopson—for questioning; how he evaded service of that committee, and placed himself in more friendly hands, namely, into the custody of my predecessor, the Honorable John J. O'Connor, the then chairman of the Committee on Rules of the House, and thereby escaped interrogation by the Senate committee, who had more effectively investigated the matter and were in position to make a more particular and minute examination of the man Hopson. Yet the House committee was able to bring forth the disclosure that Hopson's own company had expended over $1,000,000 in an effort to defeat this much-needed regulatory legislation. In this connection you will recall the receiving of hundreds upon hundreds of fictitious telegrams, paid for, and sent at the instance of the power companies to mislead and browbeat Members of Congress. After 5 years the country has caught up with this gentleman. Today we find him indicted for fraud against the stockholders of his companies, and the amount of money involved is in excess of $20,000,000.

You also should remember the fight of Richard Whitney, president of the New York Stock Exchange, against my efforts to regulate the dishonest practices of stock exchanges. And what became of Whitney? Even after the enactment of the Securities and Exchange Act he did not stop his practices and landed in a prison cell.

It is also history how the industrialists of our country opposed the passage of the National Recovery Act—N. R. A.—and how they treacherously unloaded upon the President "One-man-decision" Johnson, who in a czarish manner turned the legislation to the aid of big business and to the detriment of small business and labor. Upon his failure to accord labor fair treatment the President was obliged to force him to relinquish his position, whereupon the big interests turned against the N. R. A., after the President had insisted upon a strict compliance with the law, which would prevent discrimination against the small-business man and labor.

SOCIAL SECURITY ACT WAS A SPECIAL TARGET FOR REACTIONARY RICH

None of us who sponsored the Social Security Act, one of the most humane pieces of legislation that was ever enacted by any parliamentary body in any land, can ever forget the particularly wicked, vicious, vindictive, and absolutely uncalled-for attacks that the ever gluttonous, rapacious moneyed interests leveled at that wholesome proposal. This worthy act has to do with such worthy and social service as old-age assistance, aid to dependent children, aid to the blind, unemployment compensation, and other forms of economic security for the needy and deserving. Yet it was assailed as though it were blasphemy against all well-to-do folks. Even after it was established—already over 46,000,000 social-security accounts have been opened—the fight to deceive even the aged beneficiaries and those workers who are contributing for the benefit of their old age, as to the purposes of the legislation, was continued and is even to this day.

And similar to this was the fight and protest of the rich and privileged industrialists against such similarly beneficent legislation as the Railroad Retirement Act, the Sherman Antitrust Act, the Federal Trade Commission Act, and now the proposal to regulate chain stores and mail-order houses. You will also recall the strong opposition to the act outlawing "yellow dog" contracts and the Norris-LaGuardia Act covering the issuance of injunctions in labor disputes. And so on. All this opposition, Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen of the House, is now reechoed in opposition to the National Labor Relations Act, and by the same general predatory interests.

SWEATSHOP EMPLOYERS SURPRISED TO DISCOVER THEY MAKE MORE MONEY UNDER WAGE-HOUR ACT

One of the results of the Wage-Hour Act that sweatshop employers did not anticipate is that they actually are making more profits under the 30-cent-an-hour minimum wage as required by this legislation than when, as previously, they were paying as little as 3 cents an hour. This fact has been announced by Col. Philip B. Fleming, under whose efficient and sympathetic supervision the Wage-Hour Act is being administered.

Before the act was passed, Colonel Fleming points out, many manufacturers, particularly in the garment field, farmed out their work to be done by families in their homes. The pay then ran from 3 to 10 cents an hour.

After the passage of the wage-hour law, these employers dropped their homework systems and concentrated all production in factories. They found that efficiency shot up so much that they could pay the higher scale and boost their profits at the same time. Families benefited enormously, too. Previously, children pitched in with parents to do the homework, and all together earned enough to make but a bare subsistence. Now the father or son receive more wages than the entire family did before.

This is not the first instance, Mr. Speaker, that employers have learned to their surprise that it pays to treat labor fairly. When treated with respect and given a living wage, the average working man or woman becomes more efficient simply because he wants to be; he is more satisfied with his situation, and instead of holding back because of a grievance, he puts his shoulder to the wheel and tries to give of his best. It is merely human nature.

And I may say to the gentlemen from Georgia, Virginia, and North Carolina [Mr. COX, Mr. SMITH, and Mr. BARDEN], and other reactionaries, who are wittingly or unwittingly serving or trying to serve these predatory interests, that every one of the social laws we have enacted here in the last 7 years has aided not only the workers but the commerce of the Nation. During the time these laws have been in effect income in the United States has more than doubled, in many instances trebled; the wealthy corporations and wealthy individuals have in many cases quadrupled their incomes, with corresponding increases in profits.

But notwithstanding this business improvement and these profits the greedy and avaricious interests persist in opposing in every way our further efforts to improve the status of all our worthy citizens, workers, farmers, and businessmen.

PROGRESSIVE LABOR LEGISLATION HAS BENEFITED INDUSTRY AND CAPITAL AS WELL AS WORKERS

And so, Mr. Speaker, I assert with confidence that there are few among us who would repeal these wholesome laws that we have enacted since I have been a Member of this body. I have named only a few of those beneficent laws, only those that readily come to mind. I have not mentioned the laws looking to safety of miners, seamen, and many others engaged in hazardous occupations. Nobody, aside from these barons of special privilege, these malefactors of great wealth, who can be restrained by only one method—law—would repeal these wise laws, because ultimately all fair-minded men realize that they inure to the benefit of the whole Nation. They are the keystones upon which we have builded to make great America what she is. They are the keystones that make American citizens the coveted goal of so many in distant, distraught lands.

As I have implied, every attempt by such laws as we have enacted to improve the status of our wage earners has been met by the hue and cry that the efforts were unconstitutional, discriminatory, confiscatory, unworkable, and in many instances we have been told they were socialistic.

MESSRS. LEWIS AND GREEN SHOULD GET TOGETHER IN THE INTEREST OF ALL LABOR

Mr. Speaker, it is indeed unfortunate because of the bitter fight between Mr. Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, and Mr. Lewis, president of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, that Mr. Green should permit himself to be influenced by the clever, shrewd officials of the various employers' associations and recommend the adoption of these amendments which will tend to the emasculation of the National Labor Relations Act for which all friendly labor leaders and those who have the interest of labor at heart have advocated and worked for these many years.

I recall the years of fighting for a law that estopped the use of the injunction processes against labor organizations which, by the adoption of these amendments, may be nullified. I feel that Mr. Green and some of the members of his board must be blind to the effect of these amendments or refuse to sense the dangerous stand they assume in recommending the amendment of a law that is proving fair to both employer and labor. As one who for 50 years, 34 years of which I have served in Congress, has espoused the cause of labor, I greatly deplore the labor strife between the two major labor organizations, and to me it is unthinkable that their own dispute should result in the leadership of one of the organizations in advocating amendments that will tend to weaken the effectiveness of the act. If beneficial labor laws continue to be scuttled and the officials of the American Federation of Labor are a party to such action, either because of inactivity or because of the aid and comfort that one of its officials lends to the enemies of labor, the time is not far distant when the demand will be made from within the organization for a change.

I am sure that if Mr. Green and Mr. Lewis would, with understanding of the trials and tribulations of the workers of America, as Gompers, Powderly, Mitchell, Stone, Sargeant, and other great American labor leaders understood, instead of fighting among themselves, submerge and subordinate their personal interests for the interests of the total wage earners, as other great labor leaders have done, their opposing forces, led by Girdler, Hopson, Pew, Weir, Willkie, and others, would not prevail, and could not successfully continue their dictatorial and oppressive activities either here or before the State legislatures.

AM NOT AFRAID OF THE THREATS OF BIG BUSINESS

I do fully appreciate that I will again be attacked by the advocates of national thuggery and the corporation-controlled press of the country for my stand for the workers on this question; but I have become callous and indifferent to their false and malicious attacks upon me, and, since they have been singularly unsuccessful in such past attacks, they will, I know, suffer a like fate now. Wall Street vipers have been on my trail all my official life, but they have not in the slightest degree unfavorably influenced my destiny.

For many years I have been an employer of labor, and I have always treated that labor fairly. I do not speak in connection with labor as a theorist; because, in addition to being an employer of labor I have been a laborer. I do not look at the problems of labor solely from a swivel chair. I have always advocated and practiced fairness in dealing with labor, because I have always found that, ultimately, such an advocacy and practice pays big dividends.

REGRET THAT ALL DEMOCRATS CANNOT GO ALONG WITH US FOR LABOR

Please notice that the majority of the members of the Committee on Labor and the majority of the members of the Smith committee, who forced this measure through the House to besmirch the administration and effect a nullification of the wage and hour law are Republicans. The head of the committee investigating the National Labor Relations Board, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH], has never had anything in common with the cause of labor, his record clearly showing that practically always he has voted against every piece of labor legislation that has been proposed in this body.

In years to come the history of the carpetbaggers of the South will show that they sold out the stock and bond holders and their employees in the East and Northeast and moved to the South so that they would there be able to take unfair advantage of the cheapest labor in the United States—even child labor.

TAXES IN UNITED STATES ARE NOT NEARLY AS HIGH AS IN ENGLAND

It keeps the special interests to which I have referred earlier in my remarks busy finding obstructions for our efforts. When the matter of constitutionality is by orderly procedure adjudicated, and their views are wholly rejected, they set up a big bogeyman called overtaxation, ruinous taxation. They try to mislead the American people into believing that they will by excessive tax burdens be crushed when, as a matter of fact, the Federal Government does not, except in a few instances of minor importance, impose any tax except the income and surplus-profit taxes. Certainly thoughtful people will not blame the Federal Government for State-, county-, and city-imposed taxes.

In this connection let me give some figures I collected a few years ago when England was at peace and fairly prosperous concerning income taxes. And remember that since these figures were collected the income-tax rates of England have been about doubled. This is a comparison of United States and English income taxes as of a date I am, unfortunately, unable to give:

Income	British tax	United States tax
$1,500 (309 pounds)	$83.83	$0.00
$10,000 (2,058 pounds)	2,208.87	83.25
$20,000 (4,115 pounds)	5,462.64	588.75

NORTON BILL SHOULD BE ENACTED INSTEAD OF THE SMITH AMENDMENTS

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion allow me to reiterate that I feel that the attacks against the National Labor Relations Act are just as viciously unfair and ill-founded as have been the attacks leveled at the other remedial laws I have enumerated.

I feel that everybody who believes in fair play, in a chance for the workers to achieve livable wages under fair and uniform conditions, according to merit, will not favor this proposed substitute by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH], the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX], and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN], which substitute is for the benefit of the predatory interests only, but will favor and vote for the regular committee bill, the Norton bill.

We Must Protect Our Country by Home Production of Strategic Materials

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 13, 1940

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, on April 19 I extended my remarks in the RECORD and included therein an analysis of H. R. 8206, which had been furnished me by W. J. Graham, president of the Arizona Small Mine Operators Association. I wish to insert a further analysis and argument of this meritorious proposal furnished me by W. C. Broadgate, vice chairman of the Yavapai County Council of the Arizona Small Mine Operators Association and director, Yavapai Associates. Mr. Broadgate's presentation is as follows:

The purpose of H. R. 8206 is to set up a revolving fund out of current silver seigniorage with which to provide small-mine loans for the opening, reopening, examination, and sampling, and preliminary development of all classes of metallic and nonmetallic mineral deposits. H. R. 8206, as does H. R. 9996, extends the authority of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make A and B loans on the same classes of properties.

The principal arguments for this legislation may be divided into the following four parts:

1. The discovery and examination of new sources of strategic and critical war minerals.
2. The discovery and development of new commercial ore bodies to replace those now being depleted.
3. The substitution of useful and productive work, which will add new wealth to the Nation's resources, for direct relief programs, making possible many thousands of permanent jobs and reducing relief expenditures.
4. Maintenance of present rates of industrial taxation in the mining States so that reduced mining activities will not throw additional burdens on other basic industries.

1. STRATEGIC AND CRITICAL WAR MINERALS

It is an unbelievable situation that the present R. F. C. loan authority is restricted to loans on gold, silver, and tin properties at a time in our political and economic history when such a vast diversity of metallic and nonmetallic minerals are necessary and may be more necessary in the near future in order to insure the very survival of this great Nation. Some of our economists and bankers cry that we have too much gold, too much silver; and yet of all the long list of important minerals of which our commercial production is deficient tin was the only one included in the act empowering class A and B Reconstruction Finance Corporation mine loans. Just consider the War Department's long list of these vitally necessary minerals:

Strategic minerals: Aluminum, antimony, chromium, manganese, ferrograde, mica, nickel, quartz crystal, quicksilver, tin, tungsten.

Critical minerals: Asbestos, cadmium, cryolite, fluorspar, graphite, platinum, titanium, vanadium.

It is incredible that, in the face of this real urgency, we have authorized mine loans only for the two metals we are said to have enough of and for one which is difficult to produce commercially at present prices.

Congress not long ago authorized $100,000,000 for the purchase of strategic and critical war minerals, protected additionally by the "Buy American" clause, and has appropriated $10,000,000 of this, $350,000 of which went to the Bureau of Mines to investigate—not to produce from or develop—sources of these minerals. This action clearly showed its realization of the stringency. Unfortunately, the result of this program to date on domestic production has not been happy, as these Bureau of Mines activities in their very nature must be limited.

How much more sensible it would be to let thousands of claim owners all over the country devote their time to developing these much-needed resources on borrowed money, which will return to the Treasury, and with no liability on the part of the Government such as the last emergency war-minerals program entailed.

Most of the strategic and critical war minerals are of a character which are somewhat difficult to market commercially during normal times. Some of them may be of no commercial value excepting during an emergency and others are subject to great fluctuations in value which very easily might wipe out a private investment. There is always a great deal of interest in the exploitation of ordinary commercial minerals, but in the very nature of the case few claim owners or investors can afford to carry out much exploration work for these strategic and critical minerals. This, most surely, is one of the real reasons for their apparent scarcity.

The class C mine loans plan authorized under H. R. 8206 would do more to solve this important problem than any other step which could be taken by Congress. It covers the exploration of all metallic and nonmetallic minerals, and at the same time (as does H. R. 9996) enlarges the scope of the present R. F. C. mine-loan law to cover these same minerals. Not so extending the law is a gross oversight. If this step had been taken some years ago there is no doubt that the present emergency would not be so acute, if, indeed, it would exist at all. The class C mine loans (if administered as intended by the framers of the bill) will permit the search for the rarer and less commercial but vitally necessary war minerals to be carried out in a thorough and widespread manner by those who can, and should, do it—the claim owners themselves. With this legislation in force, and with the extensive selection of properties which then may be made under the Bureau of Mines program, it is certain that many new sources of these apparently deficient minerals will turn up, besides additional sources of the more common commercial minerals.

Further, adding to our present store of knowledge regarding thousands of potential mines, metallic and nonmetallic, all over the Nation will prove of incalculable value in the future.

One example among many may be noted. There is an undeniable lack of domestic, commercially workable, antimony deposits. Yet I have been informed of two likely prospects of good grade ore, the owners of which would begin to ship almost immediately could they avail themselves of one of these proposed class C loans followed, if required, by an R. F. C. class B loan. It is a crying shame that such deposits should not be made available at this time.

There must be scores of such cases throughout the country. Too much stress cannot be laid on the importance of H. R. 8206 from the strategic, critical, and essential war-minerals angle alone. The passage of this bill is completely justifiable on this basis, even if there were not other valid arguments for making this must legislation.

2. DISCOVERY AND DEVELOPMENT OF NEW ORE BODIES

It takes constant, careful investigation of thousands of mining prospects and the intelligent expenditure of money to find a few producing mines and develop their potentialities. This does not mean that, if a claim is turned down today for some good reason, it may not be valuable at a later date. Our experience has been that this sorting over and examination of mining claims must be repeated periodically due to constant changes in economic conditions, metallurgical practice, and varying demand for various metallic and nonmetallic minerals. Ore is properly defined as "mineral in place which may be mined at a profit." As our economic conditions shift, what is ore today may not have been ore yesterday. Consequently, many a mining claim which was partly developed a few decades ago and abandoned, either because the mineral was refractory to the then known methods of beneficiation; relatively inaccessible to markets; too low grade for market conditions at the time of original development; or containing minerals the worth and utilization of which was not appreciated at the time, can now be reopened and developed at a profit.

The above are the principal reasons for the present idleness of countless thousands of potentially valuable mining claims. These lead to a more immediate, physical reason. The mine may be filled with water, have its shafts or tunnels caved in and so be inaccessible for sampling—the information as to its ore content may well have become mere rumor rather than demonstrable engineering fact. Seldom can present-day private capital afford to venture the funds with which to do the preliminary work necessary in order to expose the ore bodies for sampling and determination of their value.

The R. F. C. class B mine loan rules state, "Loans will not be considered on mining properties the ore bodies of which are under water or, due to caving of the mine workings, are inaccessible for examination by any of this Corporation's engineers. Loans are not made for the purpose of making such ore bodies accessible." How, then, may these fallow ore bodies be made available? The proposed class C loans are for the purpose of making such ore bodies accessible. It is difficult to conceive of the millions of dollars of basic wealth in the form of necessary—yes, at the present time, vitally necessary—minerals of which we are being deprived because the framers of the original mine-loan measure were not sufficiently farsighted to realize the need for this third, preliminary class of loans and for providing wider authority and more liberal rules for loaning in the A and B classes.

Let me point out, in the language of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, that "The class B loans are made available solely for the development of gold, silver, and tin ore bodies, and are not made for prospecting or grubstaking purposes." If this legislation passes, all types of ore bodies, metallic and nonmetallic, in all States of present condition and development, will be developed and the national economy will likewise directly and immediately benefit.

To take an example from one small part of the West it is interesting to note that, according to the county recorder of Yavapai County, Ariz., on the average more than 1,000 affidavits of labor and exemptions have been filed each year over the past several years. This probably means that more than 3,000 mining claims in this one county alone are awaiting the necessary capital for examination and development and a great variety of minerals is present in these claims. This is a conservative figure. At the present moment not a dozen sizeable mining properties are operating there and, with the exception of one, all of them are properties which at one time or another were abandoned for one or another of the reasons already discussed. Either portions of these mines luckily remained open for examination, or sufficient engineering information was still available, to indicate their worth under present conditions.

Now, it is absurd to suppose that of 3,000 mining claims idle in one area some considerable number do not justify the faith that has been shown by the owners in holding them—in some cases for a score or two of years—and frequently undergoing real hardships and financial deprivation in order to do so. This situation is not unique. It is duplicated throughout the other mining counties of Arizona and throughout the mining areas of the whole United States, which means literally from coast to coast.

Money for the small mine, once so plentiful, has become so hard to get that small investors do not dare to use their hard-raised funds for putting properties in shape for examination, although money is available for actual mining. Whether this financial stringency is due to restrictions in marketing securities, or to the investing public no longer having surplus funds, does not at the moment concern us—the fact remains that, when a group wishes to put up money for small mining activities they will seldom look at a mine or mining claim which must have work done on it before it can be examined and sampled. They are afraid of dispersing their energies and capital in presampling operations and being left without money with which to develop and mine. When mining capital was easier to get this condition was not acute.

The situation just explained leads to the apparent paradox that, with quantities of worthy idle mining claims awaiting exploration, and with private money looking for mines to develop, the one cannot readily be brought to the other.

The class C loan bridges the gap. It will make a vast outlet for private capital and will, in some cases, allow the placing of more of the class A and B mining loans, which miners presume were actually designed to help mining.

According to a recent statement by the R. F. C., out of the meager sum of $10,000,000 which has been the extent of Federal attempts to help the important mining industry, due to the legal restrictions of these loans, in over 7 years only a little over five millions has actually been disbursed, of which around two and one-half millions is already repaid. This should leave nearly seven and one-half millions available for new loans in the A and B classes. It is clear that these A and B mine loans are having a reasonable repayment experience and that the eventual losses will not be high. It must be remembered that these loans pay off in cash and not in securities, and that the indirect benefits, as will be hereafter shown, are many times any possible losses.

It has been stated that seven times as much money was lost in one great banking loan as has been loaned for the development of mines in 12 States and Alaska in more than 7 years. If this is true, the reluctance to consider mine loans a reasonable risk is difficult to understand. Obviously, there is something wrong, and the situation needs correcting. With countless mining properties idle, properties which are the future hope of the mining industry, and it is only through their development that the present level of mining can be maintained when inevitable depletion closes down our present mines—apparently the R. F. C. cannot find suitable placement for a mere $10,000,000 in an industry which in Arizona alone has grossed $90,000,000 yearly on an average for the past 16 years.

It has been stated that very few applications for the present loans now are coming in. This can partly be accounted for by the fact that most claim owners do not feel that the loan policy is sufficiently liberal and that they are pretty sure to be turned down. Besides, there are few mining claims in condition to qualify under the law and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation rules which are based on that law. We know that there are plenty of mines awaiting development.

It cannot be reiterated too often that mines by their very nature are depletable assets. As each one is exhausted another as large, or several smaller ones, must be discovered and developed to take its place if the level of employment and the revenues to the States and the Nation are to be maintained. Only constant examination and development of idle claims will produce the necessary replacements.

Few people will deny the importance of mining as an industry, but its premier place in our economic system is sometimes overlooked. A few statistics from Arizona, a typical mining State, will indicate this importance, and similar figures could be obtained for other States. Largely due to few new mines coming into production, mining in this State has shown little growth since 1919. Up to 1937 it accounted for nearly two-thirds of the combined output of the State's basic industries. Due partly to its static condition and partly to the increased importance of agriculture to the State, this figure is now much less. It will interest you to know our gross mining income distribution, taking the 1937 figures, which closely approach the 16-year average, as an example:

Refining, freight, etc	$13,000,000
Pay roll	29,000,000
Production supplies	21,000,000
Taxes	12,000,000
Intangibles	11,000,000
Dividends and investment liquidation	4,000,000
Total	90,000,000

The effect of such a basic industry on other industries is of the greatest importance. The people dependent on mining are large consumers of agricultural products, meat, lumber, and other necessities of a more or less seasonal or perishable nature. As to the railroads, over a period of 27 years, 86.48 percent of all carload freight tonnage originating in Arizona was mining shipments, and during 1938 alone $6,000,000 were paid out in freight charges. The public utilities benefit greatly, directly or indirectly. Arizona mines accounted for 22 percent of power sales made by the Salt River Water Users Association in 1938. Had it not been for this mine market for power, the farmers of the Salt River Valley would have had to pay an additional $592,000 in that year for their irrigation water. Many other figures could be quoted, but it should be clear from these just given that our mining business is worth preserving by every possible means since, directly or indirectly, it benefits everyone.

3. THE LABOR SITUATION

The effects of employment in a basic industry such as mining cannot be too strongly stressed. The benefits of employing men with entirely new money, derived from wealth not previously in circulation and which has been dug from the earth, seem to be greater and more far-reaching than in any other industry.

It is notable that in such a mining State as Arizona, over half of the population, exclusive of Indians on reservations, is directly dependent upon the mining industry for support, according to a compilation made by the Arizona Department of Mineral Resources. These conclusions were based upon an economic survey made by Rolland A. Vandergrift and associates which showed that, for each miner employed, there were 14 persons, including the miner himself, dependent upon his production. As more than one-third of Arizona's mining labor is employed in mines classed as small mines, one can readily deduce that one-sixth of the State's population is supported by these lesser operations that we are asking aid for, and many of which may grow into major ones.

The effect of mine loans on employment may be clearly seen from the information contained in an editorial by Charles F. Willis which appeared in the Mining Journal, Phoenix, Ariz., late in 1939, entitled "An Amazing Revelation." The editor here points out how money spent for the development of new mines tends to create future prosperity to a much greater extent than the actual expenditure would indicate. Among other things it said, "John E. Norton, head of the Mine Loan Division of R. F. C., is authority for the statement that the total losses will possibly aggregate as much as $500,000. This looks like a lot of money being lost and gives those who do not think a thing through something to talk about." He goes on to say, "A careful survey was made of these properties and John E. Norton is again authority for the statement that 'as a result of the mining loans made to July 1, 1939, there will be created 2,400,000 man-days of work. This represents new jobs. This figure is based upon a conservative estimate of the life of each property from that date.'"

The editor states further, "It means that the Government created work for the future at a gross cost of 21 cents for each day of work that was made, and it paid full current wages doing it. Assuming that the miner gets $5 a day for the 2,400,000 man days of work, and that labor is about 35 percent of the cost of mining, the expenditure of $500,000 by the Government has created $36,000,000 in business, and, at our present rate, approximately $7,000,000 will come back to the Government and its subdivisions in taxes through one channel or other. Thus, the Government gets a profit of six and one-half millions on one-half million spent. Labor gets $12,000,000 in employment, and the railroads, business houses, manufacturers, farmers, cattle raisers, and hundreds of others share in another $24,000,000."

If the expenditure on mining development of the small sums so far loaned by the R. F. C. can have such a magnificent result, the operation of the class C loan plan, putting millions instead of thousands of dollars into productive use over a much wider area, should eliminate the necessity for the greatest portion of the direct relief money now being spent wherever there may be metallic or nonmetallic mining activities, if the plan is properly and liberally administered.

4. MAINTAINING TAXATION SCHEDULES

We must not overlook the fact that mining pays a large share of all taxes and in order to maintain the present rates of taxation it is necessary to keep this industry flourishing and to take every possible step to maintain and preferably increase its present gross income and profits. Taxes are not being reduced and there is little chance that they will be. The only way to keep unit taxes at their present level is to maintain or increase the present industrial income and, if possible, to increase the number of taxable properties and thus more generally distribute the burden.

Using Arizona again as an example of the typical mining State we find that mining pays a big proportion of its taxes, as is true in similar States. Analysis of the 1937 reports of the Arizona Tax Commission and the Arizona Unemployment Compensation Commission revealed the fact that in 1937, those engaged in mining paid nearly 35 percent of the total amount collected as sales taxes alone, not taking into consideration indirect contributions from industries catering to those engaged in mining. The figure for 1937 was $1,418,352.49 and the small mines' proportion of this was about half a million Employing one-fifth of the labor in the State, mining paid more than one-third of the State sales tax and one-fourth of the ad-valorem taxes.

To put the tax statistics on such a basis that the mining industry's comparative burden may be seen at a glance, it should be scaled down to dollars paid per each $10,000 of gross income. In 1937, mining paid $147.90, agriculture $32.75, and livestock $33.07 per each $10,000. Although the production of Arizona's mines was nearly $1,000,000 less than it was in 1914, the amount of direct sales taxes paid by them was 285 percent higher and this represents only 37 percent of the revenues raised from mining taxation. Now, the reason for studying these typical figures is to show what an intolerable burden will be laid on our other basic industries, not to mention the public at large, if every possible step is not taken to prevent mining from dying out for lack of suitable development of properties which may replace those now being depleted.

CONCLUSIONS

To sum up briefly the above arguments:

1. It should now be clear to anyone that the Class C mine loans as proposed in H. R. 8206, are an imperative necessity if we are to locate and develop adequate sources of strategic and critical war minerals to supply us in an emergency, and that it would be nothing short of criminal not to utilize this logical way of finding and developing these vital minerals.

2. For the sake of maintaining our industrial economy we must find and develop mines to offset depletion of present ore bodies.

3. We believe that the Class C mine loans will be largely self-liquidating. Due to the method of repayment by a 15-percent gross royalty and the small size of the individual loans, the repayment experience should be very good. However, if these in reality were total grants rather than secured loans, the effect of them in increasing employment will be so great that if they are administered as the sponsors of the bill intend, it will not be too much to hope in view of Mr. Norton's figures that, for each $1,000,000 expended on these loans, three millions or more can eventually be cut from the general relief appropriations, thus making a tremendous saving to the taxpayers.

4. If present mining taxation burdens must eventually be thrown onto the other basic industries due to lack of new property developments, it is plain from the figures already given that these other industries, in States such as Arizona, can scarcely be expected to survive such an oppressive load.

Finally, I may say that there has probably never before been proposed to any Congress a measure which, with so sensible and painless a method of financing and small eventual cost, can bring such far-reaching benefits of a permanent nature to the people of the United States and our economic system.

The Party of the "Fifth Column"—Part 3

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 11, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, yesterday a large majority in the House passed a tax bill which will place an excessive burden upon all the taxpayers of the United States. This bill was passed, as someone said, to make the people "tax conscious," and I hope, dear folks, that you will become "tax conscious," for you are not only charged with these taxes but you are also paying interest on a national debt of over $50,000,000,000.

Now then, a large majority of the men you sent to Congress wants you to realize how incompetent the New Deal has been, how incompetent the President of the United States has been, and it is to make you conscious of this incompetence that the large majority of Democrats and Republicans joined in passing this tax bill. I hope that this measure will prove effective, and it should raise no question from either Democrats or Republicans, for both of them joined hands in this very laudable effort.

As you cogitate upon this and upon the consideration the men you elected to Congress have given to you in the protection of your rights and your liberties, I also want to call your attention to the national debt which is now over $50,000,000,000. Some day your great, great, great grandchildren will be laboring under the present national debt, and even at such distant time it will still remain unpaid. In other words, President Wilson's and President Roosevelt's administrations have shouldered a national debt or tax burden upon the people of this Nation that will, for the next 2 centuries, make slaves of the American people.

Increased taxation may be compared to borrowed money. A successful businessman operates his business on income established upon the earnings of his business. The Government operates upon taxes levied against the people, the taxpayers, of the Nation. The difference between the two is that the businessman earns his income, but the Government takes its income from the earnings of industry, business, and labor. When incompetent people engage in business, they first lose their own capital investment, and when this is gone, they borrow, if they can, from banks or other financial sources. When they can no longer borrow or when their credit is exhausted, they go bankrupt and are usually looked upon as failures in the community.

Your Government is no different from such individuals, for when it cannot operate within normal or reasonable income, and because of such incompetence resorts to the use of borrowed money, it is no better or more competent than any individual who is looked upon as a chronic failure in the community in which he lives. Indebtedness, or let me say, our national debt, therefore, may be looked upon as incontrovertible evidence of Government incompetence and unfamiliarity with principles that underlie sound business. The proof that the Wilson administration was incompetent was clearly shown in a national debt of $27,000,000,000. The best evidence that the Roosevelt administration is incompetent is in a national debt of $50,000,000,000. In other words, the Roosevelt administration is just about twice as incompetent as the Wilson administration. This is what the new dealers call liberalism, democracy, or the New Deal.

Such incompetence is, in a sense, an impeachment against those who are engaged in private industry which makes it nearly impossible for them to establish credit or public trust. It is no different in national affairs, because willful squandering of public wealth is an impeachment against the administration that should not go unchallenged by the people whose credit is destroyed. That is the people of this Nation, because money is borrowed upon the credit of the United States. When the same officials actively engage in forcing legislation through Congress, contrary to the Constitution of the United States, they have by such act become enemies of the United States and should be dealt with accordingly. When these same public officials engage in foreign intrigue which may lead this Nation into a conflict in which we have no interest but which may cost the lives of our young men, it becomes a duty of public officials to call the public's attention to this fact for it is our sons who must pay the price.

This in itself is a most real and glaring indictment against any administration, and it is for that reason I have now drafted impeachment charges to be preferred against the President of the United States if he in any sense places us in a position where an "incident" may involve us in the present war.

The people of this Nation should know that this war is fought to restore those in power who control money and credit. And that in itself is an offense against the United States, and those who engage in it are our enemies and should be treated as such.

I do not like to make a statement of this sort, but we have reached the point where someone must state the facts to the people of this Nation, and I have selected to do so. I hope the people will not think I am fooling, because I was never more serious in my life.

Congress has committed so many unconstitutional acts that the people should be up in arms today and demand that each and every Member rededicate himself to the fundamental principles of this Government as set forth in the Constitution. However, when Members of Congress forget their duty to the people to such extent that they resort to persecution of those whom they were elected to protect, it is high time for the people themselves to take a hand in this Government. When Members of Congress are so incompetent that they can find no sound procedure to establish a balance between income to maintenance costs, someone who understands sound business should replace them in Congress.

Members of Congress should realize that raising the debt limit and constant borrowing is not the answer to the deplorable condition in which our Government is now. As a matter of fact, it will only accelerate or hurry us toward eventual bankruptcy, repudiation of currency, and the national debt. Only a fool will attempt to borrow money in order to meet an increasing operative cost created by incompetent management, for the outcome of such procedure is so obvious that even Members of Congress should be able to understand it.

This is what should have been done—not yesterday, but 25 years ago: The State should have been called upon to assume its function so as to relieve the Government of the United States of administrative expenses and care for the States. The Federal operative cost should be reduced by drastic economical operation to the very lowest point for efficiency; and in such procedure lies the answer.

By drastic reduction in the Federal operative cost, the income which now prevails will not only be sufficient to care for such expenses but will, in addition to that, establish a surplus which may be used to retire obligations against the United States Government. This would be a sound procedure, because it would require no additional taxes. As a matter of fact, taxes could be reduced and Government income increased if we had people employed in the Federal Government who had the slightest conception of the principles which underlie sound business operation.

This in itself is a most real and glaring indictment against the administration and should not go unchallenged by Congress and by the people of this Nation. The people should demand that Congress prefer impeachment charges against anyone, no matter who he may be, who, through laxness, permits an incident to occur in order to arouse public sentiment for war.

I, of course, invite criticism of any statement I make, but such criticism should be based upon the authenticity of my remarks. If they are tabulated and documented, it serves no purpose to call me names, for such attitude proves the truth of my statements.

It requires no ability to prove the incompetence of this administration, because it is now admitted by the man on the street who at one time labored under the delusion that the President was a friend of the people of this Nation. The people I refer to are those whom the President so kindly described as the "ill-housed, ill-clothed, ill-fed." These unfortunates are still in the same condition as they were when the President shed his hypocritical tears of agony for a people he cares as little about as he does for those who will not bow in admiration before him, saying, "Allah! Allah! Thou greatest of all rulers!"

The people of this Nation should be apprised of a fact that I believe very few of them realize. Say that I deposit $100 in the bank, in a savings or general account. The bank invests this money in bonds, negotiated by larger banks back east, so that my $100 reaches one of the larger banks, say in New York City. It is in these banks most of the Nation's wealth will be found. These banks, and the Federal Reserve banks, then control this money.

There is approximately seven and one-half billion dollars in circulation, of which several billions are on deposit in large centralized banks. The Federal Government now borrows, say $100,000,000 from the Federal Reserve banks, and for this it issues bonds to the bank which in turn extends credit to the communities, including mine, where the money is to be used. In addition to this security, of course, the Federal Reserve banks and other interests are now holding about $15,000,000,000 in gold certificates.

The fallacy of this transaction lies in the fact that our own Government, which represents "we, the people," borrows from the Federal Reserve banks money which belongs to us, because it is the money we place in the bank on deposit. There are only about seven and one-half billion dollars in circulation, yet we have borrowed seven times that amount from the Federal Reserve banks, and this now amounts to approximately $50,000,000,000, upon which we are paying interest to the national and international bankers.

There is $7,000,000,000 in circulation. Three percent interest amounts to $210,000,000, but remember: We have borrowed this amount seven times, so we are actually paying seven times $210,000,000, or $1,470,000,000 interest. And we are paying this amount in spite of the fact that there is only $7,000,000,000 of money in total circulation in the United States. This amounts to approximately 21 percent interest, which has accumulated by using the same money over and over again. This, of course, will eventually reach a point where the interest itself may be greater than the money in circulation, and then this question may be asked, "What are we going to do about it?"

What is to be done now?

It should be clear from this that we cannot go on and borrow as we have in the past, for our currency structure is bound to collapse and that is a danger far greater than most of us realize. When our currency structure collapses, it will mean that each and every one of our people will be bankrupt. They will be unable to buy food, for money will have no value, and we will then be confronted with the same situation the German people had to face when the international bankers withdrew the gold from Germany in order to bring about bankruptcy of her Government.

I, therefore, disapprove of the Army appropriation bill, for the simple reason that it is the wrong way to go about building up national defenses. The greatest national defense any nation can have is a sound currency structure, with all factories, industries, and business operating at full capacity and with everyone employed. We cannot expect to build up national defense on a dead or dying industrial structure. We cannot build up our national defenses on inflated currency and borrowed money. We can only build up our national defenses by rehabilitation of industries, drastic reduction in the Federal cost of operation and return to sound business operation in the Government.

It should be clear that a bankrupt Treasury and an army of unemployed are not conducive to the rehabilitation of industries or national defense. A business is healthy only when the treasury is sound, and that is as applicable to the Government as it is to any private industry.

When we have developed such healthy industrial condition we can, without endangering the national credit, appropriate such money as is needed for national defense. However, this should not be in spasmodic appropriations, but we should instead gradually build up the Army, Navy, and land fortifications so that we will be able to take care of curselves no matter what may happen.

It should interest those who are now frantic about rearming or arming to know that the late Senator Copeland, of New York, introduced an amendment on the Senate floor to the Army appropriation bill for $25,000,000 in antiaircraft guns; and it may be of greater interest to know that the administration opposed this appropriation. Congress, however, appropriated $100,000,000 for the Army which it did not use. When General Craig appeared before the Senate committee hearings, when questioned on the hundred million dollar appropriation, he informed the committee that the President told him not to use it. This statement was off the record. Now the question which arises in my mind is what became of the $100,000,000 which was appropriated by Congress, and which the Army did not use?

To those who cannot understand why the Communists are not prosecuted and why these alien gentry are allowed to operate as a communistic party, it may be interesting to know that within the last 10 days the President entertained 70 members of the Youth Congress at a meeting in the White House. They were advised not to say that they were there. Some of them were alleged Communists and admittedly fellow travelers of the Communist Party. Is it now any wonder that we have communism in the United States, and is it any wonder that the Department of Justice and the F. B. I. are making little attempt to apprehend the Communists or deport those who have no business to remain within the United States.

Republican Trojan Horses

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 12, 1940

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, sometime ago one of my Michigan colleagues [Mr. ENGEL] talked about the Michigan cherry problem. In depicting the sad plight of the growers

he placed the blame unreservedly and entirely upon the Democratic administration and upon a law which as a matter of fact had nothing whatsoever to do with the difficulty.

Now comes my friend and colleague of Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF], who makes a similar erroneous expression as regards the trade agreements. The statement of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ENGEL] has been completely refuted and it is my purpose at this time to place in the RECORD a statement which knocks into a cocked hat the expressions of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF].

REPUBLICAN TROJAN HORSES

Opponents of the trade agreements continue their methods of inflating, padding, deceptive diluting, blending, deliberate omissions to make a case against the program. They even take advantage of the present war situation, when countries are struggling for their existence, to paint the picture in the most unfavorable light.

My colleague the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] had placed in the RECORD of June 10—the day Italy declared war on the Allies—some incomplete tables which involved practically all the schemes of deception suggested above. His was truly a Trojan horse of deception. His main scheme was a comparison of selected figures in an attempt to show that farmers were better off in 1932, at the bottom of the depression, than in 1939. I desire at this point to supplement his figures to indicate what has happened to American farmers during the 7 years of the New Deal.

	1932	1939
Farm cash income from marketings	$4,682,000,000	$7,711,000,000
Average farm price for all commodities, index (1909–14=100)	65	93
Average prices received by farmers for:
Wheat (cents per bushel)	38.80	63.60
Corn (cents per bushel)	28.10	47.60
Beef cattle (dollars per 100 pounds)	4.25	7.03
Hogs (dollars per 100 pounds)	3.34	6.23
Butterfat (cents per pound)	17.90	23.90
Wool (cents per pound)	8.60	22.30
Cotton (cents per pound)	5.82	8.66
Tobacco (cents per pound)	9.30	13.60

In view of his use of the 1932 and 1939 figures, I want to call to the attention of American farmers just when they lost their foreign markets in agricultural products. A comparison of agricultural exports in 1929 and 1932 gives the following results:

Agricultural exports, 1929	$1,693,000,000
Agricultural exports, 1932	662,000,000
Loss in agricultural exports under Hawley-Smoot Act, annually	1,031,000,000

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] stressed the increase in so-called competitive agricultural imports from 1932, the low year of the Hoover depression, to 1939. By abstract figures he attempted to make it appear that farmers were better off in 1932 than in 1939. The imports of so-called competitive agricultural products in 1929, before the Hawley-Smoot Act, amounted to $1,017,000,000, in comparison with $526,000,000 in 1939, the year which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] considered so bad for American farmers. These figures indicate that American farmers were nearly a half billion dollars better off, as far as competitive agricultural imports were concerned in 1939 than in 1929.

As with other tables inserted in the RECORD with the inference that trade agreements are the cause of increased imports, and at the same time decreased exports, the import table inserted by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] included a number of items, such as wool, flaxseed, and vegetable oils and fats, the duty of which have not been reduced in any trade agreement. This is a common scheme of the opponents of trade agreements in order to incite the farmers against the program. I do not believe farmers are going to be that gullible.

The caption, in his table "Cattle and beef," includes items more than half the value of which represented no reduction of duty. Likewise, more than half of the value figures of imports of cheese represented types which entered the United States at the Hawley-Smoot rates of duty so that no trade agreement could have encouraged these increases. There was no general reduction of duty on corn, only a preferential concession to Cuba. The figures on potatoes applied largely to a lower duty on seed potatoes made for the sole benefit of a great majority of American farmers.

These are a few common illustrations of how the opponents of trade agreements hope to win over the farmer vote. Even if the imports were bad in themselves, this sort of inflating, padding, and diluting by opponents does not make a better case for them against trade agreements. Farmers are better informed as to the reductions in duty which have been made in trade agreements. They will not be so easily misled. When this table is carefully examined, I think it can truly be said that it is a Hawley-Smoot Trojan horse, which will not take the farmers unaware.

Lions' International, With Its 140,000 Members, Offers Full Cooperation With Federal Government in Suppressing "Fifth Column" Activities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 12, 1940

LETTERS AND EDITORIALS

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following correspondence and editorials, which are fully explanatory:

LIONS INTERNATIONAL,
Chicago, June 10, 1940.

Hon. JENNINGS RANDOLPH,
Representative in Congress, Old House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Following up my telephone conversation with you in Washington the other day, I am pleased to inform you that Lions International is working in direct cooperation with the Federal Bureau of Investigation in the counteracting of "fifth column" activities, with particular reference to acts of sabotage and other subversive activities.

We have sent to the F. B. I. a list of our 3,700 citizenship and patriotism committees, which represents complete coverage of our 3,700 Lions Clubs. For the time being, the arrangement is that we will do all of the contact work with our clubs. Along this line, Melvin Jones has written two articles on the subject of the "fifth column," which appeared in our magazine, The Lion. We have just sent out a Socratic League program entitled "What Is To Be Done About Foreign Agents?", and our next mailing to our committee chairmen will include a list of all of the field offices of the F. B. I. to which complaints and information are to be transmitted. You will receive a copy of this mailing. Under date of May 28, we sent a letter to all our citizenship and patriotism committee chairmen requesting their cooperation in this work.

When I was in Washington, J. Edgar Hoover, the Director of the F. B. I., arranged for me to have a conference with his assistant, Mr. Clegg, who received very enthusiastically the plan under which Lions International is working in cooperating with the Government in this patriotic work. Mr. Clegg made one particularly pertinent remark, and that was that just the other day he received information that the Communist Party in the United States had 140,000 known adherents. When he found out that our Lions International has 140,000 members, he said he felt considerably relieved, because he knew that the one more than offset the other.

Melvin Jones has asked me to send you his best wishes along with my own. I am sorry I could not see you personally in Washington, but perhaps we can work this out at a later date. In the meantime, if there is anything further we can send you on this subject, please let us know. I will keep you posted as to further developments.

Very sincerely yours,

HENRY KRUEGER,
Assistant Treasurer.

JUNE 12, 1940.

Mr. HENRY KRUEGER,
Assistant Treasurer, Lions International, McCormack Building, 332 South Michigan Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR MR. KRUEGER: I am deeply appreciative of your letter of June 10, which has come to my desk today.

I feel that the patriotic action of Lions International is highly commendable and deserving of congressional recognition and widespread notice. I shall, therefore, place in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD our correspondence and include therewith the two excellent editorials written by Melvin Jones, secretary general, as published in the Lions magazine of the issues of May and June. Melvin is to be highly congratulated on his forceful writing.

I have been a member of the Lions International since 1924, and increasingly have I valued my membership in such a truly fine organization which stands for the best principles of militant Americanism.

With kindest regards, I am,

Faithfully yours,

JENNINGS RANDOLPH.

[From the Lion for May 1940]

THE "FIFTH COLUMN"

(By Melvin Jones)

It is ironic that the term "fifth column" which was first used, it is said, by the Communists to describe activities of their opponents, has come to designate the type of activity typical not only of Fascist and Nazi organizations, but of the very methods employed by the Communists themselves.

The term was apparently first used by Communists to designate those people in Madrid during its siege who were antagonistic to the Madrid regime; and active adherents of the Nationalist cause. It was also reputedly used by the Nationalist general Emilio Mola when he was asked by correspondents which of his four columns then driving toward Madrid would take that city. He is quoted as replying, "The 'fifth column,'" referring to the people living in the city who were Nationalist sympathizers and prepared to assist in accomplishing the surrender of the city to the besieging forces.

Notice that this original "fifth column" was not necessarily an armed unit, yet eventually became a powerful if not a deciding factor in the ultimate settlement of the conflict.

Since that occasion has not the term come to mean an advance post, composed of persons in sympathy with an outside force and working in collaboration with it?

Under this interpretation it can be assumed that it was a "fifth column" which awaited and welcomed foreign troops in several of the recent episodes throughout the world, and in at least one instance the "fifth column" had seized several important public buildings before the invading army had even reached the outskirts of the city which was its objective.

It is clear that in the view of the aggressive totalitarian states the "fifth column" has become just as essential a part of their army as any of the military units, and in a sense has become an active part of the military arm in these states.

The principal function of these advance units is to rise at the opportune moment and create disturbances, even to the point of armed rebellion. Sabotage, dissemination of propaganda, instigation to disorder and riots, alienation of the loyalty of a people from its duly elected government, even the maintenance of arms depots, are within the sphere of activities undertaken by the "fifth columns" of communism, nazi-ism, and fascism in countries throughout the world.

The purpose of all this subversive activity in countries with which the totalitarian states are legally at peace is quite simple. It is to disrupt national unity. Undoubtedly unity is the first requisite of safety in a nation. In our democracies we are apt to forget this important fact, and because of our great freedom of individual thought and action we are inclined to permit the spread of disunity without paying it particular attention.

As we all know, the club divided against itself never was much good to anyone, least of all to itself. A business without unity is soon no business at all. A nation without unity invites the covetous glance of aspiring world theorists.

In every one of the countries of lionism, subversive groups—Nazis, Fascists, and Communists—are organizing their "fifth columns." These groups certainly do not call themselves by any such self-descriptive title as that. Their camouflaged names are too numerous to mention, but it is their aims and their actions, not their names, we must be most concerned with. Their actions are aimed at creating disunity among us.

Our mission is first to be aware of these influences, and then to stop them by education and by exposing them at every opportunity. If we do not do this we are inviting trouble by our apathy and overconfidence. Every new organization that springs up within our range of activity should be investigated carefully.

Our democratic unity is our strength and it must be preserved. Even the most virulent of dictators hesitates to plan depredations against strongly united nations. It is our place, therefore, as Lions, to lead the way in demonstrating that democracy is our faith and that none of its detractors will ever prevail upon us to embrace their subversive opinions and still less countenance the "fifth columns" of aggressive totalitarian states, which lie in wait to exploit every sign of disunion. No foreign personage or organization must ever be able to say that his "fifth column" within our borders is the column which will accomplish our downfall.

Our faith in our democracy is great. Let our will to unity equal our faith.

THE "FIFTH COLUMN"

(By Melvin Jones)

A young American of Polish descent, the man who broadcast news from Warsaw during the recent Polish campaign as warplanes laid desolate the city, addressed the Central Lions Club of Chicago some time ago. Among the most startling of his revelations was the exposure of the almost unbelievable ramifications of the Nazi espionage and spy system. One proof of the thoroughness of this system was his own case. He stayed at his job of broadcasting until Warsaw fell. The conquering Nazi offered him a job in Berlin He refused it. Then began months of concentration camps, nerve-wracking semifreedom, and official surveillance as he sought to leave the country. Finally, reaching Italy, he was able to get passage for his home country, the United States.

Care was taken that only he and the United States State Department should know of his departure, for Nazi agents in Italy were checking closely on his movements. Yet 2 hours after he reached New York three Germans visited him in his hotel room, warned him not to speak of his experience nor to make any broadcasts, and took care to let him know that the addresses of his mother and sisters, still in Poland, were known to them.

His family is now in Sweden, in comparative safety, so he is free to speak.

The Nazi "fifth column" knows no boundaries.

Working even now in many countries, its fatal poison has eaten into the heart of sturdy nations like Czechoslovakia, Poland, Denmark, Norway, Holland, and Belgium with such effect that a swift attack caused the hollow shells to crumble, leaving millions of people defenseless, at the mercy of an invader of appalling ruthlessness.

Mieczyslaw M. Nowinski, writing recently in the American Mercury, threw further light on the completeness of Nazi infiltration into Poland before that country fell. The whereabouts and the number of Polish planes was known to the enemy. Secret army-transport schedules, mobilization, and concentration points, the location of munition dumps, and oil reserves all were accurately listed in the Nazi files.

When Polish soldiers took over large estates near the German border they found many equipped with cement gun emplacements, complete radio-transmission stations, landing fields for airplanes, and reserves of gasoline and oil. During the campaign numerous military trains, operating on the most secret of schedules, were blasted from the air before they started, or a few minutes afterwards.

The "fifth column" was thorough.

Long before totalitarian war comes to a country, the "fifth column" is there, an army of agents, secret and open, conspirators, spies, provocateurs, revolutionists, and propagandists. In our country, even now, these methods are being used, as the Dies committee in the United States has proved.

How do these agents work?

They work through discontented minorities, through commercial agents, through individual business contacts, through widespread anticapitalistic and antidemocratic propaganda, and through corrupt officials.

The "fifth column" uses threats and violence to induce compliance of individuals through terror. It also employs to the full the impressiveness of the armed might behind it, stressing the futility of opposition.

It points to the destruction and misery of countries which resist its fighting forces and paints pleasant pictures of the peaceful tranquillity in countries which submit to its will without a struggle.

All these are potent weapons which it is difficult for a defending nation to cope with, especially in peacetime.

As Lions we are all interested in doing what we can to protect our several nations' safety. It is well, therefore, for us to be alert to possible dangers. Authorities need and desire the alert cooperation of the private citizen. They must have information before investigations can be conducted.

A fine example of sensible cooperation that in no way could be termed "witch hunting" hysteria occurred in Canada recently. A Lion overhead a man caustically tell some children, "When Adolf Hitler comes over here you won't act like that." Although surprised, the Lion passed by and said nothing. A few days later a similar incident occurred, and the Lion reminded the man that Canada was at war with Hitler, and such remarks did not seem right. He was told, "You won't be so smart either when Adolf Hitler comes over here."

Somewhat worried, the Lion related the incident to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, who made a quiet investigation. The man was discovered to be a Nazi agent and is now interned for the duration of the war. Without fuss or hysteria and with no element of persecution in his thoughts or action, this Lion has done his country a genuine service.

The Lions are a body of men whose influence and example will guide the conduct of many others. Quite a number of Lions and Lions Clubs have done fine work in cooperation with such bodies as the Dies committee and the Federal Bureau of Investigation in the United States. Now that so many horrible examples of the treachery of the "fifth column" have been exposed to the eyes of the world, it is well to give serious, intelligent thought to our countries' internal safety.

It is well to know who are alien agents. Suspicion, however, can be a devilish poison. Let us keep tight rein on our suspicions, but let us also, as loyal citizens, familiarize ourselves with the danger and emulate the Canadian Lion who kept his eyes and ears open, defending his country even as he went about his common daily civilian tasks.

What use to have a strong defensive army, navy, and air force if the country it is protecting be crumbling from the honeycombing activities of a "fifth column"?

Let us keep our eyes open, our senses sharp. Our Nation's safety is important to us, isn't it?

The Tax Problem

EDITORIAL FROM THE NASHVILLE (TENN.) BANNER

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Nashville Banner of June 6:

[From the Nashville (Tenn.) Banner of June 6, 1940]

SHIRKING A DUTY

The measure laid before Congress by the administration outlining a plan for additional taxes wherewith to meet the necessarily and heavily enlarged appropriations for national defense was somewhat surprising in some of its provisions.

To begin with, the amount which it is proposed to raise annually over a period of 5 years, about $660,000,000, is far less than the sum now called for by the President for that purpose—about $5,000,000,000. The $3,000,000,000 of additional tax revenue now planned would be not much more than half of what is already proposed, and to a single Congress, and undoubtedly present appropriations are but a part, and probably a small one, of what will be called for in the next year or two. It would be far better if the sum to be annually raised by taxes was made really sufficient, and that a genuine, rather than fictitious, pay-as-you-go policy should be instituted.

The American people know that they must pay, and pay heavily, to make the defenses of the Nation prompt, certain, and adequate, and Congress would do well to take the people into its confidence and let them know the exact situation.

The disappointing feature of the proposed plan to raise additional revenue is that it merely calls upon those who are now paying taxes to pay more and does not call upon classes who are now exempt from taxation to pay anything. This is manifestly not just.

When it comes to income taxes, it is estimated that there are over 2,000,000 people whose incomes are from $1,000 to $2,000 annually. They are not paying a cent of income taxes under the present law, nor would they pay a thin dime under the plan that has been laid before Congress.

The sound principle to apply is that payment should be made according to ability to pay. The citizen whose income is only a few hundred dollars is not in a position to pay anything, but those whose incomes range from, say, $1,000 to about $2,000, assuredly should pay something. It is not just to the great body of citizens that so great an element of the population should be relieved from any direct income contribution toward the vast sums necessary for national defense.

Congress is making the plea that it has not time to revise the tax system and must hurry home. It is true that the inequalities and crudities in the tax system, taken as a whole, cannot be soundly revised in a few weeks; but it would take Congress no more time to enact a just income-tax law than to pass the partial and unjust one now proposed.

But Congress is still manifesting the hesitancy to enact a comprehensive, sound income-tax law, embracing the vast multitude now enjoying exemption, which that body has displayed for years. Too many of its Members are looking to November and are afraid to take any action that would be displeasing to the large element of their constituents who have escaped any payment of income taxes for years and would like to have that immunity continued.

The American people are ready to make even sacrificial contribution, if necessary, for the defense of the Nation; but these contributions should be distributed upon the principle that no class able to pay should be freed from obligation to contribute something.

It has long since been settled that taxation without representation is tyranny. It is equally true that taxation embodying discrimination is oppression.

Patriotism is in the saddle in Congress, but demogogy is at the stirrup of too many of its Members.

Dollars for Nonsense, and Information for Misinformation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WADE H. KITCHENS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 12, 1940

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Speaker, on June 11 I noticed two related articles—one appearing in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 3678, as an extension of remarks by the gentleman from Michigan, Hon. ROY WOODRUFF, and another on page 2 of the Washington Post for June 11. From the latter article I see that between January 1 and May 30, a matter of only 5 months, the Republican National Committee spent for propaganda $1,145,995; in the former article I see some more of the usual dribble of misleading statistics designed to prove that the trade-agreements program has been harmful to agriculture and that farmers were better off in 1932 than in 1939. I justly presume some of the money reported as spent by the Republicain National Committee was used to collect these data. If I were spending that much money, I would make sure of getting the whole story. I would want all the facts and finally I would want comparable statistics so the people could reach a fair and honest conclusion and be not misled or deluded.

In the first place, although it is true that the value of total agricultural exports was $662,300,000 in 1932 and $655,600,000 in 1939, as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] points out, this 1-year comparison does not take into account the effect of the war on our 1939 agricultural exports nor what had happened in prior years. In 1936, for example, our agricultural exports were $709,500,000; in 1937, $797,500,000; in 1938, $827,500,000—or an average for the 4 years, 1936–39, under the trade-agreements program of $747,500,000, which is substantially over the 1932 figure, even including the war-depressed exports in 1939.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] next claims that "competitive" agricultural imports of $296,000,000 in 1932 and of $526,000,000 in 1939 meant a loss to the farmer of $230,000,000. By the same token the fall in these imports from $1,017,000,000 in 1929 meant a gain of $721,000,000 by 1932. Any such claim as this is, of course, pure folly. In 1929 the farmer received $11,221,000,000; in 1932, $4,682,000,000; and in 1939, $7,711,000,000—the farmer lost from 1929 to 1932 and he has gained since 1932.

In his final table the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] shows the quantity of imports in 1932 and in 1939 of certain agricultural products. Again it might be asked where is the harm to the farmers because of these imports—in 1932 he received an income of $4,682,000,000 and in 1939, $7,711,000,000, excluding Government payments. I am sure the farmer is interested to find out—as if he didn't know it already—that prices received by farmers were 43 percent higher in 1939 than in 1932 and that they averaged 63 percent higher during 1936–39 than in 1932.

Mr. Speaker, the spending of $220,000 per month by the Republican National Committee for statistical political propaganda seems to be a pure waste of money. The spending of twice the amount per month will not change facts nor vary truth.

In this connection, I ask unanimous consent to insert as a part of my remarks a well-considered editorial of April 30, 1940, on the Hull trade treaties by the Times, an unselfish and well-known Republican paper of Watertown, N. Y. That editorial demolishes and should annihilate forever all opposition to the fine trade-treaty work of Secretary Hull.

[From the Watertown (N. Y.) Times of April 30, 1940]

THE REPUBLICAN PARTY AND THE TRADE AGREEMENTS

Let us hope that the Republican Party will not advance too far with any convention proposal to repeal the reciprocal-trade agreements or demand that they be subject to Senate ratification. The recent debate in Congress and the reaction which followed throughout the country demonstrated that the Republican position is as unsound as it is unpopular with the people. It is said that 90 percent of the press of the country favored Mr. Hull's trade agreements. It was regrettable indeed that Republican leadership fought the extension of the agreements and particularly regrettable that it sought to subject the agreements to Senate ratification. The latter proposal was especially short-sighted. If we had a plan of Senate ratification it would mean simply a return to the old logrolling, special-interest days, and the public is against this.

There are those in the forefront of Republican leadership who are smart enough to handle this matter without subjecting the party to handicap and attack by reason of such a shortsighted position. Let the Republican leaders who are now discussing the party platform study public opinion carefully throughout the country. Let there be a thorough analysis of just what the judgment of the people is on this subject. Mr. Hull and the Democratic leaders would have the jump on us from scratch if we went into contention and attacked the reciprocal-trade program.

The Republicans were the originators of this program. The proposed policy dates back more than 25 years. President Taft was first to put through a reciprocal-trade agreement. It was Republican policy for years, and some of the Democratic leaders now in Congress who are the strongest for trade agreements were fighting the Republicans bitterly on the issue many years ago.

We are no longer the isolated people we once were. We talk about international good will and friendly relationship after this war. It cannot come if we are going to be simply narrow Yankee traders who put up tariff barriers against those whom we naturally would seek to help for mutual welfare.

My Criticism of the Revenue Bill for 1940

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS E. MARTIN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 12, 1940

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the revenue bill of 1940 that passed the House of Representatives Tuesday, June 11, established a record for the brief time required for its passage. The brevity of time for its consideration was quite conspicuous, both before the committee and on the floor of the House. Inasmuch as I am not on the committee that had this measure under consideration, I can speak more fully with reference to the latter.

We were told Monday evening about 5 o'clock on the floor of the House that committee prints of the bill were just then available and, of course, we immediately started our study of the bill in preparation for its discussion Tuesday. We were told also that there would be 1 hour of debate on the rule and 6 hours of general debate on the bill itself—all of which would be had on Tuesday and that the bill itself would be put to a vote of the House before adjournment Tuesday evening. The rule was a closed rule, more so than almost any rule that has come before the House throughout the Seventy-sixth Congress. For example, the rule provided that "no amendment shall be in order to said bill except amendments offered by the direction of the Committee on Ways and Means," and also "amendments offered by the direction of the Committee on Ways and Means may be offered to any section of the bill at the conclusion of general debate, but said amendments shall not be subject to amendment."

In other words, we were placed entirely under the control of the administration-controlled Committee on Ways and Means. This situation is of particular importance in view of the provisions of the revenue bill itself.

The revenue bill provides for the raising of an estimated additional revenue in the sum of $1,004,000,000 per year for a period of 5 years. On that point there was very little disagreement in the entire House of Representatives. But the bill contained also a provision to increase the national indebtedness by $4,000,000,000 above the present limit of $45,000,000,000. It was provided furthermore that revenues derived from obligations issued from this authorization shall be available to meet any expenditures made after June 30, 1940, for the national defense or to reimburse the general fund of the Treasury therefor. This provision appears innocent enough until its real meaning is determined. The real issue so cleverly concealed in the bill is that all national defense expenditures shall come out of either the increased revenue from taxation or out of the $4,000,000,000 increase in our national indebtedness thereby relieving the Budget for Federal spending in every other department of government of even the slightest responsibility for the regular and ordinary expenditures for national defense. In other words, under the guise of providing for the national defense, the present national administration has slipped out from under the necessity of providing for the ordinary expenditures for national defense out of revenues heretofore chargeable with that responsibility and the wild nondefense spending can now proceed without incurring such deficits as have accumulated in recent years. This is important to the spenders in view of the fact that we are rapidly reaching the $45,000,000,000 debt limit.

It seems to me that honesty in dealing with the taxpayers would have required that both the $4,000,000,000 increase in our national debt and the $1,004,000,000 per annum additional revenue should have been restricted to those extraordinary expenditures for national defense above and beyond the amounts heretofore allotted to national defense from revenues other than those provided in this bill. If this bill had so provided, it would then have been necessary for this administration to curtail its extravagant expenditures in other fields and I am sure that that curtailment in such expenditures is more important today than any other problem facing our Nation in the building up of our national defenses. I am sure also that public opinion would have heartily endorsed such curtailment in the Federal Government's orgy of spending. Inasmuch as such a restriction would have curtailed expenditures for nondefense purposes by nearly $2,000,000,000 per year, and inasmuch as that would have been a painful restriction for the spenders, the opportunity to sidestep this responsibility under the guise of national defense and by means of clever manipulation of the rules of procedure in the House of Representatives was too great to expect the present national administration to deal honestly with the American public. While I marvel at the consistency of the present national administration in thus cleverly achieving its goal of increased profligate spending, I strongly condemn them not only for doing this under the guise of national defense but also for even desiring to continue their wild nondefense spending orgy in the face of our speeding to fiscal disaster.

I voted for the revenue bill notwithstanding these serious objections because I did not wish to impede the imperative augmentation of our national defenses. The fact that the augmentation of our national defenses is so imperative enabled the present national administration to force this bill to passage, including as it does an increase of funds made available for nondefense spending in the sum of approximately $2,000,000,000 per annum.

I cannot help but feel that such continued wild nondefense spending by the present national administration will be vigorously condemned by the American public when the foregoing facts become known to them.

Prophecy and Realism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL HINSHAW
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, June 12, 1940

TWO EDITORIALS FROM THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial, which is a plea for sane contemplation of our present situation in respect to the wars now raging and for a realistic view toward the future.

The editorial follows:

[From the Washington Daily News of June 11, 1940]

PROPHECY?

"Fenced by your careful fathers, ringed by your leaden seas,
Long did ye wake in quiet and long lie down at your ease * * *
But ye say, 'It will mar our comfort.' Ye say, 'will minish our trade.'
Do ye wait for the spattered shrapnel ere ye learn how a gun is laid?
For the low red glare to the southward when the raided coast towns burn?
(Light ye shall have on that lesson, but little time to learn.)"

This was not written 5 years ago, or 5 months ago, but in 1902, by an Englishman who more than any other typified the old England which is perhaps, although we hope not, gone forever.

The Empire honored him, but did not listen to him, and his words were embalmed in anthologies.

It may be too late for England to listen to the voice of Rudyard Kipling. But is it too late for us?

Not only have we our own wide coasts and borders and rich, far-flung territories to protect, but the President has given a blank check to Canada, stating that we will defend it from invasion, and has reaffirmed in addition our guardianship under the Monroe Doctrine of some 26,000 miles of South American coast line. A large order. If we are put to the test, it will take more than our own "leaden seas," and our warships that sail them, to bulwark us. It will take guns and planes and sweat and blood. In short, this a plea for realism.

Full-page newspaper advertisements appearing in many cities yesterday blazoned the line "Stop Hitler Now." They were signed by the "Committee To Defend America by Aiding the Allies," president of which is William Allen White, of Emporia, Kans., great editor and great citizen.

The appeal, like the prohibition experiment, was "noble in purpose." Otherwise it was not so good. The committee, for whose personnel and high purpose we have the greatest respect, might better be called the "committee to get America into the war by the back door."

Some Americans with every right to an opinion honestly believe that we should now be in the war in Europe. This is not to debate that point. It is rather a plea for realism instead of emotion, and for consideration of the fact that all the armed democracies of Europe combined have not been able to stop Hitler's mechanized military might even with equipment 10 years ahead of anything we possess in quantity. "Stop Hitler Now"—what with? Our bare hands and the bared breasts of our youth?

Though the fact is not yet generally realized, Hitler has already determined the broad lines of our national life for at least another generation. Even with an ocean intervening, European totalitarianism has made obsolete our American way of life, temporarily at least; permanently, unless we modernize our thinking and our national planning. Our country at present is not, as Mr. White's committee states, "still the most powerful nation on earth." To continue to think in terms which ignore the realities is to invite the disaster which has befallen European democracy.

We do not agree, but we respect the right of opinion of those who believe that we should be fighting with the European democracies today. Time may alter the situation, but today it seems inescapable that the surest way to help our friends in the European democracies is first to demonstrate to the dictators that we can help ourselves. Our present job is production for war, not participation in it. We must neither meddle nor muddle. Safety for, and service to, democracy, like charity, must begin at home.

Mobilization of our national resources, our genius for mass production, and our manpower, to insure a safe haven for democracy in America, will be the surest means of guaranteeing its ultimate revival in Europe.

Our immediate task is to show that our democracy can profit by the mistakes of others, and that the fire of liberty will be kept burning here. Our job today is not to stop Hitler. Our job is to start thinking. Thinking in terms of service to our country rather than service from it. Thinking in terms of defense and self-protection rather than of comfort and personal privilege; thinking in terms of increased production rather than decreased working hours; thinking in terms of the sacrifices that democracy is worth in dollars of capital and man-hours of labor; thinking of two related sentences in Premier Reynaud's remarkable interview yesterday with William Philip Sims in which he said: "In recent years, especially, France has tended to speed social advances to the neglect of her national defenses." And, "the spirit which makes a people seek social progress in times of peace, also makes crusaders of them and their soldiers in times like these."

Let's have a truce on bluff and bluster. Let's avoid being edged, via the back door, into any fight until, if we ever must go in, we will be prepared to finish it.

And the foregoing expresses our sentiments about the belligerent tone that characterized the President's address last night at Charlottesville, Va.

This is no time to be talking loudly while carrying a feather duster.

Then today, Mr. Speaker, appears the following supplementary editorial:

[From the Washington Daily News of June 12, 1940]

SADDLES AND BRIDLES

Following up our remarks of yesterday—about how talking loudly while carrying a feather duster is hardly prudent in these tough times—we observe that our so-called first Army of 100,000 men will go through maneuvers this summer without a single combat plane, with only a handful of worn-out tanks.

For further comment we yield the floor to Representative Ross COLLINS (Democrat, Miss.) who for the last dozen years has probably devoted more time and intelligent attention to Army appropriations than any other Member of Congress:

"Goodness knows what we can do with World War left-overs in a war like the one now going on in Europe. The $200,000,000 worth of saddles and bridles that the War Department had left over are still in our midst and can only be used in a wild West show or a Fort Myer society circus—not in a modern war. * * *

"All that could be done with large numbers of mobilized men (at this time) would be to arm a few of them with out-of-date rifles. And, strange it it may seem to aging generals, the war going on in Europe has not been a rifle war.

"The cream of the crop of manpower would be called up and enlisted at the outbreak of the struggle and they would be the ones who would go into battle equipped the worst. It is an admitted fact that there exists a distinct lack of modern tanks, combat cars, and modern mechanized weapons.

"And after the flower of our youth had laid down their lives, and if the war lasted long enough, we might, ultimately get around to equipping our armed forces with something like what a sensible bandit would use to rob a filling station. * * *

"I think very little of an army implemented with rifles, no matter how well its blue uniforms fit and no matter how well it can execute the ceremonies of the parade ground. Ziegfeld could have taught an army like that much better than the ordinary Army officer, for he knew more about it.

"Further, I can't imagine anything more tragic than nicely trained marching men in front of machine-gun fire, much less 60-ton armored tanks, flame-throwing land battleships, and diving airplanes.

"China, Poland, Denmark, Norway, Holland, and Belgium were some of the nations that prepared for war according to the obsolete 1914 plans."

The Roosevelt "One-Horse" Team

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FOREST A. HARNESS
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, June 12, 1940

Mr. HARNESS. Mr. Speaker, when President Roosevelt came before Congress on May 16 with his first emergency-defense message, he assured this body and the millions of Americans who comprised his radio audience that where national defense is concerned, he and the Congress would work as a team. The stark crisis in international affairs, and the grave hazards to American security which the President emphasized on that occasion have become steadily darker and more grave.

But despite the fact, administration forces have driven for early adjournment of Congress. The date now fixed at which the administration will try to force adjournment is set at June 22.

When the President specifically promised teamwork, we all took the statement at face value. We naturally assumed that teamwork was to mean renouncement of politics and personal interests during a period of real, earnest cooperation all the way round. In view of developments, however, there must be a different definition of teamwork at the White House.

Teamwork, administration model, seems to place the peoples' Representatives in Congress somewhere below the status of water boy. Congress is supposed to appropriate billions of additional defense funds. It is supposed to find the means of raising vast new revenues. And it is expected to do these things at a nod from the President, without thought or study. And then, when it has rubber-stamped a slap-dash program, thrown together overnight by the Executive, it is supposed further to abdicate its responsibilities to the American people, delegate its constitutional duties and authorities in blank to the President, and go to the bench for the duration of the emergency.

That simply is not the American idea of teamwork, even after the large doses we have had of it for more than 7 years. And the few samples we have had of the results of such teamwork to date in this emergency are alarming the people to the point of demanding that there be no adjournment of Congress now.
